IT would be illuminating to know how large a percentage of New York's population dwells below the level of the sidewalks. The premium which high rents have placed upon every square foot of ground has transformed the subsoil of Manhattan into a landlord's gold mine, and the rapidity with which what were meant to be basements have been "converted" into what are alleged to be apartments is crowding people downward—almost as fast as they are being pushed skyward. Meantime pneumatic drills bite out the rock to make fresh burrows.

It is this submerged tenth (or whatever the proportion may be) that Bosworth Crocker draws upon for material in her one-act plays. Of the five plays in the collection, two have scenes laid below the pavement level—and the other three command a view of life equally narrow and similarly depressing. It is as if her characters, staring out through dingy barred windows, have only the horizon of the curbstone across the street for their dreams; their eyes, seeking a meaning and some beauty in life, are blinded by the sweepings and the litter of the gutters. In "The Last Straw" one faces "the kitchen of the Bauer flat in the basement of the Bryn Mawr"—how poetic these apartment houses are in the telephone directory!—and looks through an open door at the dumbwaiter, common carrier of garbage and groceries and gossip. In "The Baby Carriage" the vista is that from a tailor-shop "two steps down from the sidewalk." Here one finds that mingling of emotions and races out of which are woven the trials and aspirations of humanity. The author is not dealing with poverty, but with that grinding struggle which is even worse; her people have the illusion of some future dawn of comfort, which grows pitifully dimmer with every step. Two of the plays—"The Dog" and "The First Time"—are laid in police courts, which—in the figurative temple of the law—themselves occupy the converted basement, administering justice with the lazy impartiality of a janitor. Here one has again, in Bosworth Crocker's vivid handling, an appraisal of the ironic fates which play with the lives of humble folk, turned aside from the normal expression of their hopes and loves and replacing their true emotions with parodies. In the protagonists of her dramas, the author has been highly successful; they are living creations voicing their woes and their disappointments with conviction and with no mawkish interludes. The lay figures which she has introduced to express the good impulses of the world are not quite so convincing; the Irish police matron in "The First Time" is a little incredible in her well-meant offices of kindness, and Mrs. Rooney—the Hibernian angel in "The Baby Carriage"—seems too Lady Bountiful to be true. Some of the minor figures in these compact little dramas, however, are etched with a swift and compelling fidelity to life.

If one cites the well-worn slice-of-life label for Bosworth

Crocker's plays it is to suggest that—contrary to the accepted method—she has made her cuts transversely and examined with greatest care the bottom layers. She is not interested in dramatic contrast and only secondarily in dramatic conflict; she centers her thought upon weary souls, buffeting existence and being buffeted to the breaking-point, so that they face the crises of life only partially aware of the significance of their revolt. Out of such elements are woven drama which is sharp and terse and—like life itself—indecisive. LISLE BELL

The Return of Ovid

Ovid. The Lover's Handbook. A Complete Translation of the Ars Amatoria. By F. A. Wright. The Broadway Translations. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

OVID was a favorite poet of Chaucer, as he was of Shakespeare, and also, strangely enough, of Milton. Dryden was fonder of him than he was of certain classical writers whom he translated at greater length, and Pope did not neglect to modernize a few passages from the "Metamorphoses." But Ovid's reputation, as Mr. Wright says somewhere in the hundred pages of introduction which precede the present work, declined in England after the first few years of the eighteenth century. "Since 1717 translations of Horace and Virgil have been as thick as gooseberries on a gooseberry bush: of Ovid there has scarcely been one that deserves notice." Mr. Wright finds reasons for this. Horace spoke perfectly for the men of the eighteenth century, with their "genuine but very restricted patriotism, their polished but slightly brutal manners, their utter lack of all true religious feeling"; while Virgil was fitted to attract the later nineteenth century by his imperialism, his philosophic melancholy, and his acquiescence to all forms of power whether hollow or profound. Mr. Wright plausibly predicts a revival of Ovid, as he does of Lucretius, and in the case of Ovid at least it is probable that the revival will follow upon Mr. Wright's own efforts as a translator; for, judged by the present specimen, he belongs in the company of the most skillful of all Englishmen who have made classic poets modern.

Ovid until now has been more or less suspect because he is so interesting. He never was a "classic" in the sense that he was solemn. His wit, his impudence, his cool grace, his ability along with his willingness to say anything whatever that came into his head, and his indifference to dignity have been rather against him. But Chaucer and Shakespeare and Milton delighted in him because he was incredibly rich in the materials of poetry, and anyone capable of knowing a good story when he sees it has always known that Ovid is one of the best tellers of tales in the world. Add his sophistication and he becomes a poet who, if signs mean anything, ought to be popular today. Columnists who have rung the last dreary changes upon the odes of Horace may profitably turn to the "Amores," the "Heroides," the "Metamorphoses," the "Tristia," or even the "Fasti." Once Ovid is recalled from his exile in the cold north, the stream of his poetry will flow again, unlocked—if Mr. Wright continues to turn the key—from the grip of that winter which froze the beards of the men of Tomi and changed their beverages into stone:

Nor need they jars their liquor to confine;
They do not quaff a cup, they break a bit of wine.

From the opening stanza of Mr. Wright's book the reader settles down comfortably to a poem which is never in any obvious way a translation:

It is by art ships sail the sea,
It is by art that chariots move,
If then unskilled in love you be
Come to my school and learn to love.
In all the process of seduction
This handbook gives you full instruction.

This is Ovid, as all of Mr. Wright's stanzas decidedly are; but it is as contemporary as Austin Dobson or Ezra Pound. Mr. Wright establishes himself here as a master of light, ironic verse—an exceedingly difficult kind of verse, calling for constant labor and care in cadence and rhyme, yet demanding that both of these be concealed behind an appearance of ease. His rhymes astonish by their ingenuity and at the same time do not irritate by any suspicion of constraint. He introduces the most charming anachronisms without seeming to work them in; modern idioms, proverbs, names light upon the ear with a natural and proper sound:

If all the entrances are blocked,
If at each gate there stands a sentry,
If the front door is safely locked,
Then down the chimney make your entry.
Be bold and every trick essay,
Where there's a window there's a way.

So on through the three portions of this toothsome treatise upon love—the last of its kind in European poetry, and perhaps the best. So on, through directions to the lover as to how to behave at the circus, at the banquet, and in his lady's chamber, and through exhortations to the loved on many a subtle or unsubtle point, to the nearest conclusion a classic, Latin or English, could ask for:

Come now, my swans, from heaven descend,
The car you've drawn its course has run.
Our sportive task has reached its end,
And when love's trophy she has won
Let each maid whisper to her suitor
Ovid to both of us was tutor.

MARK VAN DOREN

Taking Stock

Told by an Idiot. By Rose Macaulay. Boni and Liveright. $2.
The Plastic Age. By Percy Marks. The Century Company. $2.

MISS MACAULAY means the title of her brilliantly executed satire to be taken seriously, but it is with difficulty that she achieves gloom. Through her pages, liberally sprinkled with exploding bombs of wit, she leads one character who bridges the three generations described, who watches with bitter detachment the flux of enthusiasms and absurdities which constitute life, and who ends with Macbeth's words upon her lips. But though one has laughed often the tears do not come, for obviously Miss Macaulay is one of those born satirists who find too much fun in exhibiting human follies ever to regret that man is not more wise. To read the book is to know that, for her, gibing is a sufficient end in itself and that even if God made the world for no other purpose than to make satire possible (and this theory fits the facts as well as any other) she has no real cause for repining. Disillusioned she is, but bitter she only tries to be. "Sad to say," she begins a paragraph, "the earth was, in the year 1880, drenched (as usual) in gore"; and again, speaking of freedom she remarks: "There's one thing about it; each generation of people begins by thinking they've got it for the first time in history, and ends by being sure the generation younger than themselves have too much of it. It can't really always have been increasing at the rate people suppose, or there would be more of it by now." However tragically true these things are, for the person who can state them so jauntily and so wittily, the joy of the phrase more than compensates for the sadness of the fact. What Miss Macaulay gives us is moderately good fiction, competent social history, and superlative wit, but, as for the tragedy, it has about as much chance of coming off as "Hamlet" would have if it were staged in the midst of one of Mr. Pain's most elaborate exhibitions of the pyrotechnic art.

"In the year 1879, Mrs. Garden came briskly into the drawing room from Mr. Garden's study and said in her crisp, even voice to her six children, 'Well, my dears, I have to tell you something. Poor papa has lost his faith again.'" So she begins, and so she continues, sweeping with unflinching wit and gusto through the years from the time when clergymen were busy reconciling Genesis with geology and a smart Victorian miss said to her outraged mother, "I am a late Victorian and we do what we like," down to the present day, when other smart misses are saying much the same thing. She touches off with burlesque or epigram every familiar type from the painfully liberal-minded clergyman to the latest flapper philosopher, every "movement" from Ruskin to Freud. Whoever wishes to know what the typical contemporary sophisticate thinks of himself and his grandfather will find it here, for "Told by an Idiot" is the History of Our Own Times as seen by that "younger generation" which is just now growing old, and it is a magnificently witty summing up.

Yet in spite of Miss Macaulay's dominant thesis, which is that all times are changing times, all women new women, and every year the end of an epoch, I venture the opinion that her book could not have been written except at the end of a definite literary period. Satire as easy, pointed, and unerring is not achieved on unfamiliar themes and is possible only when the object of attack is definitely recognized by all, and when we can perfect our weapons with a full knowledge of the victim's weak spots. Victorianism is dead—so dead that only an exhibition of skill as superlative as Miss Macaulay's can interest us in seeing it killed again, and if literature is not to become definitely stereotyped some new approach must be found. Perhaps there are choices other than the choice here offered between black despair and satire for satire's sake; perhaps, indeed, Victorian seriousness will come back, though not in the way our conservative friends would hope. Consider, for example, poor papa, in whom "broadmindedness amounted to a disease" and who had "believed much and often." He and his fellows fought battles against terrible monsters of superstition and tradition, losing their livelihoods and their peace of mind in the struggle, and if today the monsters they faced seem but unreal chimeras that is only because they did their job so well. Perhaps we, too, as Miss Macaulay suggests, will seem to our children to have fought with shadows, but to us those shadows are real—real enough to give wounds or draw blood, and that is enough. Life is no less passionate and important because to God (or to our descendants) it is also absurd. Such, at least, is the only faith by which novels can be written.

Mr. Percy Marks is by no means so skilful a workman as Miss Macaulay, but he cultivates a less well-tilled field. Satires on college life which are not of the George Ade variety are new, for only the very youngest of the younger generation caught the anti-Babbittian enthusiasm early enough in their lives to apply its standards to their college careers, although the new genre to which Mr. Marks's book belongs is already recognizable. It is not rash to assume that the author, who is described as an instructor at Brown, is himself not long out of college and more familiar with life and thought within the walls than without them, but he is conscious of other standards and he has brought them to bear upon college life. The picture which he draws in a very literally realistic fashion is not optimistic. On the one side the horde of unawakened barbarians, on the other a group of dry pedants; and seldom do the two meet. Though not very important as literature, "The Plastic Age" is pleasant reading and an interesting document. If Mr. Marks can judge and protest, other young men can too, and the college is not lost.

J. W. KRUTCH

Books in Brief

Nine of Hearts. By Ethel Colburn Mayne. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

The short-story writer who plunges too abruptly into the inner psychology of his characters cannot expect to take the reader with him. Miss Mayne knows the deep pools of emotion, but she insists upon diving into them before her reader is prepared for the immersion. One is asked to share her searchings amid subtleties of action and thought before one has sufficient acquaintance with her people to make the exercise truly rewarding. As a disciple of Henry James, she needs to acquire his qualities of deliberation and detachment.

Injury, Recovery and Death in Relation to Conductivity and Permeability. By W. J. V. Osterhout. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

This is a highly technical biological work which involves some mathematical calculations that may discourage the general reader at the very outset. The work is highly interesting and suggestive to the biologist, however. The experiments described aim to measure accurately such vague terms as injury, recovery, and death, to find an expression in mathematical terms for the general statement that a living thing has suffered a severe or a slight injury, or, conversely, to measure the vitality or resistance of a living organism to untoward conditions. To be sure, these experiments are made only on seaweed, but methods may be devised whereby higher organisms may be tested. The principle discovered by these experiments is that living matter offers greater resistance to the passage of an electric current when perfectly normal than when injured or when its vitality is lowered, as by exposure to a non-fatal dose of a poison.

Together. By Norman Douglas. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

Nothing can be much less rewarding than a travel record which has been conscientiously committed to a book without having first been filtered through an alert and an informed intelligence. When one turns to the narratives of Norman Douglas one can be assured that this cerebral preliminary has been observed. Mr. Douglas does not so much set down what passes in front of his eyes as what passes across his mind; his observations are the source of his impressions, and his impressions the luminous pivot for all manner of philosophy and speculation. There is just enough actual substance in "Together" to form a basis for what the author chooses to contribute out of his ripe intelligence and nimble wit; the whole works up into a pattern which eludes classification in precisely the same degree in which it gives pleasure.

Drama Serpent of Old Nile

THE eighteenth century held Shakespeare to be an inspired barbarian; the romanticists invented a sovereign and impeccable master and called that image of their fervid minds Shakespeare. He was neither the one nor the other. His was undoubtedly the highest poetical endowment in history. But his works are not so much ill-built as written in and out of a period that had the architectonic sense of neither antiquity nor modernity; his human psychology is, except at certain famous and transcendent moments, medieval and sins constantly against truth and nature; his style, of an intense and flawless glory at its best, is unsteady, unmastered, never to be counted on. He was, in truth, the victim of a general manner of writing that was nearly as bad as possible. Chaucer is, whatever else he is or is not, a good writer; Dryden is a good writer. The Elizabethans are bad writers—stilted, affected, conceited, obscure. There is no fault of the writer that cannot be illustrated from almost any page of any Elizabethan or Jacobean poet. It were well if these plain facts gained general acceptance and Shakespeare were freed from the idolatry of the schools. We should then, among other things, be spared such melancholy occasions as the performance of "Cymbeline" by Mr. Sothorn and Miss Marlowe; Miss Cowl would not venture forth on her Egyptian craft.

It is clear enough what attracted her. Cleopatra is one of Shakespeare's most genuine women. She is extraordinarily feminine. She is scold and queen, great lady and great courtesan, romantic lover and acrid gossip. And that is much. For, contrary to the general opinion, Shakespeare's women are more unreal than his men. Ophelia, Imogen, Viola on the one hand, Portia and Rosalind on the other, are types of womanhood created by an almost adolescent wish. They are either exquisite simpletons or exquisite hoydens. Juliet is an exception; Cleopatra is another. She is Juliet at thirty. This character, especially in the scenes of scolding and jealousy and frank realism—the scene with the messenger, the scene in which Octavia is discussed—Miss Cowl acts delightfully. She is angry and arch and insinuating; she has a lovely liquidness of aspect and fluidity of gesture. In the famous death scene she is inadequate and bewildered. And so she is in the scene with the dying Antony. She makes little of these high and heroic moments. Perhaps she does not quite feel them. And I admit that it is hard to feel them. They are remote. One wonders if people ever acted thus or if this is but an heroic convention. I strongly suspect the latter to be true. And the writing of the dramatist does not help. Oh, yes, he writes divinely. Here are those incomparable words:

O sun,

Burn the great sphere thou movest in! Darkling stand
The varying star of the world;

Here are those others:

No more, but e'en a woman, and commanded
By such poor passion as the maid that milks
And does the meanest chares.

"O si sic omnia!" Alas, they are not. The staple is:

No, let me speak, and let me rail so high,
That the false housewife Fortune break her wheel,
Provoked by my offense.

How forced and frigid that is, how little the speech of any true passion or despair! In the death scene, too, one listens for a half dozen matchless lines and then is "for the dark."

Yet the scenes in which Cleopatra appears, the scenes for the sake of which the production at the Lyceum Theater was undertaken, are by far the most coherent and human of the play. The Roman scenes, whether political, warlike, or festive, are scrappy, disconnected, and wholly lacking in verisimilitude. Shakespeare is, of course, blameless for lacking all sense of historic atmosphere and exactness. It was not of his age. But it was not indeed. These are not Romans; these are neither practical politicians nor warriors. Caesar and Pompey were not ranting euphuists. If this is to be acted, let it be acted as an Elizabethan fantasy. It has nothing to do with atrium or toga or the garb of the legions. No wonder that Mr. Rollo Peters seemed simply an uncomfortable young man with a beard. The emotions were either unreal or thoroughly archaic. The real Antony, we may be sure, didn't think of himself as the "demi-Atlas of the earth," any more than any other first triumphant and then defeated general. Heroic poetry may still be written; the convention of heroic conduct in bed or at board is dead. And when the modesty of nature is constantly offended the players have no choice but to strut and mime until the lights go out.

Russia After Lenin

THE immediate policies of the Soviet Government, following the death of Lenin, are revealed in the following statement by the new chairman of the Council of Peoples' Commissars, A. I. Rykov, published in the Moscow Izvestia on February 9:

A great number of correspondents, both Russian and foreign, have wanted to interview me on the subject of my election to the post of chairman of the Council of People's Commissars and the immediate problems of the foreign and internal policies of the U.S.S.R. It would be impossible to talk to the representative of each paper separately and I shall have to limit myself to the following statement:

It seems to me that the representatives of the press are exaggerating the importance of the appointment of one person or another as the head of the Council of People's Commissars in our republic. For more than six years now the decisive and leading force in the Soviet Republic has been the Communist Party, which assumed the leadership in the October Revolution. This party is still in power.

The peoples of the Union have successfully passed through under the direct leadership of Lenin. Further progress will have to consist in continuing, under conditions that are far more favorable than those of the past six years, the policies which have already been defined.

During these six years I have had the opportunity of being one of Lenin's closest aids in his governmental work. It was on the suggestion of Lenin, more than two years ago, that I was appointed to act in his place in the Council of People's Commissars and in the Council of Labor and Defense. During those periods when his health permitted Lenin to do his work in the councils we have worked together. The main task both of myself and of the councils is to continue the policies which have been determined under the guidance of Lenin.

In questions of internal and foreign policy decisions have been recently adopted by the congresses of the soviets of the allied republics and by the Second Congress of the Soviets of the Union. These decisions will define the policies of the Soviet Government in the immediate future. That unanimity which was demonstrated in the voting at the recent congresses of the soviets bears witness to the fact that the policy of the Government enjoys the fullest support of the whole mass of the laboring elements in the U.S.S.R.

In the field of foreign policies these decisions may be summed up as aiming toward the continuation of peace and the strengthening of the position of the Soviet Union among the nations. The Union of Soviet Republics has never coveted foreign territories and does not want to rule other peoples. But the unsettled conditions in contemporary Europe and the instability of the Versailles peace compel the Soviet Government to keep up the fighting force of the Red Army, at present considerably reduced, in order to be prepared against any assaults.

My election to the post of chairman of the Council of People's Commissars coincided with the recognition of our republic on the part of England. This recognition is of the more value to us since it has been one of the first acts of the new British Government and is an expression of the opinion of the English working masses. I would like to see in this act of recognition a disinterested attempt on the part of the present British Government to find new ways to establish peaceful relations between the peoples of Europe and Asia. . . .

Faith in the stability of the Republic of the Soviets of the Workers', Peasants', and Red Army Deputies on the seventh year of the October Revolution has deeply penetrated the consciousness of Western European society. This creates a basis for the success of business negotiations on mutual differences. Those countries which earlier than the others adopted a sober attitude toward the great revolutionary change in our country have nothing to regret, it seems to me. Our relations with Germany after the treaty of Rapallo have developed with great success and have profited both countries. . . .

The universal sympathy which Soviet Russia enjoys among the peoples of the East and the exceptional popularity of the name of our leader Comrade Lenin among these peoples have been the result of that policy upon which Vladimir Ilyich firmly insisted: disinterested help to and full sympathy with the peoples of the East in their striving for national, cultural, and political regeneration. This policy we shall continue in the future to the fullest extent, and I am certain that it will strengthen our relations with Turkey, China, Persia, Afghanistan, and other nations of the East. In fact, this is only an application to our foreign relations with the nations of the East of that policy of national self-determination which the Soviet Government has always carried out in relation toward the different nationalities composing the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

Within the Union the creation of the Council of Nationalities as one of the supreme organs of our Union will serve as a constitutional guaranty for the observance of the interests of those nationalities which have been most oppressed during the whole period of the history of Czarist Russia. . . .

In the field of internal policy our first task is still the re-establishment and development of our economic life, chiefly in the exchange of goods between the city and village. The development of our exports of agricultural products, the organization of agricultural credits, the increase in plowing, and the general regeneration of our agriculture will raise the purchasing power of the main mass of our population—the peasantry—and will thus insure the growth of industry, the increase of employment, and a rise in the wages of the workers. . . . During the immediate future the greatest attention will be centered upon the further improvement of our budget and monetary exchange. The monetary reform adopted by the Second Congress of the Soviets will stabilize the whole exchange of goods within our country.

During the past year our economic life has been considerably revived by our own efforts, without the participation of foreign capital. The improvement in our relations with the Western European Powers (Germany, England, Italy) may quicken this regeneration through the attraction of Western capital, both in the form of loans and concessions. . . .

The economic bond between the city and village, the union of workers and peasants, is the main slogan for our government machinery. In establishing this bond as well as in defining our policies in regard to taxes, credits, cooperatives, and agriculture, it is necessary to help in every way to improve the condition of the poor peasant who suffers on account of his lack of live stock and plowing land.

The Soviet Congress on British Recognition

THE British note tendering de jure recognition to the Soviet Government was received in the Moscow Foreign Office on February 2, at the time when the Second Congress of the Soviets of the U.S.S.R. was in session. On this occasion the congress adopted the following resolution:

After hearing the communication on the full de jure recognition extended the U.S.S.R. by Great Britain and the establishment of full normal diplomatic relations between the two countries, the Second Congress of the Soviets of the U.S.S.R. notes with satisfaction that this historic act was one of the first steps taken by the first government of England brought forth by the working class.

The Workers' and Peasants' Government of the U.S.S.R., which has been generated by the great revolution, put forth as its prime task the struggle for peace, and during all the time of its existence it has striven persistently toward establishment of normal relations with all peoples. Unfortunately, none of the previous governments of Great Britain came forward to meet the advances of the Government of the U.S.S.R. Moreover, in May last the U.S.S.R. was confronted by English diplomacy with an ultimatum which threatened to sever the commercial relations already existing and which created a direct menace to the peace of Europe.

During all this time the working class of England has been a faithful ally of the laboring masses of the U.S.S.R. in their struggle for peace. The peoples of the U.S.S.R. remember the efforts of the working masses of England and of the liberal part of English society directed toward the lifting of the boycott and blockade and the ending of armed intervention. They are well aware of the fact that the present recognition has come as a result of the persistent will of the English people, which demanded the political recognition of the Soviet Government as an indispensable condition for the firm establishment of universal peace, the reconstruction of world economy destroyed by the imperialist war, and, in particular, for the successful struggle against industrial stagnation and unemployment in England itself.

The peaceful policy of the Soviet Government under the leadership of V. I. Lenin, coupled with the loudly proclaimed will of the English people, has finally brought about the establishment of normal relations between the two countries in a form worthy of the great peoples of both countries and has laid down a basis for their friendly cooperation.

In the strained atmosphere of contemporary international relations, which are pregnant with menaces of new world conflicts and which are holding the laboring population of all countries in a state of natural alarm, this step by the English Labor Government acquires especial importance.

The Second Congress of the Soviets of the U.S.S.R. declares that cooperation between the peoples of Great Britain and the U.S.S.R. will remain one of the prime concerns of the Union Soviet Government, which, in accordance with its expressed peaceful policy, will use every effort toward the settlement of all questions of difference and misunderstandings and toward the development and firm establishment of the economic relations so sorely needed for the economic and political progress of the peoples of both countries and of the whole world.

The Second Congress of the Soviets of the U.S.S.R. extends its friendly brotherly hand to the English people and instructs the Union Government to take before the British Government all the necessary steps following from the fact of the recognition of the Soviet Government.

Italy Recognizes Soviet Russia

THE Moscow press on February 9 carried the following official statement issued by the People's Commissariat of Foreign affairs:

Today, February 8, the acting Commissar of Foreign Affairs, M. Litvinov, received the Italian representative, M. Paterno, who informed him of the de jure recognition of the Soviet Government. Afterward M. Paterno sent Commissar Chicherin the following text of the note of Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs Mussolini addressed on February 7 to Commissar Chicherin:

The Teapot Dome investigation is in a sense an echo of the old conservation fight. The oil in the Wyoming Naval Reserve is a drop in the bucket compared with the energy resources of the country at stake in the development of Giant Power from coal-mine to water-fall.

Giant Power

"Giant power" is a term coined to set off from earlier developments the tremendous projects now forecast in the harnessing of tumbling waters, in burning coal at the mine-mouth and in organizing great interlocking schemes of power transmission.

THE projects raise grave questions of government control, private and public, state and national; questions of monopoly, of offsetting the needs of small consumers and large, the rise or dwindling of great industrial districts. They raise also great human questions.

We know how the common life was upset by the uncontrolled advent of steam-power and the factory system it ushered in. Does Giant Electric Power lift up the hope of overcoming much misery and capturing new leisure, a hope especially of spreading out production, of a recovered village life capable of meeting the cities on even terms?

AMONG the contributors to this issue, brought together by Robert W. Bruère, are Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania, Governor Smith of New York, Joseph Hyde Pratt, director of the North Carolina Geological Economic Survey, Sir Adam Beck, chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, Gerard Swope, president of the General Electric Company, Morris L. Cooke, director of Pennsylvania's Giant Power Survey, and an interview with Secretary Hoover by William Hard.

Henry Ford

is doing something on the River Rouge in the way of water power development which is uneconomic as yet—but it is fascinating. It is the play of a big man with a little river.

FORD began in his boyhood with a water-wheel on the same stream. Now there is the tremendous River Rouge plant of the Ford Motor Company in the Detroit suburbs. Further up the river there is Ford's own home at Dearborn with Dam No. 1 and his pond stocked with fish. Above, the stream grows smaller and here and there on old mill sites, some of them unused for half a century, Henry Ford is putting up new dams, modern turbines and small factory buildings. To these he is transferring tiny departments from his great Highland Park plant.

Whatever else can be said about Ford, he clings to an idea until he has squeezed it dry.

An interview with Henry Ford on his River Rouge Experiment will be just one of the features of the special number of Survey Graphic on Giant Power.

M. PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR:

You know that ever since I took the government into my hands it has been my desire to accomplish the reestablishment of political relations between the two countries, considering these of great importance both in the interests of the two countries as well as in the general interests of Europe.

I am therefore gratified that the Italo-Russian commercial treaty has been signed today. I am happy to inform you on this occasion that in accordance with the statement made in my speech of November 30, 1923, before the Chamber of Deputies and in my speech at the close of the conference on the afore-named treaty which took place January 31, 1924, since the treaty has been shaped I consider the question of the de jure recognition of the Government of the U.S.S.R. by Italy as settled.

The Italian Government has therefore given an unreserved order to appoint a royal ambassador to the Government of the Union and it therefore considers that from this day, February 7, 1924, the political relations between the two countries are finally and firmly established.

I am certain that this day may be marked as the beginning of a new and fruitful era of cooperation between the two states in their mutual interests and I ask you, M. People's Commissar, to accept my deepest respect.

The Bulgarian Reaction

THE right of asylum for political refugees is in imminent danger of being violated by the Turkish Government in connection with the Bulgarian refugees who crossed the border after the failure of the September uprising against the military dictatorship now ruling Bulgaria. The Turkish Government has threatened to accede to the demand of the Bulgarian Government to deliver these refugees up to Bulgarian justice on the ground that the refugees are not political but common offenders. In protest against this intention, the Bulgarian Foreign Aid Committee, organized in Vienna on behalf of the victims of the uprisings in Bulgaria of June and September, has issued the following manifesto:

The disregard by the Turkish Government of the right of asylum for political emigrants (which is recognized by all civilized countries) cannot be justified on the ground that the Bulgarian Government claims that in this case the offenders are not political but common offenders. There is no need to prove to a neighboring country like Turkey that the Bulgarian refugees there—workers, peasants, and intellectuals—are no common offenders but courageous sons of the people, who rebelled in September of this year against the usurpers governing Bulgaria, and who fought and will continue to fight for national independence, for peaceful relations with its neighbors, and for freedom. The Government of New Turkey, many members and workers of which were often forced under the old regime to seek asylum in other countries, can easily understand what the refusal of this right would mean for the refugees.

The Bulgarian Foreign Aid Committee voices its protest to the Turkish Government as well as to public opinion throughout Europe against the attempt to deliver into the hands of their executioners those who took part in the September uprising in Bulgaria and who are now on Turkish soil. It expects the Turkish Government immediately to withdraw its order and extend the right of asylum to the Bulgarian refugees or give them the opportunity to go to Russia, where the people will welcome them with open arms and brotherly sympathy.

The Hamburg-American Line, when planning this magnificent vessel, drew upon their long experience as the builders of the world's greatest ocean liners, in order to achieve the highest in beauty, comfort and efficiency. Among other important mechanical features is a new anti-rolling device which is an advance on anything yet applied to merchant ships.

The Deutschland is an oilburner of 22,000 tons, and carries first, second and third class passengers. Her facilities for the traveler's convenience and pleasure include spacious social parlors, smoking room, grill room, children's room, verandah cafe, gymnasium, elevators, suites and staterooms designed and equipped in the most modern manner. The Hamburg-American service and cuisine are world-famous.

(Austria), came to our village with his brother, Ivan Gentshev, an officer. Fifteen cutthroats from Philipopol met them here. All day long this gang drank with the Gentshev brothers in Felo Popov's house and continually threatened that when they were through with drinking wine they would drink blood. Toward 7 p.m. they loaded thirteen peasants, among them your brother Petko, upon a truck and drove them to Philipopol. We begged them to transport the men during the day, but were ordered to keep quiet at the points of bayonets. The commandant forbade anyone to leave the village and the truck drove off to the accompaniment of the screams and cries of the children.

Days went by and we knew nothing of the fate of the arrested men until this terrible news came: When the truck arrived near the mill between Kurtev and Kara-Kai, the chauffeur said that there was something wrong with the motor; that he could not proceed. The ruffians cried out: "That fat one should get off." Your brother was torn from the truck and tortured and maltreated in the most frightful manner. After they stabbed him fifty times with a knife, they crushed his head. Nikola was killed in the same manner. The rest of them fled, but three of them were shot. This sad news soon spread and put the whole village into a state of great agitation. At 7 p.m. the truck was returned with the naked, mutilated corpses. The commandant ordered us to have them dressed by 8 o'clock the following morning. At 3 o'clock the funeral took place. The investigation committee we asked for did not materialize.

When you get this letter, write immediately to your brother in America that he should give the facts to the newspapers. Do everything you can to give these facts the widest publicity in the German and English press. The whole world should know that Bulgaria is being ruled by beasts. Real human beings are living in Western Europe who will understand our cry for help. They will hear the crying of thousands of children who will have neither home nor bread when winter comes. In the name of thousands of parents, widows, and orphans, in the name of the whole people, we demand that our Government be brought to account for causing innocent blood to flow.

The Annual
Mid-European Number

New tales of German prosperity, more fantastic than ever, have sprung up since the currency reform. Hard as it is to measure economic conditions today, The Nation is in a position to get the facts. The Mid-European Number will answer your questions and your friends' questions about how people actually live in Germany today. There will be articles on all sides of German life, on Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, and Hungary.

WE ARE NOT INTERESTED in scapegoats. Thus we are only mildly interested that Charles R. Forbes, formerly director of the Veterans' Bureau, and John W. Thompson, a Western contractor, have been indicted for their part in misusing the funds intended to compensate or relieve our war victims. We are not even greatly interested in the statement of the grand jury that two members of Congress are implicated in the scandal or in the probability that court proceedings will reveal worse abuses than the inquiry of the Senate committee. We have no liking for filth, and when we call attention to it—as we have done repeatedly in connection with the Veterans' Bureau—our purpose is to quicken the average American to a sense of the dishonesty and futility of our existing political system even when dealing with the most sacred national obligations. Poor, pitiful, weak-souled Forbes and his shameless associates should be punished, no doubt, in the normal process of justice, but the only thing of lasting importance is that we should find our way through this mire to a little higher and firmer ground. We are infinitely less concerned with Forbes, who is out, than with Hines, who bears today the responsibility that Forbes abused. And most of all we are concerned that the disgust of decent Americans shall wean them from their allegiance to old-party politics to the extent of choosing hereafter the hopeful untried in preference to that which has been too long tolerated.

FIVE YEARS OF MADNESS is bearing fruit in France. The franc, which stood almost at par after the armistice, and was still worth seven and a half cents fifteen months ago when the French regiments assembled to march into the Ruhr, has fallen to three and one-half cents. There are rumors of an Anglo-American loan to safeguard it; such measures can only postpone a further collapse unless a fundamentally new orientation is given to French policy. It is nonsense for French politicians to cry out that their currency is the victim of an international plot. France has indeed a sound economic structure with her large and prosperous peasantry. But nothing can save the franc if the Government continues to squander hundreds of millions in military loans for the nations of Central Europe and to pour more millions into the pockets of speculators under the guise of "reconstruction," making no provision for such expenses in the budget, and staking all hope of stabilization upon the dream of impossible billions from Germany.

TIME WAS WHEN RELIGION dominated politics, but today politics dominates religion—even in the Moslem world. The Republic of Turkey has abolished the caliphate, and thereby demonstrated that it has more power in its own world than the bolsheviks in Russia or than the lay kingdom ever had in Italy. The action is comparable to an abolition of the papacy or of the patriarchate of the Eastern Church. Apparently the attachment of the Moslem world to its caliphate is regarded in Angora as such another myth as the famous "jihad," the terrible holy war which, when proclaimed by the Sultan, was to mean the collapse of the British and French rule over Moslem countries. The much touted unity of the Moslem world has seldom showed itself in action in recent years except in the "caliphate" agitation in India three years ago, when the injustice done to holy Turkey by the Treaty of Sèvres proved so powerful a slogan in stirring the Moslems of India to join the Hindus in demanding independence. After all, the Koran itself prescribes no caliph, and the Turkish line which has held the title for four centuries has done so only by right of conquest. The foreign offices of Great Britain and of France seem to have been more stirred by the announcement than the Mohammedans themselves; if France is determined that her Moslem subjects shall call her puppet sultan of Morocco caliph there may be a pretty struggle with the British influences which have proclaimed that Hussein, the puppet king of the Hedjaz, shall bear the title abolished by the Turks.

POSSIBLY THE WHALE spoke feelingly to Jonah on the danger of his being swallowed by some large fish—that was Mr. Heywood Broun's pertinent comment on President Coolidge's devout assurance that it was primarily our concern for the Filipinos which led us to insist upon maintaining them in tutelage. Mr. Coolidge, to be sure, found another excuse: that the Filipinos had not yet had sufficient training for self-government. It appeared that some Filipino officials had not conducted themselves in office quite as they should. It must have been a little difficult even for such a Yankee as Mr. Coolidge to get through that reference without winking a large wink in the general direction of the Senate committee investigating the oil leases.

ANOTHER GUNBOAT, the third, has been sent to Honduras, we note from a Washington dispatch dated March 10. We italicize "Washington dispatch" because we wonder if our readers have observed that all the news in regard to the disturbance in Honduras, and our interference in it, has been emanating from Washington—and from the State Department. There is almost no news from Honduras direct, either by correspondents of the Associated Press or of individual newspapers. Such correspondents, as every sophisticated newspaper reader knows, are all too prone to take the official view, but they occasionally telegraph a fact or so that lets the cat out of the bag. As long as our news from Central America is all in the form of canned paragraphs from the State Department we are certain to find crying need of intervention on behalf of "American interests" and subsequent assurances that, however many natives we have killed, our efforts have been successful in "averting bloodshed."

THE FOREMOST REASON for the financial misfortunes of farmers in the upper Mississippi Valley, it is well understood, is the reduced demand for wheat, with the consequent fall in its price. The Secretary of Agriculture, Henry C. Wallace, reporting on this situation, sees little chance of increased consumption. He notes that Europe is not using as much wheat as before the war, while the prospect of a larger nearby supply is increasing through the agricultural revival in Russia. Not only is Europe unlikely to be importing more wheat, but we are using less ourselves than before the war. Mr. Wallace thinks this is due to the fact that during the war many public eating-places began for the first time to charge for bread, a custom they have since continued, thus reducing the consumption. Even more important than this, we imagine, is the fact that many persons learned during the war to use other grain than wheat for bread and other food in place of bread. Mr. Wallace recommends, by way of relief for the distressed farmers of the wheat-growing regions, government assistance through credits and lower freight rates, but his facts indicate that the world needs to reduce its production of wheat.

IT DOES SEEM a pity to reduce the world's output of wheat at a time when thousands of persons are going hungry, but unless there is some way of bringing the two together—and there appears to be none now except on a charity basis—we have no alternative. Mr. Wallace estimates the world wheat crop for 1923, outside of Russia, at 3,400,000,000 bushels. This exceeds the production of the previous year by 300,000,000 bushels and the pre-war average, also excluding Russia, by 500,000,000 bushels. Besides, newer countries with cheaper land, like Argentina, Australia, and Canada, are edging the United States more and more out of the international wheat market. The hope of stimulating domestic consumption is illusory, even if desirable. In the long run people eat what they like and can afford, despite drives and advertisers' slogans. There is a natural sequence in farming. On new, cheap land sheep usually come first; then cattle for beef; then grain; then dairying; and finally intensive cultivation of fruits and vegetables. It is time for farmers in the wheat regions to consider a change to dairying or diversified crops.

SO MANY PERSONS rose to protest at the announcement that, owing to increased immigration, aliens coming second-class as well as third-class would have to go to Ellis Island for examination instead of going through the process aboard ship that the order was revoked. Why so much emotion? The order had only one defect: it ought to have included first-class passengers. For many years persons having money enough to afford first or second-class tickets have been able to save hours and days of time and to escape manifold indignity and hardship. What is sauce for the poor should be sauce for the rich. There is no excuse in law or justice for the discrimination so long practiced. Besides, if our English lecturers and Italian prima donnas and French counts had to pass through Ellis Island a few times, there would be a hullabaloo sufficient to bring some much needed changes in short order.

IN HOMESTEAD, a suburb of Pittsburgh, a Negro broke into a house, was chased by the owner, and escaped. The next day the police arrested thirty Negro suspects. At least twenty-nine of them must have been innocent, yet "each," according to the Pittsburgh News, "was sentenced to serve thirty days in the workhouse by Burgess Cavanaugh." In Kansas City, Missouri, the Irving Pitt Manufacturing Company was robbed of $13,000. The police took into custody three black men, and after ten hours of "examination" announced that they had obtained detailed, though contradictory confessions from all three. Their attorney, according to the Chicago Daily Worker, obtained their release on habeas corpus writs only after some delay. "All three had been pulped and kicked, their ears torn, their bodies marked from shoulders to knees by the rubber hose. They were examined by the doctor, who at once ordered Ramsay [one of the three] to the hospital." The judge had a different idea of the proper role of the police and called the matter to the attention of the grand jury. One police official resigned, one fled to Porto Rico, and the city detective could not be found—his resignation arrived by mail. Finally, the real robbers, caught in a shooting scrape in East Chicago, confessed. The police chief, when interviewed, remarked aggrievedly: "An innocent man, if he were any sort of a sport, would be willing to suffer that punishment of the guilty might be rendered easy."

SEVEN PROTESTANT DENOMINATIONS—Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Baptist, Universalist, Unitarian, Lutheran—and two shades of Jewish faith participated actively through their ministers and rabbis in the New York State Birth Control Conference at Syracuse. An audience even larger than those which thronged the sessions was reached when Mrs. Sanger broadcasted the first address on birth control ever transmitted by radio in America. One hundred physicians attended the meeting for members of the profession, and a birth-control clinic for Syracuse is an immediate probability. Thus the attempt to stop discussion of this vital subject served, as in the case of a similar effort at the Town Hall in New York City a year ago, to give a vigorous impulse to the movement.

IN COMMON with the National Woman's Party, which is introducing a series of "equality bills" in the various State legislatures, we believe that women should "own their labor in or out of the home." We suspect that most women find the endless domestic drudgery, the necessity of depending on the amiable impulses of a man for any recognition beyond a bare living, very wearying to the spirit. But we suspect also that most women, like most men, are so bound by the customs and mental habits of generations that any drastic remedy of their domestic slavery will be a shock. People can learn to absorb shocks, but it takes time. Peter the Great faced something like a revolution when he ordered Russian women to face the world unveiled; but in the last few hundred years they have successfully caught up with and passed their Western sisters. It need not take as long as that for women to learn to demand the economic value of their home labor. But in the years of adjustment certain difficulties must be got over. If a husband pays wages he becomes an employer—the boss of the shop—and will be in a position to dictate hours and standards. Under our present haphazard and unjust system women are fairly free in their own domain to work or shirk as they please. If women decide to exchange this status for a wage and a boss, they must face the implications of this change. They must organize in unions to protect their working conditions and to win a living wage. They must learn to dissociate the loving husband and the recalcitrant boss. Can these things be achieved within the rather narrow limits of human instincts and emotions? We advise those married women with an uncontrollable yearning for domestic labor to go and do it in some other man's home.

THE struggle between the Actors' Equity Association and the Producing Managers' Association, which may result in a temporary closing of the New York theaters when, on June 1, the present contracts expire, is on its economic side a perfectly conventional conflict between masters and men. What gives it a keenly humorous interest is the priceless argument of the managers that the noble art of acting shall not be contaminated by trade unionism or affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. The spectacle of Messrs. Erlanger, Dillingham and Ziegfeld, Brady, Henry Miller, Klaw, Wages, Hals and Kemper, of Mr. George White, who produces only the "Scandals," of Mr. Broadhurst, and of Mr. Golden, who does the sweet, pure, all-American plays—the spectacle of these gentlemen passionately concerned over Art and the dignity of its devotees is one of uncommon gaiety. "The theater is not a shop. It represents an art!" exclaims Mr. Belasco. How noble that sounds. Mr. Frank Gillmore of the Equity Association can indulge in no such swelling words. He is obliged, though an artist himself, to speak of "jumping contracts" and "bogus managers" and other ills from which the union has protected the actor. A little economic security, a little assurance that the laborer will get his hire may not be a bad thing even for art.

MIGUEL DE UNAMUNO is to be deported from Spain. A man of courage and appalling activity, a poet, critic, novelist, dramatist, professor, he has but one subject—man and the duel between man's reason and his faith.

Though his reputation in the Spanish-speaking world is as a writer and philosopher, in Spain itself, with magnificent arrogance, he has made himself a storm-center by his attacks on the Government. Since Spain was put under the spurred heel of the Rivera dictatorship Unamuno has been one of the few who have dared to protest. The parody of the civil movement of the Italian Fascists, staged in Spain by a coterie of soldiers, was primarily intended to conceal the responsibility of the Crown and of its military advisers for the Moroccan disasters. They tried, by diverting public attention, to load the Spanish politician with all the sins of the African campaign, to muzzle the proposed parliamentary investigation into the frauds and criminal neglect of the Moorish war, to silence the press by censorship. Unamuno raised his voice to accuse, to point out those responsible, including the King himself. He exposed with biting sarcasm the sad comedy of the attempt to ape Mussolini with a barrack coup. Now he is condemned to exile. No longer young, Unamuno is about to leave Spain and his chair in the University of Salamanca.

NO OTHER MARCH LITERATURE is so fascinating as the seed catalogues. A cover of flaming marigold is for a month more universally appealing than the customary pretty-girl wrapper, a pictured basket of sweet corn and melons more alluring than a curve of palm-bordered South Sea beach. How, when the snow is melting and the ground thawing, can Sinclair Lewis or Edith Wharton compete with Peter Henderson or with Vaughan's "Gardening Illustrated, 1924"? Your true farmer planned his crops long ago; but it takes a barrel-organ, a rope-skipping girl, and a crowd of boys playing marbles on the sidewalk to concentrate the thoughts of the suburbanite or city-dweller upon his backyard or his window-box. Then comes the thrill which only the gardener with little space can know; the man with large acres can never dream so wistfully as the farmer of a window-box or a row in the yard. The man with six square feet to plant knows the eagerness of the two-weeks vacationer, a closed book to those who winter in Florida and summer in Europe. The proud grower of a new dahlia or a new French salad may rate his triumph high; it is as nothing compared with the glow of victory in the breast of the New Yorker who produces radishes where there seemed naught but cinders and ashes.

SEED-CATALOGUE WRITERS are beginning to learn the art of P. T. Barnum. There was a time when pansies seemed adequately described as "of clear color and persistent bloom." Today we read something like this: "Cedarstrom's Giant Orchid-flowered Butterfly Pansies are world-famous for their superb spread, elegant form, careless freedom of growth, fiery diversity of color and tone, and for the persistence of the bold, velvety blossoms through summer heat and autumn cold. The late Theophilus Cedarstrom sent scouts to scour seven continents to build this race of super-pansies." Hollyhocks no longer grow in spikes; they are "mammoth candelabra." Even the turnip almost becomes a "succulent bulb." Why not? The visitor to Barnum's circus, if he did not see what the posters had pictured, got his money's worth, and the gardener, even if his crop fail, is sure of surprises for which he did not bargain. The seed catalogue, for all its mouth-filling phrases, can never equal the thrill of the first green shoot that pierces the ground.

President Calvin Coolidge

THE President of the United States, holding the highest office in the world, cannot escape his share of critical attention. So far as the public has learned his energies have been directed chiefly to the protection of men in whom the nation had lost confidence. There is no suspicion that he has made money out of oil; but he has put his trust in a corrupt gang, and instead of protecting the people from them he has sought to protect them from the people. When at last public opinion forced him to name special prosecutors to do the work which his discredited Attorney General could not do he named a succession of corporation lawyers, some of whom held retainers from the oil companies and all of whom were of that type. The Senate rejected some of his appointees; in those whom it has confirmed the public has little faith. They may be honest men; that is not enough. They are not men whose names give confidence that they will hew tirelessly to the line, let the chips fall where they may. Yet America is not without men—like Frank P. Walsh, Gilbert E. Roe, Samuel Untermyer, Morris Hillquit, Francis Heney, Clarence Darrow—whose names would give such confidence.

Unless the Republican Party is desirous of committing suicide it will not renominate Calvin Coolidge. It did not nominate President Arthur at the conclusion of his accidental service as President; it never occurred to it that no one but Mr. Arthur could uphold the standard of the party in the campaign of 1884. To maintain, as so many do, that Mr. Coolidge must be nominated merely because he is the incumbent is preposterous. The favorable votes of party conventions in Minnesota and Iowa mean little. When the national convention is at hand the Republicans will hardly court deliberate defeat by selecting this man whose whole record shows that he is grossly inadequate to the tasks to which he has fallen heir, who has failed utterly to rise to the need of the hour, and at this writing stands convicted by his own telegrams of being a cordial friend of the group which is responsible for the existing shame of the republic. We do not mean to insinuate that he has connived deliberately at wrongdoing. But there is no escaping the fact that he has shown the grossest misunderstanding of the gravity of the situation. A man able and willing to continue to associate on friendly terms with Mr. McLean after his confession that he had deceived the senators investigating the oil transaction is obviously unfitted for the office of President. Mr. Lodge would have served Mr. Coolidge, their party, and the country better if instead of defending the President he had frankly stated it as his opinion that Mr. Coolidge would do well to retire from the Presidency.

A campaign is under way to whitewash Mr. Coolidge. He has been hysterically and unjustly attacked, we are told; the abuse of him in the Senate and in the press is unfair and unwarranted. Let us, therefore, set down without color the facts concerning him which have appeared in the record. They have been scattered and need assembling.

The President had appointed as his secretary an ex-Representative, a merchant of postmasterships who had sold appointments for contributions to the party treasury. Just as the oil inquiry began to reach the front pages, on December 22, this secretary left Washington for Palm Beach, Florida, where he lunched, dined, and golfed with Mr. Mc-Lean, publisher of the Washington Post, with whom Mr. Fall was taking his meals. McLean had deceived the Senate committee investigating the oil scandals, leading them to believe that he had lent Mr. Fall $100,000 with which to buy a ranch—the $100,000 which, as was later learned, had really been “lent,” in a satchel, by Mr. Doheny. The White House doorman notified Mr. McLean by telegram that Mr. Slemp was leaving. So did John Major, Mr. McLean’s confidential assistant, who simultaneously suggested the installation of a private leased wire, which, he said, would give McLean “easy and quick access to the White House.” Mr. Slemp later took the stand and told the Senate committee that he had gone South for rest and recreation and had hardly mentioned oil to Mr. McLean or to Mr. Fall.

The private wire was installed on January 3, and the White House telegrapher was put in charge of it. Messages sent on this private wire of Mr. McLean’s by Mr. Coolidge’s telegrapher were sent in a Department of Justice code—not an “obsolete code,” but one still in use, as Mr. Burns testified, though replaced in extremely confidential matters by a newer code. Over this wire went the message, on January 29, informing Mr. McLean that the “principal” had said there would be “no rocking of the boat and no resignations.” This was just two days after Mr. Coolidge’s midnight statement announcing that he would appoint special counsel to prosecute. Over this private wire had gone advance notice of Senator Walsh’s departure to examine Mr. McLean in Palm Beach. The day after Senator Walsh led Mr. McLean, under oath, to admit that he had deceived the committee in Washington, President Coolidge telegraphed McLean from the White House: “Prescott is away. Advise Slemp with whom I shall confer. Acknowledge.” This, he now explains, referred to local politics in the District of Columbia; the significant point in any case is that, as Senator Lodge stated in his official explanation, the President did not know how to reach his own secretary except through McLean. He knew at least that Slemp would be in constant touch with him. A month later President Coolidge still retained his regard for McLean. It was on February 12 that he wired: “Thank you for your message. You have always been most considerate. Mrs. Coolidge joins me in kindest regards to you and Mrs. McLean.” When this telegram was published on March 6 the White House hastily explained that it was a reply to congratulations upon the President’s Lincoln’s Birthday speech. Study revealed that it had been sent at 10:17 a.m.—eleven or twelve hours before the speech. The White House then explained that further examination of the files revealed that it was a reply (a very prompt reply) to congratulations on the President’s statement, made on the previous evening, in reply to the Senate’s demand that Mr. Denby be ousted.

That is the record. It convicts the President of no crime. It does show him maintaining, secretly and persistently, intimate relations with a corrupt group. Messrs. Fall and McLean were constantly conferring on ways of hiding their corrupt tracks, and this was known to the country and to Mr. Coolidge when his secretary went to Palm Beach, as when the President consulted McLean upon politics in the District of Columbia, lent him his confidential telegrapher, and sent him cordial telegrams.

The President could have given us at least one ringing declaration of his sense of outrage, both that he should find himself in so humiliating a position and that the country should be subjected to this unutterable disgrace. He could have put every department at the service of the committee instead of letting them stand aloof. He could have said to the American people: "I see that in my faith in my associates of Mr. Harding's Cabinet I have been deceived. I shall leave no stone unturned to set my own house in order without a moment's delay. I shall not only punish the guilty; I shall make a clean sweep. Above all, I shall dissociate myself absolutely from all who have been tarnished by the disclosures."

What did the President do? Nothing of the kind. His promises of punishing wrongdoers have been as perfunctory as it was possible to make them. He accepted the kind congratulations of Mr. McLean upon his refusal to demand the resignation of Mr. Denby in response to the request of Congress. It is no wonder that Senator Heflin asks: "Who is McLean? Is he the head of the Republican Party now, its chief spokesman?" Well, the best that Mr. Lodge could do was to say: "I am not discussing Mr. McLean's character, but he was known to the President and it was a very natural way of reaching Mr. Slemp if he were still in Florida." To us it seems the most unnatural way possible. He should have used the Secret Service, the telegraph companies, and all the federal officeholders in Florida, if necessary to locate Mr. Slemp, before applying to McLean. From the beginning of this scandal the President has shown himself pitifully small, pitifully inadequate, pitifully lacking in that fine sense of honor which the American people have the right to expect of any man they put in the White House.

Explanations are needed. The fact that a man holds high office is no justification for silence. We know that Senators Smoot and Lenroot, members of the investigating committee, have actually used their position to confer with the guilty instead of to expose them. The facts on the record justify suspicion that Mr. Coolidge has slipped into the same policy of protection. In any case he owes the country a full explanation.

The New Masters of Europe

CURRENT revolutions—and counter-revolutions—on the Continent pass almost unnoticed. The historians note the dates of Germany's constitutions; they may record as even more significant the date when the German Reichstag voluntarily surrendered its parliamentary power to a dictatorship. There were no parades in Germany, but the event was as portentous and as discouraging as the advent of Mussolini in Italy or of Primo de Rivera in Spain. Equally striking is the near-abdication of the French Parliament. A year ago Poincaré rode rough-shod over the deputies and forced them to pass a budget without discussion—a budget which, duplicating the preceding year's, obviously would require extensive modification. This year he has again forced through a sort of blanket authority, the new tax measures including (in addition to the 20 per cent increase in all taxes, the 50 per cent jump in railroad rates, and similar explicit measures) a general authorization to the Government to make measures of economy by decree.

This decay of parliamentarism is an often-observed phenomenon. We recently quoted a bank circular which seemed to welcome the trend and remarked: "After all, the most important service of government is that of maintaining order and protecting industry and private business." The important question to ask is just that: Whom do these dictatorships serve? When the bulwark of parliamentary control is gone does business rule absolute, and what happens to the plain people? The answer lies in such scantily recorded phenomena as the gradual loss of the eight-hour day in Germany, the substitution of the eight-hour day in the mines for the seven-hour day won in 1919, the manner in which wages have lagged behind prices as the cost of living rose in all the countries of Europe. Personal military dictatorships such as that of Rivera in Spain are of far less significance than the forces behind Chancellor Marx in Germany or Poincaré in France. No one any longer attributes much importance to the positions which may be taken by the various political parties which nominally rule Germany through the Reichstag. The attitude of the leaders of business determines the attitude of Germany. Such a dispatch as the following (to the New York Times) tells a significant tale:

BERLIN, Feb. 22.—The Government gave the Reichstag to understand this morning that if any attempt is made to annul any of the special rules and regulations decreed by the Government while the country was under martial law the Reichstag will immediately be dissolved.

Another dispatch, which may have been mistaken, is no less significant as illustrating the trend of thought. The New York World's Paris correspondent reports:

I learn from a trustworthy source that the Comité des Forges, union of the great French ironmasters, has made a dramatic reentry on the political scene after lurking in the background for several months.

One of the most prominent members of the ironmasters' ring, former Ambassador Laurent, a close personal friend of President Millerand, has conveyed to the highest quarters the belief that "France can only emerge from the industrial crisis threatening by suspending the constitution and establishing a dictatorship in the Italian manner."

Austria has been taken in hand, under the auspices of the League of Nations, by a Dutch financier acting essentially in behalf of the international bankers who raised the Austrian loan. Hungary, too, is going under the wing of international finance. The expert commission which has been studying Germany's finances is expected to make proposals which would similarly involve a transfer of Germany's essential assets. In these cases power passes, not to a group of foreign governments, but to a group of foreign financiers.

In this gradual transfer of power from the political governments of Europe, controlled to a greater or less degree by the peoples of the respective countries, to financiers utterly divorced from such control, lies perhaps the most significant current in present-day Europe. It is not a healthy current; it cannot be permanent, and it is not likely to be turned back without some rather violent measures. And the most important question for America to consider, in determining the help which we will give Europe, is the question as to how far we will help strangle European democracy, or will assist Ramsay MacDonald in promoting a return to sanity.

IF it is hard to name the baby—and it is said to be—in a way satisfying and adequate from the standpoint of all its parents, grandparents, godparents, fosterparents, and miscellaneous relatives, how much more difficult must it be rightly to name a ship! For, whereas babies are at the most merely human, ships (as every sailor knows) are at least superhuman. And while a misnamed infant may later on change and repair the mischief that has been done him, a ship (no matter how noble) has to await the initiative of some poor human.

Once upon a time the names of ships were bestowed by their builders or their captains or at least by merchant owners with a knowledge of and a keen respect for their craft and the sea. Now the selection of names for ships is largely left to office-chair managers, boards of directors, and other persons whose acquaintance with the sea is by way of an occasional six-day transatlantic trip passed mostly in the smoking-room or in front of the bar. The result, inevitably, is a tendency toward the conventional, a search for names that are safe, sane, and sound rather than beautiful, symbolic, or personal. Under the old method there were some ludicrous results but there were also some inspired ones. Now places or persons seem to be the safest bet, and in any list of arrivals and sailings one finds a preponderance of names like Maracaibo, Rotterdam, Asia, President Monroe, or General W. C. Gorgas—a list of names eminently suited to dining-cars but carrying no inkling of the hazards, the possibilities, or the poetry of the sea.

The height of inept nomenclature was reached during the war, says C. Fox Smith in "Sailor Town Days," when rapid construction and a hysterical mentality led to absurdities as notable as those when ships were named in a more personal way, but to none of the compensating successes of that earlier period. Take, for instance, the series of ships in England with the prefix "War." The War Spear and the War Sword were not so bad, but what shall one say of the War Beryl and, finally, the War Fig? "War Fig!" sniffs Fox Smith, with legitimate contempt. "What possible connection is there between figs and ships, except in the capacity of a cargo; and even if Fig be conceded, then why on earth War Fig? What is a War Fig, and why is a War Fig different from a Peace Fig, or for the matter of that a Pre-War Fig?" Equally bad were some of the names bestowed upon American standard ships built in our war haste and waste: the Lake Gravity and the Lake Frugality, for example, which might as well have been accompanied by a Lake Prohibition or a Lake Sobriety.

Let us turn back to earlier eras. There was spirit in the names of ships like Fiery Cross and Hotspur, Pride of the West and Great Republic, Aventurier, Sovereign of the Seas, Challenger, or Dreadnought. There was beauty of name as well as of line in those English-built China-tea ships, the Ariel, the Lothair, and the Sir Launcelot. What imagination is not touched by recalling the Sea Witch, Trade's Increase, Chariot of Fame Neptune's Car, or even Cognac Packet; or by the bare mention of the old whaler Truelove, the New World, the Hope, the Bombay Castle, the Cornish Belle, or the Flying Cloud?

And as for us, we would take passage any day for any place on the Star of Peace, the Golden Hynde, or the Jesus of Lubeck.

Art and Artifice

WHAT, despite so much talent and preoccupation and earnestness, makes the field of contemporary letters often a little wearying is the absence of what our ancestors used to call afflatus. We are well aware of the sins and follies that were committed in the name of that quality of which the "inspirational appeal" of the Chautauqua lecturer is today's stale and nauseating residuum. When you read an introduction to the works of Milton once written by so good and able a man as William Ellery Channing, you become wary enough of emphasizing the importance of afflatus.

The reaction against that manner was strong and has been permanent. Yet if thoughts do not breathe, words will not burn, and the most skilful writer, if he does not write primarily to relieve his own mind, will end by wearying the minds he addresses. A writer who is intent primarily on what he must say need not by any means trail singing robes or indulge in solemn gestures. Neither Swift nor Voltaire, neither Lessing nor Nietzsche, neither Hazlitt nor Thoreau can be accused of being soggy with their "message" or of writing ill. Yet it is patently true of them all that they wrote in order to communicate thoughts which they held to be of the highest practical or philosophical importance to mankind, and polished and perfected their media merely as methods of communication between themselves and a world that needed them.

Now in a good deal of contemporary writing in English we miss the sense of the writer's inner necessity for writing at all. We miss that very often where protests are loudest and find it occasionally where no protest exists. Mr. Sinclair Lewis and Mr. Edgar Lee Masters, for example, are such satisfactory writers because they have the modern, sober, unobtrusive equivalent of what was once called afflatus. They are tremendously anxious to say their say and entirely convinced of the importance of the result. Mr. Waldo Frank, on the other hand, seems to experiment in a dim region between form and formlessness of both thought and technique and thus we get no impact from his notable talent at all. Mr. Hergesheimer, to take a different kind of example, seems ashamed of having anything to say, avoids earnestness like a solecism, and drifts back into the decorative with the sense of having both socially and artistically done the right thing.

Now perhaps the main difference between art and artifice, using the latter word on a rather high plane, is somehow involved in the distinction we have been trying to make. It is a distinction that exists in other arts as well. Nothing is beautiful in architecture that does not serve to uphold the structure it adorns; a utensil is not comely that was not made for use. Literature is, in this respect, the most responsible of the arts. Artifice may glitter for a day; it is passionate thought that knows the morning of immortality. Many of our writers today connect this doctrine with the mood of professional reformers or "spellbinders." To all such we commend Remy de Gourmont's great essay on style. Gourmont, of all men, can hardly be thought of as an inspiration monger. Yet in that essay he declared the final truth to be this, that works well thought out are always well written, and that a curious or a beautiful style built around an insufficient substance will, like a powerful parasite wrapping a feeble tree, finally crash with the rottenness of what it feigns to support.

Six New Republics in Central Europe

By EMIL LENGYEL

FIVE years ago six constituent assemblies were feverishly at work in Central Europe preparing to give legislative certificates of birth to six countries which had come into existence a few months previously. National constitutions in the making were resplendent with high-sounding assertions of inalienable human rights; vows were uttered to make each country the standard-bearer of unadulterated democracy; parties scrambled for strategic positions; "special interests" made friendly overtures to the new rulers. Groups which had formerly been irredentist nationalities celebrated their newly won independence and filled the air with songs of liberty. The tyrants were in flight or prostrate in the dust. Verily, a new golden age seemed to be near at hand.

The six countries which were established in the central parts of Europe occupy an almost contiguous territory spreading from the Arctic regions down to the Danube. Fifty-one million people are living on this territory, which covers 325 thousand square miles. The six nations which inhabit it have hardly anything in common except the memory of their sufferings in the bondage of alien oppressors. Most of them come from different racial ancestries. Their traditions and history as well as their languages are different.

Czecho-Slovakia, although her size is rather moderate and the number of her inhabitants does not exceed thirteen million, occupies a unique position among the six new republics. The land of the Czechs is a thoroughly Westernized country, a projection of Slavdom into Western civilization. It was already a highly rated country when it lost its independence in the battle at the White Mountains, at a time when Russia, to quote a contemporary, was still a "semi-barbaric giant."

Poland of the preindependence times held the record as numerically the greatest irredentist country of all ages. Even at present her twenty-six million citizens outnumber the population of all the other new states taken together. Its culture is characteristically Eastern European, with an intermixture of Prussianism and the Austrianism of the Vienna Court in the upper social strata of what formerly were the Polish holdings of Germany and Austria. Poland's fate was all the more pathetic because her territory had been torn to pieces and distributed between three Powers. Of these, Czarism and its break-or-bend system was more oppressive and provocative to revolutionary outbreaks than either the policy of absorption of Bismarck or the benevolent autocracy of the Hapsburgs.

The history of Lithuania, Latvia, and Esthonia, the three Baltic states, was inconspicuous prior to the declaration of their independence. St. Petersburg had choked them into such complete submission that the world could not hear their protestations. In crushing their independence the czars were aided by the local land-owning German barons who for centuries had held the Baltic provinces in fief. It is all the more remarkable that notwithstanding this tremendous pressure all three countries had preserved their distinct nationality and their language, which, in Lithuania and Latvia, is a version of ancient Sanskrit and in Esthonia a Finnish-Ugor dialect.

The thralldom of the Finnish people, who inhabit the northernmost parts of Central Europe, dates back only a century. Their subjection to the Russian rule, therefore, was not as thoroughgoing as that of their southern cousins, the Esthonians. They were too self-reliant and too aware of their cultural superiority to be intimidated into a complete surrender. Passive resistance to which they had taken recourse proved a powerful weapon in repelling attempts at a more than superficial Russification of the country of the thousand lakes.

Now that these six countries have enjoyed five full years of freedom and national independence, it is pertinent to ask what they have achieved during this time. Are they on the path toward the realization of those lofty ideals which were laid down in the covenants of their nationhood? Or did they forget how bitter it was to be oppressed? Are they just and democratic, defenders of the weak? And, what is most important, may old Europe look toward new Europe for a genius among the nations, a leader possessing resources of energy and vision, who can show the way out of the chaos in which Europe seems to be sinking?

The new republics believe that their problems are primarily of an economic nature. They cannot do the "great things" they are expected to achieve unless their economic position is such as to give them leisure to devote their attention to problems other than the struggle for daily bread. The question of a sound currency is of vital importance; without it no economic consolidation is possible. As an argument proving this contention the case of Czecho-Slovakia and Poland, two of the new republics, is cited.

Economically Czecho-Slovakia is one of the best-equipped countries of Central Europe. The peace treaties placed within her boundaries 70 per cent of all the industries of the former monarchy. Nature has been equally generous. Czecho-Slovakia's resources of raw material are bountiful and afford a comfortable margin for export.

Poland, Czecho-Slovakia's neighbor, is in an even more advantageous position. She has inherited almost the whole industrial district of the former Russian empire situated in Congress Poland and the well-equipped industrial plants in Posen, not to speak of the Upper Silesian mining region, which is second only to the Ruhr valley in the quality and quantity of its coal. Yet the Czecho-Slovak currency is the best in Central Europe, while the Polish exchange competes with the German mark for the honor of having the least value. The consequence is that in Czecho-Slovakia, after an initial period of deflationary slump, an era of comparative prosperity has set in, while in Poland financial and economic conditions are chaotic, labor disorders are of every-day occurrence, and the political situation is gloomy.

Poincaré-Chaplin: "Just smash the windows of the Germans and you shall have all the money you want."

Their relative economic position determines the place these two countries occupy in international politics. There has hardly been an international conference at which Czecho-Slovakia has not played an important role. In fact, she has specialized in doctoring Europe's troubles. One could see her ever-agile representative, Edward Benes, now at Genoa cooperating with Mr. Lloyd George, now at London attempting to resuscitate the moribund Entente, or at Belgrade manufacturing the Little Entente. The Czecho-Slovak republic was among the first to extend a helping hand to Austria, its former oppressor. It made every effort to induce the League of Nations to raise an Austrian loan, it helped in settling the dispute between Austria and Hungary over the Burgenland, and it represented the "mailed fist" of Europe when Charles Hapsburg tried to ascend his vacant throne in the Budapest royal palace.

Edward Benes, whatever his shortcomings is one of the strongest political personalities of new Europe. His countrymen think he is a great man. They even think that he is a man of destiny, a new Moses, who will lead Europe out into the Canaan of liberty. At present one cannot tell whither he is bound. He is too shrewd a diplomat to avow his purpose honestly. At all events, there is nothing of the religious fanatic in him. Neither does he impress one with the somber heroism that might be expected in a new Moses. He may be disliked by many, but he is hated only by a few. In this he lacks the characteristic sign of greatness. He concluded recently a treaty with France, and not even the German representatives in the Czecho-Slovak Parliament hated him for it! Instead, they began to wonder whether it really was his intention, as his friends intimated, to use the treaty as a means to dilute the condensed jingoism of Poincaré with his own moderate "Europeanism." In his résumé of Czecho-Slovakia's foreign policy, presented on February 6, 1924, before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Czech Parliament, he spoke openly of an impending Franco-German rapprochement, due particularly to the influence of Czecho-Slovakia. On the same occasion he talked of a great alliance which would include all the nations of Europe.

The foreign policy of Poland, the other great country of new Europe, has been determined by her status as a "land without frontiers." Her godparents, the "Big Entente," failed to circumscribe her territory. To the north, the west, and the south young Poland was surrounded by plebiscite regions. Her frontier line to the east was equally hazy, because the so-called Curzon line separating Poland from Russia was only a temporary boundary which could have been conveniently shifted to the west—or perhaps removed altogether—had the Russian reaction become victorious. It was only on March 15, 1923, that the Allies graciously permitted Poland to consider the Curzon line as the permanent eastern boundary of the new republic.

Polish supernaturalists try to charge to these uncertain conditions the numerous armed conflicts in which Poland has been engaged since the official termination of the World War. On the other hand, the neighboring states point out that in almost every instance it was Poland who attacked. She took Vilna from the Lithuanians, making them thereby her most bitter enemies. In the west Upper Silesia had its own dose of Korfanty, which lasted until October, 1921, when the League of Nations sanctioned the coup de main of the Polish irregulars. To the south the frontier conflicts in the Teschen plebiscite region continued even after the summer of 1920, when the Council of Ambassadors made its award concerning the disputed territory. Simultaneously the Polish-Russian war was in progress in the east and the Red Army was menacing the suburbs of Warsaw.

During all these conflicts Poland has played a rather undignified role. As soon as she would attack one of her neighbors the Polish Government would charge its representatives at the seat of the League of Nations and in the capitals of the Allied countries to proffer Poland's complaint against the "unwarranted attack" of the outlaw neighbor. It is small wonder therefore that Poland is one of the most friendless states of Europe. The only country for which her heart is aglow is France, who recently gave her a "military credit" of 400 million francs to cover the expenses which she will incur as guardian of the "cordon militaire" thrown between Russia and Germany.

Unlike Poland, two of the Baltic states are making headway toward a broader interpretation of their newly won independence. Esthonia and Latvia have for some time past given evidence of a desire to disregard narrowly nationalistic conceptions and to join a Baltic alliance, which, in the opinion of every observer of Baltic affairs, would be the most reasonable combination under the present circumstances. It is considered an auspicious beginning that the Esthonians and Latvians concluded an alliance in November, 1923, which practically eliminates the frontiers separating the two countries. Unfortunately, differences between these countries and Lithuania make it unlikely that the Baltic League will be set up in the near future.

Turning one's attention to internal politics one cannot help thinking that most of the new states are cursed with defects inherited from their former masters. The most hideous, because the most bloody, of these defects is that with which Finland is afflicted. That country stained her record with a reign of terror which obscured everything Czarist Russia had done to the oppressed nationalities. When the Finnish Soviet regime was overturned 15,000 men, women, and children were executed by the Finnish White Guards and about 80,000 persons, including women and children, were imprisoned. Although tens of thousands of revolutionaries were disfranchised, the Finnish Parliament has always had a fair percentage of Socialists, sometimes almost equaling in strength the other parties combined. Yet the reactionary parties have so far managed to retain control of the legislature and of the executive offices by jailing the "disturbing elements" as soon as their opposition has become uncomfortable.

The great evil in the internal political system of Czecho-Slovakia is her unsolved problem of nationalities. All assurances to the contrary notwithstanding, it is undoubtedly true that contemporary Czecho-Slovakia is almost as much a "nationality state" as the monarchy was. The official government statistics for 1921, recording the data of the last census, show that there were living at that time on the territory of the republic 8,700,000 "Czecho-Slovaks," 3,100,000 Germans, 800,000 Hungarians, and some smaller nationalities in addition. All taken together, the non-Czecho-Slovak population comprised 45 per cent of the inhabitants of the republic. But even these figures hardly represent the facts. There are twelve Slovak representatives in the Prague Parliament, the party of Father Hlinka, who on behalf of their constituents object most vehemently to being called Czecho-Slovaks. They point out that the Slovaks are a nationality wholly different from the Czechs and that they should be treated accordingly.

The plight of the Germans living in Czecho-Slovakia, the so-called Sudetendeutsche, is worse than that of the Slovaks. They are living in a mass, three million strong, on a territory which is quite distinct from Czecho-Slovakia proper. Outside of local functions they are not given an adequate share in administrative matters. Although they form nearly 25 per cent of the total population of the country there is not a single German cabinet minister in Czecho-Slovakia. It is natural therefore that their heart goes out to their kin in the Reich. True, they are less aggressive now than they have been, preferring to sympathize from the outside with their brethren across the frontier rather than to make an attempt at boarding Germany's storm-swept ship in its present distress. But it can be taken for granted that as soon as Germany is out of danger they will renew their offensive against the country which requires their allegiance. Then will be the time for Czecho-Slovakia to come to an understanding with her nationalities if she does not want to rear an irredenta as embittered and as well-organized as was her own in Hapsburg times.

But there is a common evil which all the six countries have inherited from their predecessors. It is a hypertrophied form of militarism. They simply cannot get away from thinking in terms of armies as the measure of greatness. External dangers, real and imaginary, are carefully recorded; their discussion is kept alive in parliaments as well as in newspapers. Czecho-Slovakia shivers at the thought of a Hapsburg or Hohenzollern restoration and therefore keeps a good-sized army. Poland sees armored ghosts in every corner and therefore feels obliged to maintain a large standing army even if she has to go begging for the money necessary for its upkeep. The Baltic states and Finland are not yet convinced of the peaceful intentions of Russia and spend the little money they have on troops. Lithuania has her own affair with Poland, which is sufficient inducement for her to spend an amount for her army relatively more than that expended by any other nation on earth. Facts such as these offer a gloomy outlook for a new world order.

Starving the New Generation in Germany

By EDITH VAN HOOK

THE general impoverishment of the German people reacts most directly on the health of the children. It is no longer the birthright of every child to be happy and well-fed; just keeping the spark of life going is a problem absorbing the nation. From all parts of the country the reports on living conditions are the same; figures collected from twenty different cities prove that never before has a civilized nation sent out a generation less fit to take up the staggering burdens of a disordered world. Children born in times of want, raised on inappropriate and insufficient food, exposed to the rigors of a cold, relentless northern climate are not going to be able to build up a war-torn nation. With the health of children thus permanently undermined, and their powers of resistance largely diminished, we find an appalling increase in such diseases as scrofula, rickets, spinal curvature, and, worst of all, tuberculosis.

The decrease in the birth-rate from 800,000 to 500,000 annually is accompanied by a growing number of children born dead or not viable. The mothers, weakened by fatigue and want, undernourishment and hard work, are unable to nurse their infants. The scarcity of fresh milk—the supply is only one-tenth of the pre-war quantity—and the prohibitive price contribute equally to an alarmingly high rate of infant mortality. In Munich, for example, 12 per cent of the babies born in 1922 died, as compared with 40 per cent in 1923. In cities comparatively well supplied with milk, like Aix-la-Chapelle, invalids and nursing mothers are entitled to half a pint a day, but children over two years old have no claim to any; while in Magdeburg 90 per cent of the infants are insufficiently provided with milk, and in Breslau no child over one year of age receives a drop. Many towns are exerting themselves to the utmost to sell milk and other foodstuffs for children at cost to the poor, but their funds are too limited to purchase supplies. Even sugar is scarce for infant feeding and has to be replaced by saccharine, with injurious effects. Day nurseries, orphan asylums, foundling homes, and many hospitals are closing their doors for lack of funds!

If the condition of the babies is pitiable, that of school children shows more advanced consequences of prolonged suffering; health examinations throughout the elementary schools show all children many pounds below normal weight. Boys between the ages of six and fourteen weigh seven and seven-tenths pounds, and girls nearly five pounds under; between the years of nine and thirteen the combined average was thirteen pounds underweight. In regard to physical development, the boys are retarded on an average of at least two years and the girls are one and a half years behind normal growth. Many individual cases far exceed these figures. In a Berlin school of the poorest quarter I saw a girl ten years old no bigger than a child of four; she was not suffering from any disease nor abnormality, merely extreme malnutrition from birth. Twenty boys filed by, apparently between the ages of six and eight, each calling out his age; they varied from eleven to fourteen. These boys and girls are about to leave school and take out their working papers, but not one was physically fit to enter a trade. Industrial efficiency has already been reduced to 60 per cent of the pre-war figure, and it will no doubt be far below this when the new class enters the ranks of producers.

In Chemnitz the questioning of 1,300 school children revealed the fact that four hundred had had no breakfast, nine hundred brought only a piece of dry bread for lunch, in rare instances spread with lard; one thousand had had but a most inadequate dinner the night before, and many had not eaten in twenty-four hours. In many families two meals a day consisting of fried potatoes for dinner and boiled potatoes for supper are considered entirely sufficient for a growing child. Black corn coffee, dry bread, cold potatoes with herring brine, in rare cases even herring itself, are the usual food among the working classes. In Magdeburg 20 per cent of all the children do not receive a single warm meal a day.

In Dresden schools many children were found to have had for breakfast a carrot, a bit of raw turnip, or some cold potatoes. One-sixth of all the children in the elementary schools have some form of hunger disease. Pernicious anemia, defective glands, goiter, weak hearts, and all forms of tuberculosis are wide-spread. It is no uncommon sight during the lessons to see a child weakened by starvation slip from his desk and fall fainting to the floor. The schools are too poor to furnish pen, paper, ink, chalk, or sponges for the pupils. Nor can the parents afford to buy school books, so the children barter and exchange with those who have been promoted into higher classes. Lessons are written out on old million-mark bills now no longer in circulation, and old paper bags. Comparatively well-to-do parents who can still let their daughters study music send them off to the teacher with one briquette and a loaf of bread in payment for the lesson. Hundreds must miss school and stay in bed because of weakness, or because they possess neither clothes nor shoes. It is an established fact that not only in the working classes, but also in the middle classes, many children up to eight years of age have never in their lives known what it means to have enough to eat.

The lack of warm clothing and the insufficient heating of homes are contributory factors in the spread of disease. There is also a general housing shortage throughout the large cities, caused by an influx of refugees from the lost provinces, especially Silesia, and the universal standstill in building following the war. Overcrowding in the poorer quarters is general, and the problem of the large numbers of homeless is perplexing the authorities. They are forced to disregard the legal sanitary requirements in order to provide shelter for as many as possible. This situation no doubt also accounts for the great increase in illegitimacy since the war. Families of eight and even ten members have been found living in one room, and invalids suffering from contagious diseases share their beds with children. In their undermined condition they rapidly become a prey to tuberculosis. If a child belonging to a large family applies for treatment in a hospital the doctors know that in a very short while they will also be caring for all his brothers and sisters. In Saxony one child in six is already infected. If once acquired, there is no possibility of overcoming the disease under the prevailing conditions. Segregation presents insuperable difficulties, and nourishing food is not available with which to counteract the effects of the disease. Hospitals and doctors no longer prescribe medicaments, as no one is able to purchase them. Drugstores are empty, prescriptions cannot be filled—and this in a country which used to lead in the production of chemicals and drugs.

Those hospitals which are still able to continue report the necessity of giving up much of their work with the X-ray and violet rays, because of the need for economy. They are overcrowded and besieged by mothers bringing children already beyond medical help. Many women are themselves in such a pitiful condition that they are no longer able to realize the suffering of their children.

Although the standard of cleanliness is higher in Germany than in other countries of Europe, it is beyond the efforts of the most hardworking mothers to care properly for their children, with the result that skin diseases are also spreading to an alarming degree. They flourish in the absence of heat-producing foods such as butter, lard, and meat, and among those who live in unheated, badly lighted homes. There is frequently no soap, no warm room to bathe in, no clean linen for a change for many families formerly enjoying a comfortable income. Bed-clothes and bedding of every description are entirely missing in 10 per cent of the homes in Magdeburg, and in Munich 75 per cent of the school children are seriously endangered by the want of shoes. In Aix-la-Chapelle many families have no beds at all, and sleep on the floor on rags and old clothes. Similar conditions are reported from Stettin, Leipzig, Stuttgart, and other large cities. Both state and local boards are exerting themselves to the utmost to alleviate the suffering, especially among the children, but the public funds are nearly exhausted. Destitution will no doubt increase with the steadily growing unemployment. But there is no such thing in Germany today as a living wage, whether for skilled labor, unskilled labor, professionals, or lesser officials. Prices for food, fuel, and clothing are so high that even the most thrifty cannot make ends meet. Ninety per cent of the average weekly wage is necessary for food, which means the barest necessities only, and includes no fats whatever. The state deducts from the wages of those who still have work a proportional sum for the benefit of the unemployed. With such penalization, there is little inducement to stick to one's job among a people already weakened and demoralized.

Taxing Capital in Czecho-Slovakia

By FREDERICK KUH

BEFORE I visited Prague I tried to inform myself concerning the capital levy in Czecho-Slovakia. Newspaper comments on this experiment as well as the opinions of diplomats conveyed a dismal impression. An American economist who prides himself upon his conversance with European finance had told me that the tax on capital in Czecho-Slovakia was proving disastrous.

"Disastrous to what?" I asked.

"Oh, to industry, commerce, and—" He finished the sentence with a gesture, signifying everything, or nothing.

This grave charge—that the capital levy was ruining Czecho-Slovak trade—was being echoed in the reports of Entente and American commercial attachés in Czecho-Slovakia. Wherever my preliminary inquiries led me, they disclosed ominously negative opinions.

When I arrived in Prague I found these hostile criticisms substantiated by a few standpatters, by professional damners of the republic, by a small group of hard-hit industrialists, and by most of the alien gentlemen seated in foreign embassies. Before long I discovered that nearly everyone with whom I talked objected vigorously to Czecho-Slovakia's radical departure in taxation—except the Czecho-Slovaks themselves.

I do not mean to imply that the whole Czecho-Slovak people arise as one Czecho-Slovak and cheer lustily whenever the capital levy is mentioned. There is a minor group of factory owners which is, in the words of the old Mississippi song, Down on the levee . . .

The tax collector in Prague, Gablonz, or Brno is no more a national favorite than his colleague in Chicago or Gopher Prairie. And, naturally, those Czecho-Slovak property owners who dig deepest into their pockets to meet the capital levy are least of all inclined to shout for the tax.

Wherever I sought information—among the textile workers of Reichenberg, Kladno miners, Prague shopkeepers, trade-union officials, teachers, and even in the offices of bank directors and in the Ministry of Finance—I heard the same story.

"It was the capital levy," they all repeated, "that saved Czecho-Slovakia's currency from treading the gruesome path of the Austrian and Hungarian crown and the German mark. If we have passed through perilous economic crises in our country, it is thanks to the capital levy that our trade, finance, and industry are not worse impaired."

As one frivolous observer put it, it was the levy on capital which Czechmated the collapse of the republic.

In resorting to the capital levy as a desperate expedient to comb out their disheveled finances after the war, the leaders of Czecho-Slovak labor, then at the zenith of their power, candidly admitted that they were taking a leap in the dark. Nowadays they consider that venture their most successful achievement.

To shift upon the capital tax the responsibility for the periods of industrial stagnation, unemployment, and trade slumps through which Czecho-Slovakia has been passing, is like ascribing a man's illness to his hectic cheeks and overlooking the fact that he is tubercular. Every canny observer has long since allotted the major blame for this recurrent crisis to the peace treaties, with their severance of Czecho-Slovak industry from the Danube markets; to the customs ramparts thrown up on each after-war frontier; and to the depreciated currencies and cheaper labor among Czecho-Slovakia's neighbors, with their stunning blow to Czech competition. It was these factors, and not Czecho-Slovakia's capital levy, which led Austria to import coal from England and even America, while stores of anthracite lay idle in Czecho-Slovak warehouses, only 200 miles away.

To those accustomed to find the capital levy everywhere identified with labor's program it may seem peculiar that the most serious objection to this measure emanates from the very Czecho-Slovak Socialists and Communists who first effected its passage. It is with its administration, however, and not with the tax itself, that the Left quarrels. The levy exempts Czecho-Slovak citizens whose capital does not exceed $335; a tax of 1 per cent is imposed upon the first $840 worth of property; thence, the levy is graduated up to 30 per cent on fortunes over $335,000. The levy applies to all property situated in Czecho-Slovakia on March 1, 1919, and to all foreign securities owned by resident Czecho-Slovaks on that date. Special commissioners fix the amount levied upon each citizen. Fifteen per cent must be paid within thirty days after demand and the balance in six semi-annual instalments. If any taxpayer can show, graphically enough to suit the commissioners, that the levy inflicts undue hardship, he may be permitted special privileges, such as an extension of tax payments over five instead of three years. Even a reduction in the levy is provided for should the taxpayer's capital have diminished through some unavoidable event.

Examined critically, the persistent objection leveled against the capital levy by Czecho-Slovakia's radicals assumes a curious air of logic. They protest against the slow, lenient execution of the tax and suggest that this slackness has partially defeated the purpose of the whole measure. They denounce the three- or five-year instalment scheme, which allows affluent merchants, bankers, and manufacturers gradually to raise their prices or interest rates and thus regain, at the consumer's expense, a part or all of the sums levied by the state. This method of dodging could be thwarted, they declare, by demanding payment of the capital tax in a lump sum and simultaneously regulating prices and banking rates by drastic anti-profiteering laws. The left-wing critics who share this view believe that the capital levy must be boldly confiscatory to be effective. But they are reconciled to the conclusion that any such radical policy is unthinkable in a state in which the Socialists do not enjoy complete dominance.

Since the capital levy has already brought the Czecho-Slovak state revenues amounting, roughly, to $150,000,000, and is expected to net at least twice that amount before its first five years have elapsed, Czecho-Slovak liberals and Socialists say that they are grateful for small favors. They will inform you that the three immediate objectives of the tax have been attained: to cover the costs of introducing their new currency; to meet obligations incurred by taking over the treasury notes (Kassenscheine) from the old Austro-Hungarian bank; and to reimburse the state for the ample expenditures involved in setting up the republic—a luxury which no state can afford as a habit.

After the passage of the capital-levy bill the Czech crown soon trebled its value on the world's money market, a perverse accomplishment in the days when thousands, millions, and even trillions came to be tossed over shop-counters in adjacent countries in return for a ribbon or slice of meat. Today more than 40 per cent of all Czecho-Slovak money in circulation is covered by gold or silver reserves.

A Little Matter of Money

By HARBOR ALLEN

A FEW months ago there wasn't enough money in Germany to go around. Now there is too much. The only trouble with it is: it's no good. Everyday one sees new specimens—and reads about new counterfeits.

First of all there are the various kinds of marks: the paper mark, the Rentenmark, the goldmark, the Reichsbahn mark, the Postamt mark, the Notmark, the Bavarian mark, the Munich mark, and a different kind of mark for every village large enough to own a printing press. Each of these, of course, has a progeny of pfennige.

Then come the dollars: the ancestral and omnipotent American dollar (evidently—as were the occupation troops—quite at home on German soil), the Schatzanweisung dollar, the Goldanleihe dollar, the Hamburg Giro-dollar, the Notdollar, the Walchensee dollar, the Hypotheken dollar, the Bavarian dollar, the various bank dollars, and as many industry dollars—at whose respective heels tag a family of assorted offspring, from one-tenth to one-half a dollar.

So when you change a twenty-dollar bill in Germany you get a collection of legal documents resembling everything from a postage stamp to a liberty bond, of sufficiently diverse shades and tints to form a color scale. Half or more of this money is good only in the city in which you received it. If you offer a Munich dollar to a merchant in Nuremberg he will examine it with a collector's interest, perhaps, but will decline to accept it in exchange for wares; and to enter a store in Berlin with a Bavarian Schein is to fall under the suspicion of being a black Catholic monarchist, or a still blacker counterfeiter. In short, everytime you approach a railroad station you have to empty half your pockets and start making new and shoddy acquaintances.

But let us grant you have kept your patience and changed your money and sorted it out into your filing case of a purse and started off on a buying spree. "Billig—Inventur Verkauf—Preis Ermässigung" you see on all the store fronts; and indeed, since the first of the year, prices—aided by gentle prodding from the Government—have been sinking to something approaching the American level; sinking, that is, together with wages, which by this time have reached something approaching the Chinese coolie level. You ask yourself: Who gets the difference?

Refusing to let that puzzle you, however, you enter a store and buy several pairs of Wiener sausages at 55 pfennig (13 cents) a pair. You offer the shopkeeper a Walchensee dollar. She examines it long and closely.

"Ja, mein Herr," she says at last; "that I cannot accept."

"Why not?"

"It's not good."

"Nonsense. I just got it from a bank."

But your shopkeeper shrugs her shoulders; you see her place a heavy hand on your precious pairs of Wieners. "A Herr from a bank just told me a Walchensee dollar was worth only 3 marks instead of 4 marks 20. Haven't you any other kind of money?"

"You know that's not allowed," you say, just to show her that despite your foreign accent you read the papers. "That's legal money. You've got to take it."

This logic doesn't trouble your shopkeeper. If you insist she'll accept it—for 3 marks. But she prefers Rentenmarks; and you prefer Wieners: so Rentenmarks she gets, and an inky scowl, for you remember that there are several Walchensees in your purse and you scent trouble ahead.

Rather than start a row in the next store, however, you offer to pay in paper marks.

"Ja, mein Herr," is the reply, "of course, there's a law compelling me to take that. But haven't you any stable money?"

"No," you snap, "that is, nothing but Walchensee dollars."

A smile splits your shopkeeper's face. Walchensee dollars! Nothing better. She has a special fondness for Walchensee dollars. Four marks, twenty, of course! You give her all you have and march out of the store feeling cooler under the collar and more communicative.

In store number three you lay down a crisp new Rentenmark Schein. It is lifted slowly across the counter.

"Well?" you ask, with a hint of war in your voice.

The shopkeeper is very apologetic. You must understand, mein Herr, that she has to buy her wares in foreign countries; and the Rentenmark, unfortunately, is quoted at only 80 pfennig in Zurich. A Herr from a bank told her so. Now, paper marks—they're different. The Herr from the bank told her there was a premium on every billion-mark Schein in New York. So—"Couldn't the Herr, as a special favor, pay in paper marks?"

And by and by you stop worrying about it. But you never do your shopping in less than half a dozen stores.

Storm-Center

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

THE most translated and traduced of poets will not let the world rest. In Germany the vitality of his personality and his works is electric. He is at the core of the tempests between reactionaries and reds, between Nordics and non-Nordics. To prove that this man was not and could not have been a German poet is the chief life-work of at least one learned and gifted historian of literature. Meanwhile editions of Heine's works increase and the revolutionary youth of Germany nourishes itself on his substance and example if no longer on his style. And meanwhile, too, in England and America there persists the silly legend that Heine is not only the greatest but indeed the sole German lyricist since Goethe, and ladies like Miss Horine continue to mistake the ease of his verses for slovenliness and gentlemen like Mr. Michael Monahan continue to enlighten the world with remarks to the effect that Heine's "song is that of the nightingale in pain."* Both the translations and the facile adulation do the poet no service. The ravings of the arch-anti-Semite Bartels are more profitable.

It is, happily, not difficult to clear the murky air that has a habit of gathering about this man and his work. Bartels and his less hectic colleagues are right in this, that Heine is not a lyricist of the most intimate and inimitable German tradition and it takes no "German heart" to feel the difference between him and Storm, Mörike, Falke, or some of the early verses of the redoubtable Bartels himself. And it may help to clear that murky air to say that I am myself inordinately devoted to that specific tradition of German lyrical poetry. The English poet most closely akin in style and substance to such a lyricist as Storm is A. E. Housman. And, from a narrow but not at all negligible point of view, a case could be made out for holding Housman to be a poet of more permanent value than Browning. But to blame Heine for not being Storm is as childish as it would be to blame Browning for not being Housman. The critical problem is complicated, but only slightly complicated, by the fact that Heine, issuing from the romantic school, set out in his early verses to be, if not a Theodor Storm, then a Wilhelm Müller. Many of these early verses are now seen to be incurably artificial and false; they do not belong to the Heine that counts. This stuff about nightingales and roses and flirting violets with its constant and trivial use of the "pathetic fallacy" is vapid and wilted. The trouble is that the Miss Horines and the Mr. Monahans both in Germany and here keep emphasizing it. You will never see them quote such lapidary lyrical masterpieces as "Das Glück ist eine leichte Dirne" or the orchestral crash of "An die Jugend" or "Salomo" or the great ballads, visions, apocalypses of the "Romancero." They go on talking about the fir-tree that dreams of the palm. Heine is not so adorable a lyricist as Goethe or Storm or Mörike or Eichendorff. Divine simplicity is precisely not his note. Neither was it Victor Hugo's nor Byron's. There is false romanticism in Heine as there is false romanticism in Byron. Heine could not have written Goethe's "Mailed" any more than Byron could have written Wordsworth's "Lucy" poems. But Byron wrote "Don Juan" and Heine "Romancero."

How could Heine have had the divine simplicity of the earth-rooted poets? He was, as he himself said, the last of the romantics; he was the first of the realists. He was a German—very truly and passionately a German; he was a Jew and an outcast. These are no cheap antitheses in the manner of Macaulay. Pain and blood, defeated ardor and grinding humiliation cling to them. The famous or, as the Pan-German professors would have it, the notorious poem endings in which the romantic mood is riven, loveliness flung into the icy light of common day, and the critical intellect crashes through the poetic vision—these endings are the symbols of the tragic division within Heine himself and rise, by virtue of the potency and magic of his personality, into symbols of the two major moods that in both literature and life struggle for supremacy in the whole of modern civilization. Of course Heine is not so exquisite a lyricist as Eichendorff. He is a poet and personality of European import.

His prose has contributed not a little to his influence and power. A good deal of the early prose shares the fate of the early verses. Whole sections of the "Reisebilder" are affected and florid. Yet even here there is a mastery of German prose as a medium of world expression and communication that had quite simply not existed since Lessing. In the later books, in "The Romantic School," the treatise "On Religion and Philosophy in Germany," the political and critical reports sent year after year from Paris there are many pages so pregnant with the significance of Europe's essential life that seventy years of change, of industrial revolution, of catastrophes in the mind and the world have not robbed them of their native life.

Well, when with all the pleasure in life you give up to the Pan-German professors Heine's early poems or, at least, a good many of them and a good deal of his early prose and grant them not only freely but eagerly that neither the "Buch der Lieder" nor the "Reisebilder" is a masterpiece and that the influence of the former on the development of German poetry was, during the years from 1850 to 1880, demonstrably bad—when you have done all that, they are not yet contented. They add: He had neither character nor conviction. He was, in fact, a dirty fellow.

The most ill-guided of the poet's admirers are those who, in answer to such assertions, try to make Heine out to have been a gentleman of high personal dignity, scrupulous honor, unselfish idealism. That is nonsense. Still more nonsensical is the assertion of the aesthetes that character makes no difference in an artist. It makes all the difference. Art is expression of the self and of the experience of that self in the world, and the nature of that self is ultimately identical with the nature of the art product. But this self, this thing that we call character, is neither accidental nor blankly self-originating. The question is not: Was Heine a "good" man or not? The pertinent question is something like this: How would the fierce Bartels and the suaver Belloc have borne themselves in the world had they been born with sick nerves and the power and pride and susceptibility of genius and been born Jews barely removed from the restrictions of the medieval Ghetto, told to assimilate or get out, and, having made both the gestures and the effort of assimilation, still suffered exile, obloquy, fame embittered by irrelevant imputations, friendship poisoned by superstitious fears? I am profoundly offended by Heine's official "conversion" and by his French pension. I have the right to be. I am not impressed by his relations with his mother. They were beautiful. But they are characteristic of every Jewish home. But Bartels and Belloc—I use their names symbolically—are guilty of the merest effrontery when they are offended by the conversion and the pension. Their ancestors demanded the conversion as a prerequisite of professional activity and told the Jew to be a German, as with his whole heart he desired to be, and then suppressed his writings and made his continued stay in Germany next to impossible. It is quite true that in an outer sense Heine did not suffer very severely. The point is that he was a man of genius and that the monstrousness of the situation is in the injustice of his having been made, on these grounds and after this manner, to suffer at all. In brief, I do not defend either his actions or his at times disgusting controversial methods. He was what the impact of his particular world upon his particular spirit necessarily made him. Praise and blame are mere babbling here. The same forces that molded his character also molded his work. That is all we know, all we can know. The man and the work are one—full of pain, warped by wrong, the reverse of Olympian, of noble and serene, but also possessing a somber glow, less beautiful than portentous, drawn from the fires of certain central problems of both art and history and as radiant today as on the day he died.

M. Poincaré—Confidence Man

By COUNT HARRY KESSLER

THE fact that dominates the political situation in Europe is the virtual annexation of the Rhineland and the Ruhr by France. M. Poincaré, it is true, seizes every possible occasion of denying that France intends to annex these regions, but a very cursory look suffices to show that they are to all intents and purposes already annexed by France and the denials of M. Poincaré are mere eyewash.

France has drawn a customs barrier around the Ruhr and Rhineland separating them from Germany. It has introduced passport visas so that any German wishing to go from unoccupied Germany to the Ruhr or Rhineland must obtain the permit of the French Government. It has expelled all the higher German officials and thus put an end to the administration of the Ruhr and Rhineland by the Central German Government. It has seized the railways which were a part of the German state railway system and has installed a Franco-Belgian railway administration. It has forced agreements on the mine-owners and industrialists of the Ruhr and Rhineland which place them and their millions of workingmen at the mercy of the political agents of France on the spot. No mine-owner can move a ton of coal, no industrialist a ton of steel, or export them, without a special license from these French political agents. And behind all this stands the military occupation of France, which, according to M. Poincaré, is to be upheld indefinitely.

In other words, when M. Poincaré protests his innocence while he "gets away with the goods" he is practicing the old well-known confidence game upon the world.

Now, as ethics have up to date never played any great part in international politics, except in war time as propaganda, hard-shelled diplomats and business men might contemplate the performance of M. Poincaré with more amusement than indignation or concern if it were not for two consequences it is likely to have. The goods he is getting away with happen to be part of the necessary stock in trade of Europe as a paying business concern, and unless General Dawes or somebody else succeeds in getting them back from him Europe must go bankrupt.

And the second consideration is that if M. Poincaré succeeds in keeping them—that is, in keeping the Rhineland and Ruhr for France as its political and economic domain—there will be a new world war within our generation. For, on the one hand, French dominion in the Ruhr and Rhineland will create an irredenta there, an irredenta of twelve million Germans oppressed by foreign military authorities and capitalists, which will lead to the same results as the Italian irredenta against Austria and the irredenta of the Balkan people against Turkey. And, on the other hand, Great Britain cannot look on complacently while France welds together all the economic resources of the Continent—all its coal mines, all its iron ore, all its basic industries—with the greatest military power in history, especially if that power happens to be England's next neighbor across the Channel and on the shores of the ocean. This mammoth trust backed by such military power and by such strategic and geographical opportunities could make an end to British trade and British imperial power at its pleasure.

It would be the situation of 1914, only much worse. Therefore the success of M. Poincaré's pretty trick means war eventually between France and Great Britain, just as it means war between France and Germany.

It is necessary that this should be understood, and understood especially in France itself, which will be one of the first victims of this sleight-of-hand performance. Otherwise the French people may awake one day to find that it is sometimes ruinous to employ a too unscrupulous lawyer.

Alteration

By MARK VAN DOREN

I did not ask to have the shed
Pulled down, although it leaned so sickly.
But now the proper word is said
Let it come quickly.

Bring rope and pulley, ax and bar,
And while you hammer I will pry.
Shingies can be sent as far
As feathers fly.

Naked beams can tumble faster
Than cobwebs in a sudden gust;
Floors can stand on end; and plaster
Soon is dust.

I did not think the valley view
Deserved that any roof should fall.
But now the word is said by you,
I want it all.

Hands Across the Rhine

By LIDA G. HEYMANN

SINCE the days of Charles V the governments of both France and Germany have sought to destroy and devastate each other, supported on each side by a group of extremists and chauvinists. But there is another Germany and another France of which one seldom hears, because the press is silent. Intellectually France and Germany have never been able to exist without each other; and since the Great War new elements have arisen and have joined hands—pacifists, women, workers, and young people. The friendship between these groups has never been so closely knit as it has since the peace of Versailles. They are all agreed that the responsibility for the Great War is shared by all the civilized states of the world, but that Germany has a war debt to discharge: the restoration of the devastated regions of northern France. Reparations must be paid so that northern France may be restored. Until that has been done no peace can be hoped for in Europe.

And when the governments of France and Germany have failed in their duty these four groups have tried to step in. As far back as 1919 the idea occurred to the Quakers and trade unions that Germans should be sent into France and work with the French in rebuilding the villages, laying out gardens, and planting trees. The plan was unfortunately blocked by the French Government and the French and German capitalists, all of whom feared the loss of rich profits. In 1923, the year in which the Ruhr was occupied by the French military forces, the same idea was revived with new supporters and champions. This time it was more successful.

The members of the German section of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, pacifists, readers of the Menschheit, Socialist workmen, and the youth of both sexes who are organized in Quickborn and other leagues of youth, combined in their work of reconciliation. The appeal of the German section contained these words:

Let the German nation arouse itself at this last moment! It has found the strength for passive resistance; let it now proceed to active deeds. Let us gather together in working battalions; let us go over with hammer and saw, with trowel and level, and begin to rebuild.

Funds were collected. Women brought their jewels, men temporarily gave up smoking and contributed the money thus saved, workmen subscribed their pay for an hour's work, officials promised to give a certain percentage of their monthly wages for the task of reconciliation.

The letters which accompanied gifts of jewelry and money give one an insight into the feelings of these Germans. Let me quote from some. A German mother wrote:

I have been telling my children of the distress among the French children; they brought me their savings to help to build a home for French children.

A letter from a man said:

Please accept a bronze bust of Bismarck. It is all I possess. I offer it so that I may be delivered from this spirit and attain a higher and more worthy conception of national life.

A touching letter from a mere boy included these words:

I send you my greatest treasure in the service of reconciliation. I send it willingly but sadly. My mother gave me the little chain when I went to my first communion.

A student from Berlin writes:

I am poor; I have neither gold nor valuables. But I am twenty years old, strong and healthy. I will dedicate myself to the service of justice and help with the rebuilding.

And then the various German groups began to work with the French. In the neighborhood of Lens the community gave a free site and there, built with German money, will arise a Building of Reconciliation. A community house will be constructed with a library, club-rooms, and other equipment as a symbol for future generations of a new spirit of reconciliation between France and Germany. The women of the French section declared in the French newspapers:

We are ashamed to take money from you at a time when the German population is being oppressed by the French military and when old men, women, and children are suffering from hunger. Nevertheless the world is in need of reconciliation; we too wish to contribute our share of sacrifice.

And so French women sent food, clothes, and toys to the children in the Ruhr. When spring comes 500 German children will be sent to the mild south of France, there to be received by French mothers and nursed back into health.

You must not imagine that these things came about simply. In Germany and in France many difficulties were thrown in the way of the work. In both countries those who took part were branded as traitors. We were said to have been bribed by foreigners. In Germany an attempt was made to confiscate the money collected; the French Government declared that it would not permit German children to be sent into France, nor grant passports to the young Germans who wished to help reconstruct.

This does not disturb us; our enthusiasm is great.

The real cause of the Paris flood.

The Postman's Lot

By MAX BERMAN

"NEITHER snow nor rain nor heat nor gloom of night stays these couriers from the swift completion of their appointed rounds." Such is the motto spread across the entablature of the vast granite, Corinthian-patterned edifice that is New York's General Post Office. The stranger in New York has many times paused, impressed by the simple magnificence of that line, and wondered who was intended by the "couriers."

It is a drizzling November morning in a staid, residential portion of Brooklyn. Along a deserted street, lined with rows of high-stooped, brownstone houses, a man in a gray uniform is making a slow intermittent progress. From his left shoulder is slung a leather bag crammed with tied-up bundles of envelopes and protruding parcels. A drum-shaped bundle of periodicals rests in the crook of his left arm and in his hand is a thick pack of letters. He pauses at each house and into a slotted box or the grilled ironwork door of the basement vestibule deposits a few envelopes and, perhaps, a periodical. He is one of the "couriers" mentioned in the motto on his "appointed round."

As he makes his way up the street he frequently lowers the magazines to the sidewalk, sometimes for greater convenience in extracting parcels from the bag, but oftener for relief while climbing the high stoops to boxes fixed at the heads of the stairs. He goes in this manner about halfway up the block when through the rain there comes to him the high, petulant voice of a woman calling: "Mailman! Oh, Mister Mailman!" He hesitates and continues on for a few paces. But it is an imperative voice and there is no disregarding it. Irritatedly he sets down his bundle and walks back several yards. An indignant lady in a heavy bathrobe and holding a moist weekly movie-announcement card is standing in a vestibule. "See here, Mister Mailman," she begins, "haven't I told you a number of times that you are not to throw our mail into the area-way?"

"Well, you ought to get a mail box."

"Never mind mail boxes," interrupts the lady. "You ring the bell and wait till I come. The law is that you're to wait two minutes. I know my rights and I want my mail handed to me and not thrown into the area-way."

"All right, lady. It won't happen again," replies the man, turning away. "I forgot this time." He hurries on.

"Hey, postman, anything for Jones—565?" calls out a big, rain-coated man whom he meets. "It'll only take you a minute to look."

The gray-uniformed man shakes his head positively. "Sorry; can't delay the mail," he replies. "It's all tied up and in the bag. You'll have to wait your turn."

"Aw, I know all about that, but this is an important letter. I must get it before I go downtown."

With un concealed irritation the postman extracts and unties a bundle of letters and searches through it in the rain. "Nothing today, sir." The man nods a thanks and with a grumble hastens away.

"Postman, will you come over here a moment, please?" pipes a feminine voice from a house he is passing. With a frown he turns aside. It is a little, bespectacled, old lady at a parlor basement window. "Do you know anything about a parcel mailed to me from Chicago two months ago that hasn't come yet—a mail-order catalogue?" she asks.

"No, I don't think I do," he replies with pretended reflection as he edges toward the gate. "But I'll deliver it as soon as it comes."

"Oh, will you? Thanks, ever so much. But just a moment, please. My son posted a letter to Montreal last night. Do you know if it will get there by Thursday?" With the postman in such proximity, the temptation to ply him with questions is irresistible. Finally he breaks away. Further up the street a remonstrant lady comes out to object because, to make a quick disposal of a registered letter, he rang the bell twice. A woman calls him back to tell him that her doorbell is out of order and that he is to use the upstairs one. He reaches, after a train of similar incidents, the vestibule of a great apartment house on the corner. The inner door is locked. He pushes the superintendent's button and then, more impatiently, another, but gets no response. A man in going out opens the door and gives him an opportunity to enter. He enters the inner hall and makes for a dark space under a stairs landing. There, set into the wall, are about forty narrow slots for mail. He begins to push letters into these, but in the gloom of the place the names upon the envelopes and those under the slots are indistinguishable. He strikes a match and in its flicker makes a more successful attempt to read.

The colored superintendent appears beside him. "Say, postman," he begins accusingly, "Mrs. Fisher upstairs been complainin' you been puttin' her mail in the wrong box. She says if you do it again she'll complain in the post office."

"Let 'er complain," replies the postman, losing temper at last. "How'm I to know which is her box when there's no name on it? And can you read a name in this light?"

"Oh, that," apologizes the superintendent. "I took out the bulb because they used to leave it burnin' after gettin' their mail out."

He emerges upon the sidewalk and turns into the cross-street. The rain is becoming a hail and a penetrating wind is now blowing, but these he disregards. The complaints of the small business men on that block at the lateness of the mail require far more attention. A storekeeper, more sympathetic than the rest, suggests that perhaps the weather has been the cause of his tardiness. He shakes his head silently at this and hurries out into the storm. He has his route to serve and there is no time for speaking the truth—that it is not snow nor rain nor heat nor gloom of night that delays him, but the stupidity of the very people that he is trying his utmost to serve.

Some two years ago the writer had occasion to seek employment as a letter-carrier. After fulfilling the civil service requirements and after some waiting he was notified to report for service. But the elation that this notice brought was abruptly destroyed when upon reporting he was informed that not yet was he to be a letter-carrier. Years were first to be served as a substitute carrier. Understanding that this substituting was a sort of necessary apprenticeship, the writer agreed to the terms.

He has now been a "sub" for over two years. "Subbing" has turned out to be a prolonged physical and economic ordeal that must be gone through before the bliss of the regular carrier is attained. The "sub," he found, receives no regular salary but is paid by the hour. He has no regular work but, as a sort of scavenger, seizes upon whatever employment he can get. This may be a few hours' work as an "assist" on a heavy delivery route or a day's work as substitute for an absent carrier. It may be a job at "setting-up" a parcel-post route. Sometimes it is employment through "jumping" a carrier, i.e., through taking his place when he is over five minutes late. Many a carrier, delayed for a few minutes on his way to work, has dashed, panting, into the station, only to find himself "jumped" by a triumphant "sub." Oftenest, however, the "sub" does nothing. Days may pass before a chance to work will occur. To prevent squabbles over work when it does come, waiting lists are established and the "subs" receive turns at working in rotation. At the writer's station it takes usually three days to "buck" the list and get a turn. Although the "sub" receives no pay for time spent in waiting, he is expected to be constantly on hand should work arise. During prescribed hours he may not be elsewhere than within the station, "on the floor," in reserve for a possible emergency.

Nevertheless, on the sixty cents per hour that he occasionally earns, the "sub" strives to maintain himself, keep in uniforms, and, very often, to support a family. Many find this impossible and give up at the start. He who perseveres does it only through his vision of the future. The time is coming, he knows, when he will be appointed a regular carrier. There will then be no uncertainties, no vicissitudes in his life, he will know beforehand what his pay will be, he will have an annual vacation and sick-leave, and, best of all, he will be able to do some planning ahead. Years, of course, must pass, sometimes two, sometimes four or five, in one instance nineteen, before this condition is reached. But what are a few years of adversity when compared with the certainties of the letter-carrier's "life job"?

A day finally arrives when the "sub" is made a "regular" and definitely given the work and the pay of a letter-carrier. He is assigned to a route and the newly appointed carrier prepares to devote the rest of his life to the service of the residents on a few city blocks. Somewhat bungling at first, he soon familiarizes himself with the idiosyncrasies of those living on his route and with the peculiar ways in which some like to receive their mail. In time he is able to give from memory the address of each resident on his route, to know who has moved away, who has gone on vacation, and even their forwarding addresses. Every box, every mail-slot, every doorbell acquires an individuality and becomes an intrinsic part of his life.

Gradually the letter-carrier comes to realize that his condition is better only by contrast with that of the "sub." His salary, increased on rare occasions by a none-too-beneficent Congress, has always lagged behind the ever-rising cost of living. Of its present maximum of $1,800 per year, 25 to 40 per cent must go for rent alone. Upon the remainder he is expected to live as a respectable, self-respecting citizen. As the years pass and under the stress of hard work he deteriorates physically. Extremes of weather develop rheumatism, and the constant walking under heavy loads gradually produces flat feet and varicose veins. As he grows older and weaker he finds his route becoming heavier. What was a year ago an unpaved path is now a street of stuccoed cottages, what was formerly an empty lot has become in a few months a row of huge apartment houses, each with its scores of families to receive mail. But appropriations for an increased postal force are not made and the carrier bears the brunt.

The most familiar figure in the neighborhood, some who pass him at work greet him intimately, a few scowl at him, and the great number pass him without notice. He is merely the mailman, an accepted incident of city life, regarded as passively as the trolley pole and the fire hydrant.

The Birth of a New Movement

By NORMAN THOMAS

OF the making of many conferences we had decided there is no end, and much comment upon them is a weariness to the flesh. But the Conference of Youth Organizations at Bear Mountain the beginning of this month was different—different and significant. The peculiar interest did not inhere in the glory of snow-covered hills under a winter's sun. Neither did it lie in the set speeches of the conference, though they were good. Rather, it was found in the fact that the much-discussed and long-sought inclusive Youth Movement of America seemed to be in evidence.

Here, side by side, were representatives of orthodox Christian and Jewish young people's organizations; the Y. P. S. C. E. (Christian Endeavor Society) fraternized with the Y. P. S. L. (Young People's Socialist League), the Student Volunteers of America with the Young Workers League. Over thirty organizations of youth were represented. Young men and women, both white and colored, came from colleges and factories, forums and churches. Convinced and determined radicals, anxious inquirers after light, ardent young religious idealists sat down together, talked over living standards, changes in economic order, and next steps for youth. There were honest differences of opinion strongly expressed. The discussion did not rise to great heights of thought or expression; it had a good deal of the "I'm telling you" quality, but throughout it was informed by a spirit of youth and earnestness. These young people were doing what their elders had never done. They were getting together.

It was surprising to discover how general was the agreement on a statement of principles. When Devere Allen of the Fellowship of Reconciliation took the initiative in forming an organizing committee for the conference, it was not supposed that a platform would be desired. But the delegates themselves called for something of the sort and a committee representing all the organizations under the chairmanship of Harry W. Laidler of the League for Industrial Democracy formulated a statement which was unanimously adopted. The statement was not, of course, binding upon the various organizations, but for all that it revealed a degree of radicalism in unexpected quarters. It declared for a social order based on production for use, with equal opportunity for all. It deplored commercial and militaristic standards of education and all racial and religious prejudice. As immediate steps it declared for the restoration of civil liberties, the abolition of child labor, collective bargaining, equal pay for equal work, insurance against sickness, unemployment, accident, and old age, and the socialization of mines, railroads, and superpower. It advocated the increase of world friendship and concerted agitation against war, militarism, and armament. It indorsed changes in the laws giving physicians the right to impart information on birth control; and it favored the strengthening of labor unionism, voluntary cooperation, labor education, and an independent political party of labor and of farmers.

To adopt such resolutions is one thing; to make them effective is another. It was encouraging to see a widely diffused recognition of the importance of study and research and of individual dedication to other than purely material values. The real service of such a conference lies not directly in the field of political and economic agitation and platform making, but in bringing together those who in the vigor and enthusiasm of their youth must deliver the world from war and make it a fit home for free men. The conference recognizing that fact formed a continuing committee with instructions to plan a further conference. If such conferences can carry forward the work begun at Bear Mountain a vital, inclusive, and genuine youth movement is at hand.

Washington and Mid-Europe

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE mind of Washington toward Europe has enormously changed since the time of the height of the League of Nations fight five years ago. It has become both more isolationist and more interventionist.

It has become more isolationist in respect of any proposed complicity in any permanent European international organization with duties laid down beforehand in the organization's constitution. It has become more interventionist in respect of the possibility of single unrelated useful acts, from time to time, by the United States in transatlantic affairs.

These two developments constitute, in fact, a mere belated return to the traditional American policy toward Europe. That policy, as laid down by the forefathers, was an abstinence from the European system and an intrusion, whenever genuinely necessary for American interests, into the European area. It embraced, on the one hand, a refusal to join the European Holy Alliance of the European great Powers; and it embraced, on the other hand, an invasion of the Mediterranean Sea to put down the Barbary pirates and a severe insistence, whenever possible, on the rights of Americans in European territories.

This natural combination of reasonable aloofness and of reasonable inclusiveness is now returning to Washington after having been artificially split for some time into its two component parts with each part carried to an absurd extreme.

Five years ago Washington tended to be divided into those who wished the United States to settle everything everywhere and those who did not wish the United States to take any part in settling anything anywhere. The Wilsonian passion for thinking that the United States knew what to do about Fiume in its relation to the boundary between Italy and Yugoslavia produced a counterpassion for declaring that the United States did not know what to do about German reparations in relation to the debt from France to the United States.

Woodrow Wilson took Washington farther away from the rest of the world than any other President that the United States has ever had. He made it a hermit on the banks of the Potomac by holding up before it the prospect of being a continuous gadabout on the banks of the Vistula.

Today the opposition to any permanent perambulation on the banks of the Vistula is indeed stronger than ever. Democratic Senator after Democratic Senator, having sung a high song on behalf of the League of Nations, has gone to Europe and has come back and has sung low. In an executive session of the Senate the other day a Democratic Senator incidentally and rather irrelevantly produced a panegyric on the League. In the midst of it a playful and glibing Republican Senator arose and moved that the seal of secrecy be removed from the proceedings of this executive session. A chorus of appreciative and understanding Democratic shouts of "no" was his expected and received answer.

Senator Brookhart of Iowa, Republican but radical, a party colleague of Senator Lodge's, but totally without any inclination or compulsion within him or about him to follow Senator Lodge's policies or Republican policies, goes to Europe and arrives in Britain and attends a national meeting of Britain's cooperative movement. An advocate of the League of Nations appears before the meeting. He argues for the League. A British cooperator arises and answers him. He alleges that the League is a means of continuing the aristocratic political system and the competitive economic system in Europe. He sits down. The votes are called. Not one vote is conceded to the League. Senator Brookhart returns to the United States and recounts his experience with the feelings of the British cooperative economic democracy and ceases to speak even with tolerant indecision of the future possibilities of American participation in the works of this present League. He speaks now positively against that participation. A superficially contrary tendency is nevertheless at the same time spectacularly noticeable. The height of spectacularness in it is furnished by La Follette of Wisconsin.

La Follette was one of the four Republican senators who, having been against Mr. Wilson's League of Nations, were also against Mr. Harding's Four-Power Treaty. The other three were France of Maryland, Johnson of California, and Borah of Idaho.

France of Maryland is defeated and for the time being eliminated. Johnson of California has committed himself to the proposition that while he is against the League of Nations and against the League Court, he is not against an American policy regarding specific situations in Europe, provided that it is an American policy produced and announced by America itself out of its own American thought and for the promotion of its own American philosophy.

Borah of Idaho has repeatedly declared himself in favor of an "international economic conference" for the bringing of American advice and influence into the settlement of the immediate economic difficulties of Europe and of the world.

Now comes La Follette of Wisconsin and gives his sanction to the labors of the "Emergency Foreign Policy Conference," which is headed by Senator Frazier of North Dakota, Senator Howell of Nebraska, Senator Johnson of Minnesota, Senator Ladd of North Dakota, and Senator Wheeler of Montana, and which asserts that in European affairs the United States has both a specific duty and a specific interest, immediate and not indeterminate, American and not foreign, definable now and not merely to be discovered after prolonged dinner parties between uninstructed American delegates and proficient European diplomats in a European capital.

This interest, as alleged, is to find a wider world market for the distressed American farmer. This duty, as alleged, is to fulfil the promise which America made to Germany in the armistice terms which Germany accepted from the hands and words of Woodrow Wilson.

Senator La Follette's name does not appear in the list of senators signing this program. He nevertheless is known to have been consulted about it. The senators signing it are members of his group or allied to his group in many of their views and activities. He himself has long been known to adhere to the conviction that the terms of the armistice impose today a duty upon the United States. This conviction is shared by senators who did not sign this program. Among them may be mentioned Shipstead of Minnesota, first Farmer-Laborite in the Senate.

As the Senate becomes more radical it becomes more and more disinclined to join in any scheme for the indeterminate perpetuation of the European spoils of the late European conflict. As the shock of Woodrow Wilson's willingness to go anywhere on anything recedes into the past, the Senate again tends toward becoming willing to go somewhere named on something known. By going beyond Wilson, the city of Washington has arrived at Thomas Jefferson, who denounced entanglements and intervened in the Mediterranean. Thus always there is progress.

President Eliot at Ninety

By WILLIAM ALLAN NEILSON

FOR more than half a century Charles William Eliot has occupied a unique place in American public life. For forty years the head of Harvard University, he has exercised on all classes of his countrymen an influence far beyond that of the usual academic dignitary. Other leaders of opinion have come and gone, and some for a time have been more conspicuous; but it is impossible to name a figure who has so continuously dominated our intellectual horizon for the last fifty years.

From the beginning he showed the power of the great executive in mastering infinite detail while keeping large general principles in view. He came into control of an institution which had to its credit a long line of distinguished graduates but which was essentially an unprogressive provincial college, with one or two inefficient professional schools loosely attached to it. He proceeded at once to reorganize the whole machine, and in his inaugural address laid down practically all the main ideas which directed the evolution of the university during his regime. His theories were founded on a personal knowledge of what the college was doing and was not doing for its students, on a somewhat varied experience as a teacher, and on prolonged observation of educational methods in Europe. He saw clearly what he wanted to do, and he began at once to argue that it should be done. Though strong-willed and self-assured, he sought to make his policies prevail not by the exercise of autocratic power but by persuasion. Yet he never flattered, never played politics. He had faith that truth would prevail; and he stated the truth as he saw it bluntly, persistently, and with all the logic he could command. One by one the reforms he advocated were adopted by sufficient majorities of the faculties and governing boards; and though the defeated might feel regret, they had none of the sense of grievance that would have come from brutal forcing through of measures or suppression of full and free discussion. Thus were established the elective system, with the consequent development of specialization; the enrichment of the curriculum, especially on what is known as the modern side; the substitution of written for oral examinations and of lectures for recitations. In the administration of discipline a greater degree of liberty and responsibility was granted to the student, and entrance to the college was guarded by higher standards of admission. Meanwhile Harvard grew from one thousand students to five thousand; twenty million dollars were added to its endowment; and a New England college became a cosmopolitan university.

Here surely was sufficient achievement for one man; but Dr. Eliot's influence went far beyond. His interest in the preparation for college led him to a consideration of the preparatory schools, with a resulting increase in their efficiency and a revision of their curricula. And all the while he refused to allow his official position to deprive him of his rights as a citizen. The freedom of speech he granted to the distinguished scholars whom he attracted to the faculties he demanded for himself; and he has been listened to more and more widely on almost all subjects of public interest. Now it is his judgment on rival candidates for the Presidency or the rights of non-union labor; now on civil-service reform, the religion of the future, or the best road to international peace, or the education of the sexes. Without exaggeration and without rhetoric, his plain telling sentences appeal to the sober sense of the American people, and seem to them the summing up of what they have always thought, the application of principles they have always held. He does not, it is true, convince all men; but he always helps to clarify.

Dr. Eliot has not been a great scholar in the technical sense. In his own subject he was a competent chemist and wrote a good textbook; but he abandoned specialization too early to reach distinction in research. He is very widely informed and is a great reader; but he learns as much from men as from books. He is an expert in the employment of experts; and he consulted members of his faculty when in search of special information as another man might consult a cyclopedia. His judgment of men is keen, and he forms it by watching them and letting them reveal themselves by their words and deeds. Cautious up to a certain point, he is bold when his mind is made up; and he constantly astonishes one by the freedom and almost indiscretion of his criticisms.

Grave and stately in appearance, Dr. Eliot is not in reality an austere man. Even a slight intimacy reveals geniality, kindness, and humor; but his inability to trifle with the truth, his scorn of insincerity and affectation, and his courageous frankness of utterance sometimes frighten the timid. His spoken and written style is a faithful expression of his character. It is a style without applied ornament, without excess of any kind. At first sight it appears bald in its severe simplicity and its courageous obviousness; at its best it is monumental, balanced, logical, the utterance of a just and valiant man.

On his ninetieth birthday many will bring him congratulations. Let ours be offered to the civilization which produced him, and made possible for so astounding a period the exercise of his superb and beneficent energy.

TO read the critics of the day you would think there was little or no beauty left in the world. Perhaps we have a shortage rather of what Swinburne called "the noble art of praising" and perhaps the reporters of what happens in the field of the arts are too often busier whetting their wits than being passive before beauty. The Drifter does not want slack appreciations from the ungirdled mind; what, in a friendly enough manner, he protests against is smartness, superficiality, lack of fire and love and glow. He would like to call to the attention of the critics who wander between two worlds, one that they wish dead, another whose birth might diminish their own importance, a saying of one Nietzsche, no "stick-in-the-mud" conservative: "What thou dost not love—pass it by."

* * * * *

FOR his part he finds the little world to which he has access quite stirring. His only regret is that what happens in New York cannot be spread to Wilkes-Barre and Dallas and to all the Springfields and Columbias and Liberties of the land. He has been uplifted by Shaw's "Saint Joan"—which Mr. George Jean Nathan thinks a contemptible performance—and dazzled, at least, by "The Miracle," and both charmed and instructed by "Fashion." He dropped in at the Metropolitan to hear "Lohengrin" the other night. He had not heard it for many years; once more the old magician got hold of him and made all other composers of the lyric stage seem thin and jejune and shallow. And he found not only the rapture of that still incomparable music but, more than ever, the well-grounded philosophy of the fable, with its fine implication that the world will not accept nobility, will not even accept its own salvation unless the bringer of it displays the pedigrees of death and dust.

* * * * *

NEXT afternoon—or was it the afternoon before?—the Drifter saw Irene Triesch and Max Montor and their excellent associates do "Rosmersholm" in German. And though he knows his Ibsen reasonably well, he found a hundred new meanings in this interpretation. The players had brought the authentic Ibsen tradition, both in life and in literature, of Northern and Central Europe. Again he was both enchanted and instructed, and also, after the mumbling of Broadway pleased with the bell-like clarity of the diction of these players. But when he opened the papers next morning he found no notice of the event and he wondered why a first-rate production of a modern classic in a language of which most cultivated people have a smattering seemed so unimportant and a performance of "The Death of Pazukhin," by one Mikhail Saltikov-Shtchedrin, in a language of which neither the Drifter nor any local critic understands one syllable, seemed so important. And he could not help thinking of several of the kinds of idols mentioned by Bacon in a passage which, he suspects, is not much read or pondered by our critics either.

* * * * *

IN a gallery off Fifth Avenue the Drifter found some astonishing modern paintings by the Spaniards Ramon and Valentin Zubiaurre—magnificently realized Spanish peasants, blood, bone, and muscle compositions both crashing and harmonious and infinitely curious backgrounds painted in almost Byzantine perspective as though the painters meant to tell us something of the primitive mental horizon of these robust and splendid creatures. Around the corner, on Fifth Avenue itself, he ran into an exhibition of Rembrandt etchings and Dürer drawings and hardly knew which to prefer—the earth-rooted magnificence of the one or the soaring imagination of the other.

* * * * *

IT is not that he does not admire either new things or Russian things. He admires the Moscow Art Theater thoroughly, even as he does Rimsky-Korsakoff's lovely if not precisely rich "Coq d'Or." What he would like to see is more catholicity and more joy, a wider range of appreciations than Hazlitt or Lamb had, but something of their gusto, something of their delight. Art exists to be enjoyed—a simple fact, often forgotten.

Correspondence

These People Must Be Helped!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: After a stay of many happy and fruitful months in this bountiful land I returned to my native shores some weeks ago. As we neared the German coast, after a stormy passage, my heart was filled with grave fears of the misery and suffering which I should find. On the other hand, I was happy in the thought that I was carrying with me a generous gift from Americans who had come to the aid of the sufferers in the Rhine-Ruhr region.

The difficulties which beset the traveler in the occupied district are many and trying. All railroad traffic is crippled, and the great network of lines which formerly assured such excellent connections between the Rhineland and the rest of Germany is now practically useless. Trains under the French regime move slowly. Railway stations are unutterably filthy. I was told that three French operating companies had failed and a fourth one was to try its hand. I finally arrived at Cologne.

During my brief stay I kept my eyes open in order to get a clear picture of the situation. I can only say that the misery is indescribable. The best proof of this is the fact that the soup kitchens thus far established are unable to cope with the dire need. Many must go away hungry, for the daily ration is quickly used up. Only recently a British charitable organization opened five soup kitchens in Cologne, and yet daily I saw men, women, and children eagerly searching through garbage pails in the forlorn hope of finding there something edible—people whose dress and bearing told plainly that they had seen better days. I could not help calling to mind the picture of garbage pails I had seen in New York, too frequently exhibiting half loaves of white bread, large chunks of meat, and much fruit, all going to waste. Every human heart must be roused to revolt at the sight of great numbers of undernourished children, and of starving, freezing men and women that storm the soup kitchens organized everywhere in Germany through American kindheartedness.

Great as the need is, however, there is an earnest endeavor among persons of all classes to help those needier than themselves. On every hand local charitable organizations are doing what they can, and special effort is made to reach those classes who are too proud to let their need be seen. There are numerous families who, when their means at all permit it, take in as their guests poor children, or young students, or those incapacitated for work. Large sums, considering the circumstances, are raised within Germany. Quite recently several banks in Berlin gave 700,000 gold marks for the special purpose of furnishing food and fuel for the aged and the sick. To anyone seeing these things with his own eyes it becomes at once apparent that the reports received here from time to time of scenes of revelry and extravagance in German restaurants, and of lack of interest or indifference to the need all about, are greatly exaggerated.

It goes without saying that relief work even on the grandest scale cannot reach the root of the evil. But it can save human lives, it can encourage self-help, it can through natural, kind, human sympathy with striving fellow-creatures help a new Europe to rise and stand on a better and more solid foundation.

The roots of the evil are to be found in the present political situation and can be exterminated only from within when Germany is again on the road to recovery and in a position to work. In the meantime a tremendous task lies before us. So many suffer innocently. So many children were born after the war into conditions of which they are blameless. So many undernourished mothers give birth to children who will be weakened for life.

These people must be helped! To further this work is my duty and privilege and the purpose of my efforts in this great-hearted country, and I returned to its hospitable shores, a few days ago, with the happy conviction that its people will continue the effective support thus far given.

The Golden Rule in Europe

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Do as you would be done by" should undoubtedly have been the principle of the Allies at Versailles. Lately, however, a small doubt has crept into my mind. I think even The Nation congratulated Denmark on its good sense in not accepting as much of its old domain of Schleswig as the suspiciously generous Allies were willing to give it and as a tiny misguided Conservative Danish minority was willing to take. The people rose in a general strike against this, there was as much noise as Denmark ever permits itself, and the chauvinists lost.

The new border was fixed not according to Danish legal right, but according to the justest of plebiscites. A minority of Germans remained in Danish territory, and an equal minority of Danes in German. As a Swedish paper says, the Danish Government then proceeded to treat its German subjects not as the Danes themselves had been treated, nor as some minorities in the new states are now being treated—according to the old Prussian recipe—but as they hoped their brothers across the border might be treated. The Germans were allowed the fullest freedom of language in school, church, and court, as well as the rights of Danish citizens. At the same time the Danes continued to feed starving German and Austrian children as they are yet doing, thousands and thousands of them came to the Danish farms, although the German authorities in the city of Flensburg refused to allow a few Danish children to go for a vacation visit to their mother country. Still that was overlooked as a little lack of tact.

It is more difficult even for angelic patience to overlook the debate in the Prussian Landtag during the first week in February of this year. At that debate, every party—German National, People's, Center, Democrats, and Socialists—agreed that the new Schleswig border was "in accordance neither with justice nor morals."

So much for the golden-rule, self-sacrificial, do-as-you-would-be-done-by border!

What is the use? A good conscience is of course a pleasant thing to have, and the Danes can warm themselves at that while interpreting the cold resolution of Prussia, and waiting for the day when Germany will be strong enough again to fine the Schleswig girls for wearing red and white.

One begins to understand the French a little better.

Do Conventions Repeat Themselves?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Now that another presidential year has come around it is perhaps profitable to recall some of the unpublished incidents of the National Republican Convention in June, 1920.

I remember that when I arrived in Chicago a few days in advance, one of my lieutenants told me that Harding would be nominated and outlined with considerable detail just what the procedure would be. Subsequent events proved that he was right. The followers of Lowden and Leonard Wood, not realizing that the cards were stacked against them, were pitted against each other until the deadlock was complete. Then they were brutally eliminated and their votes were gradually shifted to Harding, the preordained Penrose candidate, until only a few more votes were needed. Then the votes of the Pennsylvania delegation, heretofore held in reserve, were thrown into the balance and Penrose had nominated Harding, as the Pennsylvania Senator frankly announced a few hours later.

Hiram Johnson, who at that time enjoyed possibly the largest measure of public sentiment among the Republican voters, was kept sitting outside the convention in a taxicab waiting for the invitation which never came, while inside a few sincere Johnson delegates, notably the Montana delegation, reminded the convention of his existence by stubbornly voting for Johnson throughout the proceedings.

The La Follette delegation were hissed every time La Follette or Wisconsin was mentioned. Their chairman was mobbed when he endeavored to deliver the minority report of the platform committee. After Harding had been nominated, some foolish delegate moved that the nomination be made unanimous, and when the Johnson and La Follette men conscientiously voted against this motion, quick as a flash the tense feeling against them came to a head in the shape of a motion duly made and seconded that all those who had voted in the negative should be physically ejected from the floor of Convention Hall.

A moment more and the Republican Convention, which had just reached an "harmonious" conclusion, would have been the scene of a disgraceful riot, but Senator Lodge (who sensed the seriousness of the situation), instead of putting the motion, banged the gavel and declared the convention adjourned.

Poincaré vs. France

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A striking illustration of the two conflicting conceptions of the true interest of France is contained in a Paris dispatch to the New York Times of March 3, 1924:

The French public, of which only a part had begun to feel really confident of the general situation, was frightened by the new fall of the franc; more particularly so when the drop in price was accompanied by numerous "bear rumors." The principal rumor of this sort [note: "bear rumor"] alleged that Poincaré would refuse to abandon the working of the Ruhr railways, even though France received in exchange a pledge on the whole German railway situation. From this it was argued that no agreement concerning reparations could possibly be arrived at. It was while this rumor circulated, and chiefly on account of it, that the franc gave way last week without meeting serious resistance from Paris.

There were M. Poincaré and his admirers, who thought they promoted France's economic interest by refusing to give up the German railroads in the Ruhr; and yet the Paris public was less "confident of the general situation," and the franc gave way "chiefly on account of this rumor": that Poincaré would continue his attempt to safeguard France's interest by his method of force and coercion. Is it not a strange paradox that public sentiment among the French people should almost subconsciously reject his point of view and rally to that of the British Labor Government?

JOHN MEZ

On Pre-Adamic Hottentots, Mencken, The Nation, and Others

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My attention is called to what I take to be an editorial article in your journal for January 9, under the title What to Do with the Doughtys, seconding the gas attack of H. L. Mencken, made on this writer, in the Literary Review of the New York Evening Post, for November 24, 1923. The writer of your article is a jazz performer, but he crooks a wicked elbow in his raucous playing of second fiddle. I think you will take it as a compliment when I say you play second fiddle to H. L. Mencken; but I do not mean it as such. I think there is no one of so puerile a mind or so circumscribed or contemptible an outlook as ought to condemn him to that place in the chorus of the "diabetic" tribe, as he names you in the Literary Review.

All I object to in your delightful defense of the Art of Obscenity, and the doctrine of Freedom for the Worst, is the determination shown in your article to second H. L. Mencken even in his mistakeness or mendacity of statement as to facts. Whether he knew or no, your writer knew, from the article in the Dallas News, which he quotes in part, that I am no professor of a college, nor in any way ever so remotely connected with the "university Gelehrten," as meaninglessly and spitefully said by H. L. Mencken in his article in the Review. Why you thought it would add weight to your condemnation of my stand for decency even in what you call "art," to falsely report me as a university professor, I leave to a psychological diagnosis of the freak mentality of the writer of the article in The Nation.

I am a practicing lawyer in the courts of Texas, and have been all the years of my maturity; and nothing I said in the Alcalde, of Austin, Texas, for January, 1923, would remotely remind any one having the critical acumen of a pre-Adamic Hottentot, of anything ever said by Professor Brownell, Beers, Georg Brandes, Erskine, or the rest, with whose names my name was so fatuously connected by H. L. Mencken.

In my reply to H. L. Mencken I used the phrase of pathologic nomenclature, "delusion of grandeur," in a figurative and satiric sense; but not here, where I am confronted with your writer's definition of himself—"We ourselves, liberal critics . . . thinkers." That is on page 26 of your journal for January 9, 1924.

My space here, of course, is too circumscribed to allow me to do other than scrappily understate my position toward your diatribe. I can only say here at the end of the inadequate space granted me that bearing in mind "the fear of the Doughtys" which the writer naively admits, it would appear likely that the seeming boldness and frenzy of his attack is but the hysteria of congenital timidity, startled into insolence. As to his expressed desire to purge what he calls his soul of all that "remotely resembles Doughty," I will say to him, and to all the mute, inglorious manikins of his kind, and as simplifying his problems, that providence graciously awarded me that total differentiation, when it made him what he is.

French Treachery

The Treachery of France. By C. J. C. Street, M.C., O.B.E. Allan and Company.

IT would be hard to imagine a more difficult problem than that with which French imperialists have confronted the British Government. The problem is that of using our influence to mitigate French oppression and militarism without becoming anti-French and creating the kind of atmosphere which ultimately leads to war. It is fortunate indeed that Labor is in office at this moment, since Conservatives are willing to acquiesce in the ruin of Germany, while Liberals apparently would not object to a war with France.

Mr. Street's book is an enumeration of the crimes of France during the last five years. It does not aim at impartiality; it is the case for the prosecution. The case is ably stated, and the main facts are undeniable. Let us first review the facts, and then consider the verdict. It must be remembered that we are speaking throughout of the acts of the French Government, which may be repudiated by the French people in the forthcoming general election, just as Lloyd George has been repudiated by Great Britain.

The broad facts are well known. Under cover of a pretended fear for her own security, France has refused to abandon compulsory military service, and, while refusing to honor her debt to England and America, has found large sums for loans to Poland, Yugoslavia, and Rumania, to be spent mainly on military needs supplied by France. The sums involved are 400 million francs to Poland, 300 million francs to Yugoslavia, and 100 million francs to Rumania. In the last case, the avowed purpose is "for the purchase of war materials to be bought exclusively in France under supervision of the French 'Service Interministeriel'." The result of French alliances and loans is that the entire military strength of the Continent (omitting Italy, Hungary, Russia, and un-military neutrals) is controlled by France, whose position is quite as strong as in the time of Napoleon.

Some of the least defensible of French actions have been done under the aegis of the League of Nations, which, as at present constituted, must be regarded as a department of the Quai d'Orsay. Two instances are dealt with at length by Mr. Street, namely, Silesia and the Saar. According to the Treaty of Versailles, the status of Upper Silesia was to be decided by a plebiscite. With designs on Silesian coal, France was very anxious that Poland should win in the voting; Polish terrorist bands were imported, and people who voted for Germany did so at great risk. Nevertheless 717,122 votes were cast for Germany, and 483,514 for Poland. The League of Nations therefore decided that Upper Silesia should be partitioned in such a way as to render it industrially useless to Germany and as profitable as possible to Poland. The case of the Saar is even more remarkable. By the Treaty of Versailles, the French were to have the coal, while the administration of the territory was to be by the League of Nations until 1935, when there should be a plebiscite. The League of Nations was to govern by means of a commission, containing a French member, a member representative of the Saar, and three others. The others chosen were a Belgian (who of course sides with France), a Dane who had lived all his life in Paris and was repudiated by Denmark, and a Canadian. The representative chosen by the League of Nations to represent the Saar was one of the very few individuals with French sympathies living in the district. After some years of power he was convicted of perjury in the courts, but was saved from arrest by his immunity as a commissioner. However, the incident led to his resignation. It is interesting to observe that the Saar Commission punishes with five years' imprisonment any person who speaks disrespectfully of the Treaty of Versailles.

Mr. Street devotes a chapter to French dealings with the Turks. On this subject, however, perhaps the less said by Englishmen the better. It is of course true that the French behavior in making a separate treaty with the Angora Government was incorrect, but in substance it was a better policy than ours. British policy throughout the Near East ever since the armistice has been one long record of perfidy and cruelty. I hope, though not very confidently, that the present Government will do something to put things right by evacuating Mesopotamia and Palestine, making friends with the Egyptian nationalists, and confining its authority to the Canal and the South Persian oil fields. If it does this, it will be in a better position to suggest sacrifices to the French.

The gravamen of the charge against France is French policy in the Rhineland and the Ruhr. It would be difficult to find anything much worse than this policy in the whole history of civilized governments; for cold-blooded cruelty it puts even Czarist Russia in the shade. The French have a twofold object, strategic and economic: to establish the Rhine frontier and to secure their supremacy in coal and iron. It must not be supposed that their plans are fantastic and impossible; on the contrary, they are now seen to be more feasible than anybody in this country supposed.

Under the Treaty of Versailles, the Allies occupied German territory on the west bank of the Rhine, as security for reparations. The occupation was to be purely military, leaving the civil government to the Germans; it was to cease when (if ever) the Germans had completed the payment of reparations. None of the occupied territory was to be annexed by any of the Allies. A year ago the Americans withdrew, and the British are confined in Cologne, with French occupied territory surrounding them on all sides. Thus virtually the French are left alone in the Rhineland. As they cannot annex the country, they have hit on an ingenious expedient. Under the treaty, they had a right to disarm the population (except a small number of police); this right they exercised strictly. They then let it be known that arms would be given to those who chose to accept service under the French. The only people who accepted were criminals—burglars, brothel keepers, etc. These people therefore were sent armed among an unarmed population. They were instructed to demand separation from the German Reich and the creation of a Rhineland republic. Bands of them were collected by the French and sent by special trains first to one town and then to another. For instance, in Düsseldorf, on the seventh of last October, the separatist armed bands attacked all who showed lack of sympathy with their propaganda. The police undertook the protection of the law-abiding population, but the French troops intervened on behalf of the separatists. After they had disarmed the police and separated them into small groups, they stood by while separatists beat policemen to death.

The occupation of the Ruhr, in the opinion of the law officers of the late British Government, was illegal under the Treaty of Versailles, but it was necessary in order to acquire coke for the Lorraine iron ore. The incidents of this occupation being so recent, one may perhaps assume that they have not yet been forgotten. The author makes much of the economic menace to British industry, which undoubtedly caused Mr. Baldwin's hasty adoption of protection. He points out that France owns or controls three-fifths of the coal of Europe, which is two and a half times as much as we have; at the same time she owns or controls half the output of iron ore in Europe. Against this, however, is to be set the destructiveness of the French in the Ruhr, which makes it certain that that region cannot for many years regain its former productiveness. It is doubtful whether the French and the Poles have the capacity for great industrial development, though they certainly now have the material requisites.

The most terrible chapter in Mr. Street's book is that on colored troops. He proves conclusively not only what is obvious a priori, that these troops are constantly guilty of the worst moral offenses, often of an unnatural kind, but also, what could hardly have been guessed, that they are encouraged in this conduct by the authorities.

The moral to be drawn from such facts is not a simple one. The natural reaction of a man not belonging to a nation allied with the French is to conclude that they are exceptionally wicked, and that all would be well if they were suppressed. People had this view of the Germans, but it has since turned out that some who are not Germans are not saints. The French are not worse than other people; they are only stronger. Every nation does as much evil as it dare; therefore the strongest does most. The Americans and English made France strong under the ridiculous notion that original sin is confined to Germany; the Americans then withdrew from Europe, and invited us to make the best of the hell they helped to create. Nay, more, for the sake of oil and Messrs. Morgan's investments, America has taken sides with France whenever she has taken sides at all. It is clear, therefore, that America shares the moral responsibility with France. As for Great Britain, not only did we, in a fit of vindictive madness against Germany, give France the means of acquiring her present position, but our own record is scarcely better. The chief difference is that our worst acts of oppression are in Asia and Africa, while those of France are in Europe. To subject a white population to a colored garrison is horrible; to subject a colored population to a white garrison is equally horrible, though no one among the white nations seems to think so.

No good will come from forcible suppression of the French by other imperialistic nations; the victors will only take over the vices of the vanquished. The French must be made to see for themselves that a policy of sheer military violence does not pay. There is one way by which this can be done: let America demand interest on the French debt. Great Britain cannot make this demand, for fear of French aeroplanes. But if America makes it, either the French agree, in which case they can no longer afford to finance their own vast armaments and those of their Allies; or they refuse, in which case they are bankrupt, the franc falls with a rush, and they can no longer borrow, which makes them incapable of conducting a long war and makes Great Britain therefore able to undertake the reconstruction of Germany. Such a demand on the part of America would be merely a return to neutrality as between France and England. The objection to it is that it might impoverish Messrs. Morgan. There is no other.

BERTRAND RUSSELL

Sic Semper Tyrannis

The Deportations Delirium of 1920. A Personal Narrative of an Historic Official Experience. By Louis F. Post. Charles H. Kerr and Company. $1.50.

FOR the benefit of those who do not know him, let it be said that Louis F. Post was Assistant Secretary of Labor of the United States during the eight years of the Wilson Administration, and that during the months of March and April, 1920, by reason of the illness of Secretary Wilson and the absence of Solicitor Abercrombie, he was by operation of law the official head of the Department of Labor for all matters dealing with the immigration laws. As such it became his official duty to review the records of the cases of the twenty-five hundred odd aliens who had been arrested for deportation in the so-called "red crusade" conducted by Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer during the early days of 1920. This volume is the story of what he found in those records; of the unlawful acts and the tyrannous practice of the Department of Justice; and of the attack of hysterics which made the Attorney General of the United States timid lest the government be overthrown by a handful of foreign-born radical theorists. It is an amazing story, and in telling it Mr. Post has contrived to combine an ease of narrative with a restraint of statement and a wealth of sound legal reasoning in such a manner that the reader is at once fascinated, astounded,

The narrative begins with the sailing, just before Xmas 1919, of the Buford, that "Soviet Ark" on which, we were told by an excitable press, were being deported "249 blasphemous creatures who . . . sought by a campaign of assassination and terrorism to ruin America as a nation of free men." Mr. Post now tells us most convincingly that the evidence in their cases did not justify "a rational inference" that any of them was a dangerous conspirator.

Then comes the story of Mr. Palmer's "red crusade." It tells of warrants of arrest issued in "job lots" based on affidavits upon mimeographed forms "sworn to by supervising detectives upon information reported by subordinate detectives. The affidavits seldom had any other information; their informants often had none at all." These affidavits were often defective. "Some were not sworn to. Some were not even signed by the affiant. Some were blank as when they were ground out by the mimeographing machine except for names and wear and tear." The story tells of arrests totaling several thousands of people upon warrants thus issued, and in hundreds of cases without any warrant at all. It tells of the breaking into and entering without search warrant or lawful process of clubrooms, meeting-places, and private homes, and the search of persons and premises. It tells of the confinement of the persons thus arrested under unsanitary and shocking conditions for many days, and often for weeks and months. It tells of the attempt (fortunately frustrated) to hold those arrested incommunicado and under excessive bail. And, above all, it makes it abundantly clear that for these shameful things the responsibility rested squarely upon A. Mitchell Palmer and his subordinate and appointee William J. Flynn.

Mr. Palmer's only relevant retort to those who have criticized these practices has been to say that when you are "trying to protect the community against moral rats you sometimes get to thinking more of your trap's effectiveness than of its lawful construction." This is, of course, a nice sentiment for the chief law officer of the government to be entertaining, but, aside from its more subtle aspects, it raises the question of whether those caught in Mr. Palmer's trap were or were not "moral rats." Upon this point what did Mr. Post find the evidence to be? Well, in the first place, he found that the trap caught a great many persons whom even Mr. Palmer did not intend to catch. Hundreds, if not a thousand or so, including many citizens, were arrested, held incommunicado for periods varying from some hours to some days, only to be released without having any charge of any sort preferred against them. For the rest, some 2,500 were held under warrants of deportation. These were the cases which it was Mr. Post's duty to examine and decide. Of the many grotesque injustices which he found in the records, space forbids mention here. Suffice it to say that of the 2,500 odd cases, deportation was finally ordered in only 562. The rest were set free because Mr. Post did not find in the records any evidence at all of conduct for which they could be deported. The potential "moral rats" were accordingly not more than 562 in number, and not the four or five thousand whom the Department of Justice had arrested. But what of the 562? Mr. Post finds that in no instance was it shown that the offending aliens had been connected in any way with bomb-throwing or bomb-making. No explosives were discovered, nor trace of any, nor any firearms except four pistols personally owned, and some guns in the "property room" of an amateur theatrical group. . . . In nearly every deportation case the record disclosed nothing but some variety of proof of mere technical membership in one or another organization which the Secretary of Labor had held to be within the proscription of the alien deportation laws. And in most of these cases it was apparent that the alien had neither suspicion nor cause for suspicion that the organization was unlawful. . . . There were a few cases in which the aliens were proved to hold "anarchistic" opinions. But in all these in which the proof was at all clear, the "anarchistic" opinions were of the extreme pacifist type. A single instance of any anarchistic opinion of the violent revolutionary type was as great a curiosity as a "sport" in a herd of cattle.

And that is the end of Mr. Palmer's "moral rat" justification.

In telling this story Mr. Post has done us a great service, but the service for which we are all inestimably in his debt is another. It is his official actions during the deportations delirium. In a time of great excitement, under enormous pressure, with a hail of ignorant criticism beating upon his head, he had the poise, the clarity of vision, and the courage not to be stampeded by a timid and vindictive Attorney General, and to protect the weakest and most despised of our population in the rights to which they were entitled under the law. The extraordinary bit of history which he now relates may shake the faith of some of us in the ways of government, but it will make us all unite in thanks that at such a time Louis F. Post was on the job.

ALBERT DESILVER

Crowned by the Boosters' Club

The Midlander. By Booth Tarkington. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

MR. TARKINGTON is by general consent our most skilful describer of the ordinary citizen as that citizen sees himself. Yet I, for one, should prefer to consider "The Midlander" a libel, for it does indeed speak for the millions, making articulate their aims and ideals, and if it does represent, as its author seems to intend that it shall, the best type that our American civilization has produced, then the "American spirit" is the shabbiest excuse for a national religion that any country ever had. Provided as he is with a novelist's privilege of choosing his incidents and of endowing his characters with whatever attributes he likes, Mr. Tarkington has deliberately chosen to tell a story in which nothing important is at stake and no central character is ever concerned about anything that cannot be seen and touched. Once, America was the home of the puritan, and however hard or narrow his heart may have been it at least burned with an intense flame, and his concern was with the soul more than with the goods of man. But, if we are to believe Mr. Tarkington, the extinction of that flame has left nothing except a tepid prudence and a business sense. The avowed defender of the average citizen calmly writes him down as incapable of a passion for anything less tangible than bank returns or of an ideal beyond that of a chamber-of-commerce man. Honest, energetic, kindly his Midlander is made, and these are excellent qualities. But they are no more than a groundwork and leave him as bare as our bitterest satirists say we are of those qualities of imagination and susceptibility to spiritual values which are necessary, not merely to cultivation, but to any dignity of character in peasant or professor. When Mr. Lowes Dickinson, for example, declares that we have no ideal beyond acceleration and that we are incapable of any disinterested intellectual operation he is accusing us of nothing that Mr. Tarkington does not glory in.

The nominal hero of the book is a young man who desires to serve his people and his nation by buying an outlying farm, persuading the street-car company to run a line to it, and then reselling it in small lots for a sufficient sum to make him one of those solid citizens to whom neighbors point as just the sort of man one would expect to come from his fine old pioneer stock. The whole story turns upon the failure or success of a commercial venture, and the real protagonist of the drama is a piece of real estate which is supposed to wring our hearts by its failure to blossom forth as soon as it should into suburban homes. It is, of course, nothing against Mr. Tarkington that his hero is dull and that after taking his B.A. at New Haven he never shows himself capable of an interest, enthusiasm, or valuation which would not be understood and shared by the boy who passed from primary school into a grocery store to weigh sugar or cut lard. That is merely sober realism. But it is something against Mr. Tarkington as an artist that he finds the mere belching forth of smoke in increasing volume and the spreading out of street-car tracks a sufficient proof of national greatness.

Many novelists, from Cooper to Willa Cather, have made pioneering the material of moving novels, but always they have shown what pioneering did to the pioneer, making him a great and heroic figure, whereas Mr. Tarkington attempts to write an epic around a central character who never rises above the level of the enthusiastic realtor. The building of a suburb to a midland city may possibly be as important in the history of the nation as the opening up of the West, but it cannot be made satisfactory material for heroic art unless it can be shown to have molded great men, and this Mr. Tarkington never attempts to show. Some great books ("Tom Jones," for example) are books written about stupid people, but intended to be read by intelligent ones, whereas "The Midlander" would seem to be for as well as about the dull.

This is equivalent to saying that Mr. Tarkington has written a piece of typical magazine fiction, for the essential difference between such writing and literature lies not, as is sometimes supposed, in the moral timidity or imperfect execution of the latter—magazine stories are often revolutionary in tone and admirable in execution—but in the centering of all interest upon material things and the failure to suggest that either the characters or the author realize that other values exist or that what a man feels and is may be as important as what he has or does. Many a book both deserves and gets serious consideration from the critic which is not as well written or as skillfully observed as either "The Midlander" or a large portion of Saturday Evening Post fiction, but which soars above both by virtue of the fact that it does recognize that important things go on inside a man which have no relation to his business career or the growth of cities. From "The Midlander," as from most magazine fiction, one gets the impression that man is a wealth-and-comfort-producing machine and that the function of fiction is the analysis of the efficiency of such a machine; hence to one sort of temperament such work will always seem merely vulgar. But it is not to be forgotten that the point of view has many supporters and that if ever the Boosters' Club should found an academy, "The Midlander" should be the first book crowned.

J. W. KRUTCH

The Growth of Science

Science and Civilization. Edited by F. S. Marvin. Oxford University Press. $4.

THE five previous volumes of the Unity Series, surveying the continuousness of human experience in history and thought, have been of such interest that we are glad to welcome a sixth. This volume, containing a dozen lectures by eminent English scientists, traces step by step the history of science from its earliest beginnings to the present day, with several essays on the influence of science on health, education, and religion, and especially on contemporary social evolution. The essays have been skillfully arranged to follow a certain sequence of thought so that, in spite of the independence of each man in his own opinions, there is an impression of unity of authorship.

J. L. Myres shows the slow progress of early science and the lack of a method of recording the results of experience for the use of future generations. Primitive peoples were paralyzed by fear of the unknown world about them. Even the early Egyptians and Babylonians, advanced as they were in crafts and mechanical arts, were hampered by this fear of the forces of nature—fear of death above all. All advance in science among primitive peoples came from the need for explanation of hunger, sickness, rain, the baffling ways of game and the behavior of dogs and of womankind, their own feelings and imaginations and, above all, their dreams. . . .

The Greeks lived under more favorable conditions and in a more favorable environment. Released from fear of vast inhuman forces, living in the Aegean "paradise," their vision was clearer and with them in the sixth century B.C. the true scientific idea began. "It was not the practice of science that the Greeks invented, but the scientific idea; the conception that the world was knowable inasmuch and in so far as it could be investigated." The noble and advanced ideas and discoveries of Hippocrates and the extent of medical knowledge in the Roman empire under the Greek Galen are treated in an excellent lecture by Charles Singer. The Greeks continued to entertain certain superstitions in regard to disease, in spite of their enlightenment, and the Romans contributed preventive medicine and sanitation and hospitals, in spite of their lack of scientific tastes.

The Greeks also made the greatest advance in biological and geological discoveries. With Aristotle, Alcmaeon, Plato, Galen, Thales, Pythagoras, and Strabo immense progress was made. Mr. Platt sees good reason for the advancement of modern science: "Recognition of the importance of experiment, the habit of testing hypotheses, the invention of the microscope and the telescope and other instruments of all kinds, and the training of a multitude of scientists."

The period of the Middle Ages was the night of scientific development, occasionally lightened by such scattered stars as Hermann the Cripple and Marbod of Anjou. Leonardo da Vinci stands for many as the turning-point toward modern times.

Following these essays are several of varying interest on the influence of science on the modern world. Cecil H. Desch, in writing on Science in the Industrial Revolution, urges that it would be wrong to blame science for the evils of industrialism. It was scientific discovery, misapplied in practice, that made those evils possible. Science is not responsible for its misuse by selfish men. In the last few years the cry has again been raised that materialistic science is responsible for the horrors of war, because chemistry and physics have been applied to the production of more destructive and crueler means of warfare.

J. Arthur Thomson in his Influence of Darwinism and Julian Huxley in his Science and Religion surprise us by making room for religion, although in the latter instance a decidedly scientific and denatured religion. Mr. Thomson thinks that it is only to the shallow-witted that the world has become, through Darwinism, less wonderful, less beautiful, less fundamentally mysterious. The emotional path to religion remains as open as before—perhaps more clearly open, while the fact of evolution remains more firmly fixed than ever, although it, too, has evolved into more satisfactory conclusions.

For what this book offers us we are grateful in an age ruled and dominated by science. LUCY HUMPHREY SMITH

Personalia

Myself Not Least. Being the Personal Reminiscences of "X." Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

THIS, as Mr. Philip Guedalla recently observed with some acerbity, is "the confessional period of English literature." The virtue of frankness, admirable in its place, is practiced to satiety. Yet satiety, which should follow, seems to stay its coming; for the public appetite still assimilates the lesser memoirists with dispatch.

The publisher's business acumen and the author's vanity usually unite in displaying prominently the name of the public's confidant. But the volume of personal reminiscences at hand, "Myself Not Least," is merely signed "X"; modestly, perhaps; perhaps to convey a piquant sense of indiscretion.

"X's" family, he tells us, has been accounted blooded stock in England ever since the Roman invasion. His education was impeccable, socially speaking, for he put in the proper term of residence both at Harrow and Cambridge. He married, traveled in leisurely fashion over the face of Europe, collected celebrities, stood for Parliament, and, one gathers, pursued authorship and politics as graceful ornaments for the dinner table, the club lounge, and the corridors of the House of Commons.

This surprisingly scant autobiographic information is supplied elliptically. Like life itself it comes in various guises and without selection. But the lacunae are given over to the familiar, copious anecdotes of intimacies with the Peers (Burke's, not Mr. Lloyd George's) and the fashionables of London's society and art life during the last few decades.

"My favorite fishing story was told me by James McNeil Whistler." "The first time I saw Zola he had just brought out 'Lourdes.' . . ." "This reminds me of a distinguished Russian general, whom I met at Monte Carlo at Christmas, 1914." "One day Mr. Churchill came into the smoking-room of the House of Commons. . . ."

Personalities, topical references, sly esoteric allusions, little contes thin in content, but rich in association with the beau monde, all come tumbling after one another without rhyme and—But no; there is a reason. "The dead," in Doctor Johnson's terse way of saying, "cannot pay for praise." But the living can.

GERALD HEWES CARSON.

A Spanish Impressionist

Don Juan. By Azorin (Jose Martinez Ruiz). Translated from the Spanish by Catherine Alison Phillips. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THERE is no one in Spanish literature today who in originality or in the influence he is exerting upon Spanish letters goes beyond Azorin. His contribution to Spanish literature is strikingly new. And since he is of the very best Spain can offer the world today, one can only hope that his reception by the American public will be warmer than that offered to Baroja or Unamuno. The way of translations, however—especially from the Spanish—is a strange one. No one can venture to foretell the fortune of this little work of art at the hands of American readers.

This volume is typical of the imaginative work of Azorin. It consists of a collection of narrative sketches deftly held together by a main character and by the mood that runs through its pages. Azorin, who has been greatly influenced by the French, is said to have adapted this form from Anatole France, but he has carried it to its farthest possibility. He is an impressionist. His main concern is with the suggestion of evanescent moods. And to him nature is not important except as a core upon which to build a dream about "the inevitable sadness of things"; upon which to catch, as he puts it, "something more than the ostensible reality about us." He has been called a "philosopher of the commonplace," and this is perhaps the best possible characterization of him. But the commonplace loses in his hands its tedious quality and becomes a thing of exotic beauty. No one has ever brought out of the vulgarities of life such sensuous essence, such disquieting sadness. This is his most important contribution to Spanish literature. He has brought into it the possibility of a new range and of a new concern. And his influence, already beginning to be felt, is acting as an emollient force upon the hardness of spirit and form of Spanish art; an art which, faithful to the genius of the race, suffers from a lack of sensibility, of soft colors, and of quiet moods.

Preoccupied with the blighting power of time Azorin was the first, also, to catch the true soul of the Castile of today. Writers before him, blinded as Spaniards have always been by the memories of their old glories and splendors, thought they yet saw in the ancient Castilian towns the glitter of the past. He has been the first to paint them as they really are, with their gray, decayed beauty hardly ruffled by the futile life that yet remains in them.

His claim to recognition, however, goes deeper yet. As a member of the generation of ninety-eight he waged, in his early years, an indefatigable war against the guardians of that misunderstood tradition which has exercised such nefarious influence upon the whole life of the nation. And although as a sociologist he has not made any original contribution his work has been more fruitful than that of Unamuno or Ganivet, because it has met with greater popularity. With age his propagandist fervor has abated considerably. His later critical works give one the impression—it may be said without malice—that he is flirting with the Academy. But whatever his recent development his revaluation of the classics in modern terms, especially of the drama of the Golden Era, the need of which had long been felt, remains. And if he seems to abandon the colors he so gallantly defended in his youth he cannot undo his early accomplishments.

About this novel, through which Azorin is for the first time made available in English, little more need be said. It is his latest. The Don Juan of Azorin, with his ineffable, somewhat ironic smile, is no longer the vulgar deceiver of Tirso de Molina. He is, rather, a disillusioned old man who realizes the wisdom of Keheleth in time to reform, and who, in the end, achieves perhaps the greatest happiness of which a Spaniard is capable—the peace of the monastery. The English version leaves nothing to be desired. All the subtle poetry of Azorin's prose, all the weary nostalgia that escapes from his pictures, have been preserved in this version.

ELISEO VIVAS

Books in Brief

Travels Through the Interior Parts of America. By Thomas Anburey. Houghton Mifflin Company. 2 vols. $10.

Anburey was a lieutenant in the army of Burgoyne who had something of the civilized temper which marked his general. In the form of letters to a friend, beginning while Anburey was still at Cork, continuing through the stay in Canada, the expedition and the surrender, a year on parole in Massachusetts, a march to Virginia and back with prisoners of war, and his voyage home after the defeat of Cornwallis, this likable Briton set down with a neat pen what he had seen with two sharp eyes. Though a soldier, he tells little which is of great value to the military historian, but his book is full of observations about the domestic life and local characteristics of the Americans. Those inquisitive Yankees, those brutal lower-class Virginians, those gouging traders—how he resented them! And how copiously, if at times credulously, he went into details which after nearly a century and a half seem more fascinating than almost any historical novel devoted to the times. First published in 1789, the "Travels" is now reissued in a superb edition of 525 copies with a preface by Major-General William Harding Carter, U.S.A.

The Sisters Rondoli and Other Stories; Miss Harriett and Other Stories; Bel Ami. By Guy de Maupassant. Translated and edited by Ernest Boyd. Alfred Knopf. 3 vols. $2 each.

Volumes V-VII of this excellent translation contain forty-one short stories and a novel written during the years 1883-85, when the powers of Maupassant were at their height. The fierce little episode here called Mother Savage is perhaps the best known to American readers, but there are a half dozen others of nearly first rank. And the ruthless account, in "Bel Ami," of how a rogue made his way in Paris with the help of a handsome face assuredly belongs with the most striking documents on the bête humaine.

The Praise of Folly. By Bliss Perry. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

After all, it is pleasant—and even profitable—to have a few essayists who stem from the New England tradition. The world has, ostensibly, grown beyond it and grown impatient with it, but there still remains a certain quality of austere exhilaration to be derived from the disciples of Emerson and Lowell, a diminishing category of which Bliss Perry is an admirable exponent. These papers are not revolutionary, but they possess the integrity of a disciplined and alert mind; they say something, and no one who follows them through will be in doubt as to what that is.

Piri and I. By Lawrence Vail. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

Readers whose preference is for novels containing "a lot of conversation" will find this light-waisted romance quite to their taste. One is carried along in a series of dialogues with more cleverness than momentum, and emerges finally well steeped in talk about art, love, and life. The characters contributing to this melange are picturesque, but not noticeably real; their creator has looked upon them through a veil of verbal rhapsody.

A Primer of Higher Space: The Fourth Dimension. By Claude Bragdon. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

This is a simple treatment of aspects of hyperdimensional thought, by one whose mysticism renders him less the clear thinker than the special pleader. From an admirable treatment of the mathematical analogies clarifying the idea of the fourth dimension, he passes more and more deeply into mysticism, until he has identified Christ as the Fourth Dimensional Man, whose ascension into Heaven meant that he "folded up his higher space form, forsook it, and became once more a ray of the One Light." Following this is a weird parody of the Sermon on the Mount entitled The Sermon on the Plane, whose spirit of hyperdimensional reverence cannot save it. Such a union of geometry and Blavatsky will speedily break up from innate incompatibility.

John Marin

THE reputation of John Marin has not been founded on the sensational elements of modernism. Always averse to schools and dogmas, and equally opposed to the fashionable eccentricities of cubes and cones, this distinguished painter has, quite simply, abandoned himself to nature. Year after year he has contemplated the Maine coastline; he has observed shrewdly, and with great intensity, the lines of cliffs, the spurs of small islands, and the shapes of trees and clouds; he has been a student of ships and the moods of the sea; and occasionally, with an ambition somewhat foreign to his temperament, he has recorded in terms of design the geometry of the New York skyscrapers. The result has been an annual production of water-colors which unquestionably will rank with the best ever done in this department of art. His most recent pictures, now showing at the Montross Gallery, represent the complete Marin: here we have the many phases of a devout and venerable passion for nature, and here we may see a technical mastery surpassing anything in modern times. Every resource at the command of the water-colorist has been utilized: the glowing washes of rich and original color have been applied in delicate transparencies to render the variegated play of sunlight on the sea; in most cases the white, untouched spaces serve to accentuate prominent forms, but in the Palisades group the paper has been fully covered in the dramatic manner of Turner; there are landscapes and sea-pieces, sketches of schooners, waves huddled together in a curiously compact fashion, and a number of things which frankly are no more than antic experiments.

Latterly Marin has suffered from the extravagant praise of his supporters. An impressionist in an age when impressionism has been repudiated, he has been counseled or instigated by his admirers to try his hand at intellectual design—thus, I suppose, to get in line with the classic trend of modern thought. But his efforts in this direction, as witnessed by his New York studies and some of those psychic fantasies containing brilliant splashes of color and wanton streaks of charcoal, are explosive and unintelligible. Marin's painting is in no sense intellectual; primarily it is a matter of strong feelings and vivid impressions, an art of subtle arrangements and omissions, akin to Whistler and Monet, though strengthened a little by an acquaintance with Cézanne. One has only to compare it with a truly composed art, that of Claude Lorrain, for instance, to realize the difference between the classic and the romantic points of view. A landscape by Lorrain is not merely an interpretation of nature but a reconstruction as well; it is a symbol of the artist's experiences; based on a fine perception of relationships in which line is arrayed against line, contour added to contour, and mass superimposed upon mass, it attests with power and precision the structural unity of great art. But it would be unjust to Marin to say that his water-colors represent only sensuous reactions to optical phenomena—his poetical concern with trees, waves, and skies is charged with solid conviction, with the desire to project meanings into his pictures. If this were not true his drawing would be nothing more than clever illustration. His ideas are vague, but as a musician of moods and nuances he is unrivaled. The lapses of form characterizing all of his painting, that is, the slurring of unmanageable spaces, cannot be attributed to naturalistic impulses—he has set himself to emphasize what he regards and feels as significant in his immediate impressions. He is not of those who build sequences of forms, who reconstruct the world in a philosophic order; but, on the other hand, he is not trying to play a losing game with the camera, and to imitate with expert mechanics little corners of atmosphere.

With the close of the first cycle of modernism, Marin finds himself in an anomalous position. Of all Americans who have come to the front in that remarkable plastic revival emanating from Cézanne, he is the most finished and mature—yet he is practically without influence. Younger painters disapprove of his poetry, and assert that his conceptions are wanting in measure, completeness, and design. As regards the poetry, I can only say that it is his most valuable asset. In truth, his pictures are held together by the warmth and fervor of his first impressions, and without the poetic content even his supreme technical skill could not raise his water-colors above the level of descriptive sketches. It is only the narrow-minded advocates of lifeless abstractions who object to poetry in art. Design is another matter. It is through this constructive element that the hand of man enters art, that painting is humanized and differentiated from the lawless world of nature. Design, of course, being a product of reason and imagination, robs art of its spontaneity and freshness; and those who prefer these qualities, with the added charm of color and fine workmanship, will continue to back Marin against the intellectuals.

THOMAS CRAVEN

Drama Mirage

WHAT is there about "Fata Morgana," the new Theater Guild play at the Garrick, that touches one so deeply? It is the author's innocence, his uncorrupted mind, his tender piety toward life. I shall be accused of paradox-mongering. I shall be told that this Hungarian, Ernst Vajda, has, as a matter of fact, told a dramatic anecdote sufficiently scabrous. But when I am told that I shall but be convinced more strongly that most people have lost that lovely innocence and do not know what natural piety is, that they and their literary judgments are three parts envy born of repression and the fretfulness that comes of sick nerves and sick consciences. . . .

From one point of view "Fata Morgana" is a play of adolescence. But the scene is in the country, on the great central Hungarian plain, and it has little to do with the terrible "Frühlings Erwachen" of Frank Wedekind. I am sure, on the other hand, that Vajda is well acquainted with Max Halbe's "Jugend," which touches with so exquisite a hand the poetry and tragedy of youth. "Fata Morgana" has perhaps less aroma than "Jugend" but it has more wisdom and is one of the few plays extant which has an overwhelmingly right ending—an ending which, on the one hand, avoids definiteness, since there is none in life, and, on the other, refuses to use the rare event of a violent death as a typical solution. Vajda knows with Schnitzler that the significance of things lies in the fact that, having been, they are forever. He also knows that this reality of the past is nothing loud or external but is an added strain in the music of life. . . .

This "gymnasiast" of eighteen who stands at the center of the play goes through a tremendous experience. He is pure and ardent. His fashionable cousin by marriage from the city gives him one night—a night, to him, of unspeakable poetry and exaltation. Then she flees; she forces him to lie to her husband concerning what has happened. What can he, poor boy, do for her? She needs a summer at Ostend and a certain emerald ring and clothes and plays and distraction. And so in two short days George knows the utmost glory and the utmost disillusion that life can offer. He returns to his studies. And what I mean by the natural piety toward life that Vajda has is this, that he makes us feel, as is indeed most true, that this experience has been to George not a corrupting but an enriching one and will echo in his heart forever. And the people who fail to see this fail also to understand natural piety.

In this, too, Vajda shows his uncorrupted attitude, that Mrs. Fey, the mondaine from Budapest, knows perfectly the preciousness of what the boy has given her; she is not unaware of the sordidness of that coil of things in which she is ensnared. But she is so ensnared. She can no more get free of all that than she can be born again. She returns to her rather empty feasts and flirtations. What she and George have seen is, they being what they are, only a mirage, only like the fata morgana of the hot Puszta sands. But its beauty was real, more real than anything in the business of life to which both must return—a sea more magical than any that beats upon an earthly shore, pinnacles more dreamlike and golden than they will ever behold. Thus they are both enriched. "Hæc olim meminisse juvat."

As in the play the poetry is the poetry of life itself, so the directors of the Guild have been faithful to the concreteness of atmosphere, character, and event that is to be shown. There is no attempt at a facile Americanization here. But the concrete is the universal. And by leaving the play so characteristically Hungarian the production makes it profoundly human. It is impertinent to speak of decoration. An interior is provided that breathes the essence of these lives. Beyond the window is one of those scenes in which Lee Simonson, more than any other scenic artist I know, makes nature and the flavor of a given landscape alive for us. To the singularly satisfying railroad embankment in "Liliom," to the indication of spring in "Beyond Our Strength" he now adds the glow and dream of the Puszta.

The directing is delightful, full of life and humor and zest; the acting is admirable. Morgan Farley convinces me that he is eighteen and pure and ardent. He never, like Glenn Hunter, cleverly assumes this lovely kind of youthfulness. His performance touches the heart. Miss Emily Stevens is less mannerized, more natural, less hard and glittering than she has been for years, and Miss Helen Westley gives one of those performances of hers that have a certain classical quality in definiteness, edge, bitingness, and ease of execution. Josephine Hull, William Ingersoll, and Orlando Daly give such admirable performances in minor parts that I am more convinced than ever—as I am constantly at Guild plays—that what we generally lack is not actors who can act but directors who will not insist on artificial mouthing and gesturing, who, like Philip Moeller, will let the actors act and help them to make truth and nature prevail.

The Crisis in the German Unions

By SYLVIA KOPALD

THE pressure of events has pushed the German unions far from the triumphs of November, 1918. Today the unions that ruled Germany for six crucial weeks (November 9 to December 20, 1918) are fighting for their lives. So grave has their position become that the labor movement throughout the world is coming to their aid. Naturally the German unions devote a good part of their shrunken journals to a discussion of the causes of this crisis that confronts them. They find them, on the whole, in the operation of six major forces: the collapse of Germany's industrial life, the fall in the value of the mark, the employers' offensive against hard-won union conditions, the practical disappearance of union funds, the occupation of the Ruhr, and internal dissension.

It was in 1923 that the effects of these forces drew to a dangerous head, but the unions place their origins at an earlier time. In the review of the past which it published in its New Year issue Der Bauarbeiter (the Building Trades Worker), organ of the left wing expelled from the Building Trades Union, said:

What must we do now? The five years of bureaucratic democracy, the coalition with the bourgeoisie, the Social Democratic policy of reconstructing capitalist industry, the policy of promises and of withholding the working masses from the war against exploitation and slavery have certainly not lifted the working class out of its misery. They have rather increased that misery and surrendered the working masses unconditionally to the bourgeoisie. As a result of the policies of the Social Democrats and the trade-union leaders, 1923 ended with a complete defeat of the German proletariat. . . . The theft of the eight-hour day, the fall in wages, the abolition of workers' control, the introduction of ever-harder toil was forced upon the workers without much difficulty.

Der Grundstein (the Brickbuilder) is less bitter in its review of the past, but explains its bleakness in similar terms:

We were going to write a review of the year that has just passed. We were going to write about the occupation of the Ruhr last January, of the depreciation of the mark, of the attack upon wages, of the abandonment of passive resistance in the Ruhr, of the collapse of industry, of the great unemployment, and of the brutal offensive launched by the employers, who are trying to utilize their industrial power to force unlimited working hours and starvation wages upon the workers. But we leave our review of the past with such mere mention. The space of Der Grundstein is severely limited and its interests are many. It is true that we can learn from the past. It is still truer that we must consider our immediate present and our future.

Yet consideration of the present and future reveals nothing to the journals but the continued operation of destructive forces. The collapse of Germany's industrial life is bringing benumbing misery to the workers through unemployment and shrinking wages, which, in turn, inevitably limit the workers' ability to continue their effective participation in union activity. In its issue of February 2 Der Fachgenosse, organ of the Glassworkers' Union, explains how serious the problem of unemployment has become:

Although a slight improvement is noticeable in certain branches of production, the extent of unemployment is still terrifyingly great. Lack of work marks not only the municipal and state industries, but private enterprises as well. . . . In unoccupied Germany there were about 1½ millions unemployed in the middle of December—23 per cent of the trade-union membership—while those on short time numbered 1¼ millions. In occupied Germany the unemployed numbered 3½ millions, while 4 millions were on part time. One-half of Germany's workers have inadequate opportunity for work; fully one-quarter have no opportunity whatsoever.

Der Rote Bergarbeiter (the Revolutionary Mine Worker) calls for the organization of the unemployed as a means of grappling with this problem.

Wages are depressed to rock-bottom by this unemployment and, in addition, the great depreciation of the mark. The workers get little, and what they get is worth less—since, as Ludwig Quessel points out in the Sozialistische Monatshefte, “0 + 0 = 12,000,000,000” in Germany's fantastic currency. During November and December many of the journals reported new wage-rate agreements. These are the first agreements under the new plan of “gold-basis wages.” The building workers appear to top the list with a range of from 50 to 75 pfennig (37 to 55 pre-war pfennig).

Der Kommunistische Gewerkschafter (the Communist Unionist) points out that 1 gold mark on November 5 was worth 100,000,000,000 paper marks. In his Bulletin of Financial Politics, Dr. Kuczynski said:

The minimum wage per day absolutely necessary to support life in November, 1923 [in Greater Berlin], was the following:

1,675,000,000 marks for a single man.

2,571,000,000 marks for a childless married couple.

3,346,000,000 marks for a married couple with 2 children between 6 and 10 years of age.

In other words, the new gold-basis wage contracts tend to write into the wage-rates an average standard of living from 65 to 80 per cent lower than that of the pre-war period. The Government has declared openly for this “road to economic salvation.” The national unions have issued a joint protest against it.

How seriously this misery of its members menaces the life of the unions may be gauged from such appeals as the following with which Der Fachgenosse headlines its issue:

MORE IMPORTANT THAN EVER IS UNITY AND SOLIDARITY TODAY

The employers' offensive can be repulsed only if every trade unionist always fulfils his duty like a loyal and class-conscious comrade. In such dire necessity it is really a very little thing to ask.

The depreciation of the mark has exerted a twofold influence in precipitating the present crisis. By strengthening the employers it has made possible a stern offensive against labor's hard-won conditions, especially the eight-hour day. At just this crucial time it has practically wiped out the unions' funds. Thus far the unions have patriotically refused to invest in foreign currency.

Der Bauarbeiter begins its discussion of the offensive against labor's working hours with a warning:

Thus far and no further! For years the German building trades unions have been in retreat. Step by step the employers have captured one position after another.

With every defeat the reformist leaders have lost an important milestone in the general improvement of workers' conditions. The building trades unions have fallen often enough. Now we are faced with the final battle for the eight-hour day. Now it is essential that the building workers enter the fight without illusions, clearly recognizing that peace between workers and capitalists is impossible.

The more conservative journals (Der Grundstein and Der Fachgenosse) accept the essentials of this position. Der Grundstein warns its readers, as follows:

The "holy war" has begun. With wild war cries the capitalists and their hirelings storm the legal working day and working conditions. . . . It will now lie with the workers to defeat these ruthless attempts.

The Internationales Transportarbeiter-Bulletin (Bulletin of the International Transport Workers) calls attention to another dangerous offensive launched by the employers. The fall of the mark has so contracted the state's revenue that it is being forced to surrender municipal and state industries to capitalists. It says, in part:

German big business has launched a new offensive against labor and especially the transport workers. . . . On December 7 the bourgeois press told how Hugo Stinnes together with Klöckner, Vögler, and Dr. Silberberg had worked out a plan for the establishment of a private railroad corporation. The project is to be proposed in a conference with the big banks and the National Union of German Industry is to take it up. The fundamental idea of the plan is that for which Stinnes and his press have propagandized. Because of the decline and bad financial conditions of the state railways, the roads should be brought under private control, thus freeing the Government from immediate and continued responsibility in railroad management.

On the other hand, the declining mark which is enabling the organized capitalists to swallow Germany and attack the workers has wiped out union funds. Der Kommunistische Gewerkschafter gives figures which explain this result. It takes on the average under present conditions about three weeks for trade-union dues to reach general headquarters from all industrial centers. Let us say dues have been paid in paper marks on October 3, 1923. At that time one can get 100,000,000 paper marks for one gold mark, and 440,000,000 for one dollar. The dues reach headquarters on October 22. On that day one must give 10,000,000,000 paper marks for one gold mark and 40,000,000,000 for one dollar. Thus in their journey to headquarters the trade-union funds literally evaporate.

The unions seldom touch directly upon the influence of the Ruhr occupation. Such incidental discussion as they give it emphasizes both the manner in which passive resistance and the patriotic agitation have taken the workers' energies from the industrial conflict and the influence of economic stagnation in the occupied districts upon the workers. How the left-wing elements tend to lay all the present misery of the German workers to the failure of the Social Democrats to capitalize the opportunities of November, 1918, is evident from the quotations made above from left-wing journals.

Unions throughout the world are rushing financial aid to the embattled German workers. On January 18 the International Federation of Trades Unions reported the total collection to date of £36,045 in response to its earlier appeal for union aid for the German workers. The contributions came from twenty-four different countries. The unions of the United States sent $4,831. The executive committee of the American Federation of Labor sent an appeal during December for financial aid for German unionism to all its constituent bodies. A national committee is now in process of formation to follow up this plea.

Workers' families outside of Germany are taking German working-class children into their homes for stated periods, to nourish and strengthen them. The French Government has denied permission to French workers to cooperate in this plan.

The Other France

WE print below the text of an appeal published at Christmas time by Romain Rolland to the French people. Besides Romain Rolland's, the appeal bore the signatures of many distinguished French men and women and caused much comment both in France and in Germany.

In the face of affliction there are no longer either conquerors or vanquished.

One of the holiest traditions of our people is that of uncovering before passing death, regardless of what that life may have been. And the honor of all who bend toward human suffering that they may diminish it—doctors, nurses, sisters of charity—is to give to those who suffer, no matter who they may be, the same measure of devotion.

Strengthened by these sacred sentiments, we stand forth and say to France:

The German people are dying of hunger. Thousands of innocent are cruelly expiating the consequences of the scourge of war for which they are responsible only through the ambitions, greed, and egotism of their ruling classes.

At Berlin, at Leipzig, at Freiburg, when in late October bread was costing from seven to ten thousands of millions of marks, the monthly salary of a brain-worker failed to come within one one-hundredth of that figure. Professors, doctors, engineers, lawyers are selling their books and the instruments with which they labor that they may purchase bread. Students of certain universities are begging in troops along the highways and hedges. At Berlin 70 per cent of the children go to school without their breakfast, a great many of them have nothing but hot soup every second day. Thousands of families, emaciated by privation, are in slow agony. The pangs of cold are added to those of hunger. A winter of dreadful famine and epidemics has begun.

The chivalrous France of former days, of whose power Hugo was the last minstrel, stretches forth her hand to the conquered on the fields of battle and staunches his wounds. It is now four years since, as they say, the war ended; the new life of the earth has reclothed the battlefields with fecund oblivion of its harvests. But the vanquished lies sick unto death and perishes without assistance.

We appeal to all those of our race, without distinction of party or belief. Many passions, alas, disunite the French. But let us render justice to one another. We have this one thing in common: that we all respect our France, that we all have faith in her moral nobility, and that we are all anxious to safeguard it. Let us show this then to the world. Let us affirm that there is no room in the heart of the French for a debasing hatred or for a yet more vile indifference to the misery of men, but that victorious France keeps the field of pity.

One tests his victory only by the greatness of his soul. And the loftiest power is the power of generosity. We invite the French to stretch forth the hand of succor to the people they fought. We are opening a subscription for the wretched in Germany, and place upon the list, as a beginning, our own names.

THE "PACT OF AMITY"

THE Government of His Majesty the King of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes and the Government of His Majesty the King of Italy, firmly resolved to maintain peace and to assure the results obtained by the Great War and sanctioned by the peace treaties, have agreed upon the present convention, a natural consequence of the friendship between the two kingdoms and of mutual respect for their rights upon land and sea, and have agreed upon the following articles:

Article I. The high contracting parties agree to give their mutual support and cordial collaboration to the maintenance of the regime established by the treaties of the Trianon [with Hungary], of St. Germain [with Austria], and of Neuilly [with Bulgaria], as well as to respect and execute the obligations stipulated in those treaties.

Art. II. If one of the high contracting parties should suffer an unprovoked aggression from one or several Powers the other party agrees to remain neutral throughout the conflict. If the security and interests of one of the high contracting parties are menaced as the result of violent invasion from without the other party agrees to give, by its benevolent assistance, its political and diplomatic support in order to help make the external cause of these menaces disappear.

Art. III. In case of international complications, if the two contracting parties agree that their common interests are or may be menaced, they agree to discuss in common the joint measures of defense to be taken.

Art. IV. The present agreement shall be valid for five years and may be denounced or renewed one year before expiration.

Art. V. The present treaty shall be ratified and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Rome. It will come into force immediately after the exchange of ratifications.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed the original in duplicate.

THE "ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL"

Article I. The high contracting parties agree to communicate to each other, after a preliminary understanding, the agreements which concern their policy in Central Europe, and in this connection they declare that in the pact of amity signed today there is nothing contrary to the treaties of alliance which the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes concluded with the Czecho-Slovak Republic and with the Kingdom of Rumania, on August 31, 1922, and July 7, 1923, respectively.

Art. II. The pact of amity concluded today and the present additional protocol will be presented to the League of Nations for registration in accordance with Article XVIII of its Covenant.

THE FIUME TREATY

His Majesty the King of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes and His Majesty the King of Italy, having noted the utter impossibility of organizing in a practical fashion the Free State of Fiume in accordance with Article IV of the treaty signed at Rapallo on November 12, 1920, and with the general dispositions of the agreement signed at Rome on October 23, 1922; in order to establish cordial relations between the two states for the common good of the two peoples, animated by a desire to assure for the city of Fiume the most satisfactory life and the economic development best suited to its interests, have resolved to sign an agreement to that end and accordingly have named as their plenipotentiaries, by His Majesty the King of the Croats, Serbs, and Slo-venes: M. Nicholas Pachich, Prime Minister, and M. Moncilo Ninchich, Minister of Foreign Affairs; by His Majesty the King of Italy: M. Benito Mussolini, deputy, Prime Minister, and Minister of Foreign Affairs, who, having communicated their full powers found in good and due order, have agreed as follows:

Article I. The Italian Government recognizes the full and complete sovereignty of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes over the port of Baros and the delta, which will be evacuated and transferred to the competent authorities of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes within two days of the ratification of the present agreement.

Art. II. The Government of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes recognizes the full and complete sovereignty of the Italian Kingdom over the city and port of Fiume as well as over the territory attributed to it according to the frontier line indicated in the following article.

Art. III. The frontier of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes toward Fiume, as fixed in Article III of the treaty signed at Rapallo on November 12, 1920, should be rectified in accordance with the dispositions of the two preceding articles. This frontier line will be drawn by a special mixed commission, composed of Italian delegates and of Serb-Croat-Slovene delegates, according to a line fixed in general as follows: The Castia-Fiume road will be included in the territory of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes from a point east of Tometici to the crossing north of Belgudi. The frontier line will be traced on the spot along a line to be determined, between the aforementioned road and the railroad. From that point the frontier line will turn northeast in such fashion that Peklin shall be included in the Serb-Croat-Slovene territory; then, by a short convex curve north of Drenova, it will reach a point north of Recina, in the northern half of the part of the frontier included between points VIII and IX.

The Kingdom of Italy recognizes the full and complete sovereignty of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes over the territory thus attributed to the latter. This territory will be evacuated by Italy and transferred to the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes as soon as the new frontier line shall have been fixed by the mixed commission. This mixed commission shall perform its work in such fashion that the said territory may be evacuated within five days of the exchange of ratifications of the present agreement.

Art. IV. The dispositions contained in the additional convention, Annex A, attached hereto, will be observed in relations between the frontier zones along the new frontier and in relations between the census district of Castia and the neighboring Italian territory, and these dispositions will remain in effect until the conclusion of the commercial treaty which will regulate frontier traffic.

The two contracting parties agree that treaty questions concerning commerce between the frontier zones separated by the new frontier will be regulated with particular consideration of the economic relations between the said zones and of the special needs of the respective populations.

Art. V. The Kingdom of Italy grants to the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes a fifty-year lease on the covered and uncovered positions which constitute the Thacon di Revel basin in the great port of Fiume, according to the description of them in the additional convention hereunto annexed. The lease, which bears no extra-territorial character, includes the right to exclusive and unlimited use of the great warehouse of the Napoli breakwater, of the two warehouses which open on the quay Thacon di Revel, and of the two warehouses of the Genova breakwater opening on the western side, and the right to privileged usage of the three quays which bound the basin with their accessories. The authorities of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, and the personnel attached to them, concerned with the commerce of their state in the said basin will exercise their functions in conformity with the additional convention, Annex B, Chapter I, attached to the present agreement. The Government of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes will pay to the Government of Italy an annual rental of one gold lira for the lease of the said port establishments.

Art. VI. The principal railroad station of Fiume will be organized as an international frontier station. In accordance with the custom of the international stations upon the Italian frontiers, a delegation of Serb-Croat-Slovene railroad personnel will be assigned to this station. This delegation will collaborate with the administration of the Italian railroads, especially in whatever concerns the use of the branch lines connecting the station on Serb-Croat-Slovene territory in the basin referred to in the preceding article, and connecting this basin with the port of Baros. The details of this collaboration are established in the additional convention, Annex B, Chapter 2, attached to the present agreement.

Art. VII. The frontier between Fiume and the port of Baros, along the quay, will be fixed according to the line drawn on the map attached to the letter which supplemented the Treaty of Rapallo in such fashion as the mixed commission mentioned in Article III may esteem most suitable for the exercise of the customs supervision of the two states, taking account of the special requirements of commerce, of public order, and of the communications of the city. The revolving bridge between the port of Baros and Porto Grande will be Italian territory.

The Kingdom of Italy recognizes the full and complete sovereignty of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes over the waters of the Fiumara. On this side the frontier line will therefore be formed by the side of the river westward of the canal. Passage and embarkation from the western (Italian) bank of the Fiumara are regulated by the additional convention attached hereto, Annex B, Chapter 3, in such fashion that navigation of the Fiumara shall not be hampered.

For the maintenance of its right to use the Serb-Croat-Slovene waters of the canal and in recognition of the sovereignty of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes over the said waters, the Italian Government will pay to the said kingdom an annual sum of one gold dinar.

Art. VIII. The dispositions of the additional convention attached hereto, Annex B, Chapter 4, which concern the aqueduct of Fiume and the maintenance of the works on the river Recina, will be observed.

Art. IX. The Yugoslav minorities in Fiume will be granted the regime established in favor of the Italian minorities in Dalmatia by the present international agreements.

Art. X. The present agreement will be ratified and the ratifications will be exchanged at Rome within a maximum of twenty days from the signature of the present agreement.

In faith whereof the plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed the original in duplicate.

PRESIDENT OBREGON OF MEXICO charges that officials of a British oil firm, Lord Cowdray's El Aguilar Oil Company, financially and otherwise aided the recent De la Huerta movement. We know that Mr. Doheny made a loan of $5,000,000 to the Obregon Government when the De la Huerta revolt was at its height. We also know that since the revolt was put down American business men have been gathering a rich harvest of concessions. Was the whole thing just another chapter in the history of the Anglo-American oil war?

J. P. MORGAN AND CO. have opened a credit of $100,000,000 for the French Government, and accordingly the franc, which had sunk below three and a half cents, has shot up toward five cents. It is to be hoped that the rise is permanent. It can last only if, because of pressure by the bankers or because of a dawn of common sense, the French Government resolutely turns its back upon the mad policy of the past five years. France must accept the principle that she is a part of Europe and can work back to health only by helping to restore health in the rest of Europe, including Germany. Her policy of crushing Germany came perilously near to throwing her under the same steam-roller of ruin. One can hardly suppose that such shrewd financiers as the Morgan firm would have promised so large an advance to a Government on the verge of bankruptcy—even for the sake of their own previous loans to the same Government—without much more explicit pledges of financial reform than appear in the published statement by the governor of the Bank of France. He states that the Government agrees to make no further internal or external loans until the budget is balanced by taxation. This implies a number of things—among them abandonment of the policy of making military loans to lesser allies and acceptance of the Dawes program, which appears to be a step in the right direction.

A NEW SECRETARY of the Navy has been appointed, but Mr. Daugherty remains in office. Mr. Curtis D. Wilbur, who is to be the new head of the Navy, comes from the Supreme Court of California. He has the respect and regard of his profession; Mr. Daugherty does not have them, yet he remains as Attorney General despite, if press reports are to be trusted, renewed party appeals to the President that the Attorney General be thrown overboard. What the inquiry into his conduct of his office has revealed we have elsewhere summarized for the benefit of those readers who are unable to wade through columns of testimony and are likely to be misled by the efforts of the daily press to decry and to pooh-pooh the whole thing. Jess Smith had his office next to the Attorney General, although he held no government position and was on no pay roll. Gaston B. Means may, as he himself says, have been accused of every crime in the calendar, but why was he for more than two years on the staff of Mr. Daugherty, certified to by Mr. William J. Burns as "the ablest investigator I have ever known"? There is far more to the scandals than even now the public is permitted to know.

WE MUST CONFESS to genuine disappointment that Prime Minister MacDonald repudiated the speech of his Home Secretary, Mr. Arthur Henderson, calling for the revision of the Treaty of Versailles. Without the complete rewriting of that iniquitous document there can be no peace or prosperity for Europe. We had thought that all the Labor leaders saw that. Plainly, Mr. MacDonald does not wish to bring forward the necessity for this until he has concluded his present delicate negotiations with Poincaré. One cannot but feel sympathy for the Prime Minister's extraordinarily difficult position. He must walk as if on eggshells, for his official existence may be terminated any day by the vote of the opposing parties. So he has laid down five cruisers where we had hoped he would build none at all, and he has compromised as to that dangerous naval base at Singapore by suspending all further expenditures for a year, when the project is to be "reexamined." As to air armaments, he is plainly using the increases to which he has assented as a pawn in his struggle with Poincaré. These are dangerous compromises. If he needs must choose, and it seems that he must, then we would have him go down by offending the dominions or the Tories rather than by alienating his own supporters. After all, it is still not failure, but low aim, through compromise, which is the crime. On the whole, however, the MacDonald Government holds itself well and has become better entrenched than was believed possible a month ago.

WE HOPE that Lord Balfour's recent remarks in the House of Lords about India express his own well-known views and not those of the new Government. We cannot suppose that his words are naive, so we must believe them to be disingenuous; he accuses the Indians of lacking a "fundamental desire to make the government work" and concludes that they are therefore not ready for home rule. The Indian nationalists have no desire whatever to make the Government work; they have an active, deliberate purpose to prevent it from working. Does this prove their incapacity to rule themselves? About as conclusively as the Boston Tea Party proved the necessary permanent dependence of the American colonies; or as the boycotting of the Dublin Castle authorities proved the political incapacity of the Irish. Lord Balfour is talking through his hat and the question is whether he is talking through the Labor Party's hat as well. Ramsay MacDonald, who is the unwilling spokesman of shifting, temporary coalitions, is committed to a parliamentary inquiry into the working of the Government of India Act, but this proposal has been rejected as inadequate by the Indian Legislative Assembly. The round-table conference demanded by the Indians would commit Great Britain to nothing further than a willingness to discuss home rule on a dominion basis. Mr. Asquith may not permit Mr. MacDonald to go even so far as to admit the possibility of discussing such a seditious idea; and Mr. MacDonald may not want to go to defeat on an issue so far removed from the daily lives and thoughts of English workmen. But India is in no mood to be trifled with. Native control of the important legislative assemblies can tie up the entire administration; only the other day the central assembly threw out the budget and defeated the government.

ONE OF THE EMBARRASMENTS of the white man's burden is that one is likely to carry the load of the browns, blacks, or yellows too much and too far. Especially is this true if the burden-bearers are hirelings who like their job and need the money—as they generally do. In all of our outlying islands the bureaucracies which we have established there have usually been the last to realize that their powers ought to be reduced or abolished. Thus we find the little coterie of naval officers and civilians in the Virgin Islands—which is a pleasant berth as such things go—wholly satisfied with its administration and sure that the natives feel the same way. Fortunately, the Washington executives of the Navy Department think otherwise. As long ago as 1919 Secretary Daniels wrote to the congressional commission which was about to visit the islands that, although the existing government was necessary during the transition period from Danish to American sovereignty, "the department feels that the time has arrived when some more permanent provision should be made." The present administration of the Navy Department, it is understood, favors the bill that friends of the Virgin Islands have prepared—a measure that would establish a civil government similar to that of Porto Rico and confer American citizenship upon the natives. This is the least that the situation demands. The present arrangement for the Virgin Islands—a presidential preserve farmed out to the navy—was a makeshift adopted on the eve of our entry into the World War and described in the organic act itself as "temporary." Yet that act was passed seven years ago this spring, spanning a period during which numerous "permanent" governments of the world have gone to smash. We offer as a question for debate: How many years should a "temporary" government last?

WHAT is a white man? This is a question which will presently begin to worry and perplex all persons with one-half of one per cent or more pigmentation in their skin. None of the existing rules of anthropologists and biologists is henceforth to count; a person is white if he is recognized by the "man in the street" as white. If he is not so recognized he is to be considered black or brown or yellow or some other tint which makes it impossible for him to qualify for American citizenship. Take as an example Mr. T. O. Cartozian, of Portland, Oregon, whose citizenship has been attacked by the Government. Mr. Cartozian is an Armenian; he was born in Turkey; he was granted his American citizenship when he was a subject of the Sultan. Is Mr. Cartozian free and white and thus proper stuff to make an American of? His case will decide the status of every Armenian in the country and will doubtless be carried up to the Supreme Court. It has already been held by that court that a Hindu, Bahai Singh, was not white enough to be considered white by the man in the street and thus eligible to become a citizen of this pallid country; but Mr. Cartozian claims that his homeland is outside of the proscribed neighborhood inhabited by Mr. Singh's countrymen and is in fact only about two degrees east of Jerusalem. Jews, whose claim to Jerusalem as a home town is well established, are admitted to citizenship without a question; why not Mr. Cartozian? The argument will undoubtedly be ramified and extended east and west, and up and down the scale of color; and then finally the man in the street and the judges of the Supreme Court will put their heads together and decide. But meanwhile our dark-skinned brothers from Italy and Spain and Portugal and Greece and Egypt and Siberia and the Caucasus and other points east may pass some anxious moments gazing into their shaving mirrors.

IS THERE A RADIO TRUST? Are we threatened with a monopoly of the air? Of course we are. It was as certain that high-power and high-cost broadcasting would come under some form of monopoly control as that railroads would stop paralleling each other or that the post office would control its field. As radio is developed we shall have fewer and fewer broadcasting stations. It is small use debating the point whether there is or ought to be a monopoly; the question is, Who shall control the monopoly, and how? The American Telephone and Telegraph Company has acquired the essential patents for the manufacture of broadcasting apparatus, and has determined to force stations which use its patents to buy licenses from it. The telephone company, meanwhile, refuses to license high-power stations which would compete directly with its own station WEAf. Sooner or later, the officials of this company believe, radio must be made to pay its way. Either the senders or the receivers must pay for broadcasting; the electrical-equipment companies cannot be expected to bear the burden forever. In that they are undoubtedly right. England makes the receivers pay for licenses, thereby financing the programs broadcasted, and we may eventually come to that system here. In that case, however, the question will arise, Who shall license the receivers—the Government or a private corporation?

ENGLAND HAS ANSWERED that question too. The state does it. But England is going further still: the Imperial Wireless Telegraphy Committee, appointed since Labor's accession to power, has already issued a report to the Postmaster General which will probably be adopted. It proposes that the state through the Post Office shall own all wireless stations in Great Britain which communicate with the overseas dominions and other territories, except that in Canada private enterprise shall be allowed to continue competition with the state. The state reserves the right to take over any private station in an emergency and may acquire the use of all patented inventions used in public-utility services such as wireless. The empire station at Leafeld, England, is to be enlarged so that it can communicate regularly not merely with Canada and Egypt, but with India and Australia. Wireless telephony is already a state monopoly in England; broadcasting is controlled by the state; and imperial wireless telegraphy is thus to be made a state monopoly. England is, we believe, wise; there are dangers in any kind of monopoly, but a state monopoly is less dangerous than a private monopoly. It is, however, a question of degree. We are not alarmed by the fears expressed that the telephone company will confine broadcasting to Protestant, Catholic, or Jew, to Republican or Democrat; the company is scrupulously excluding controversial matter from its wires. It will sin rather by excluding minority opinion, and that is a danger which a state too would have to guard against.

WE ARE WHOLE-HEARTEDLY on the side of the Actors' Equity Association in its renewed struggle with the Producing Managers' Association. The proposed new agreement between them is reasonableness itself. It does not touch salaries except in prescribing a minimum for the chorus of $30 a week, and the actors are willing—mistakenly, we think—to agree to keep their hands off salaries for the next twenty-five years. Furthermore, the Equity agrees not to take part in sympathetic strikes on behalf of stage hands or musicians. It will admit all to membership who apply, establishing no apprenticeship class, or probationary period, or any classification of the membership. It will make, as now, no requirements beyond the payment of dues. That is, it will not interfere with free competition for actors among managers; neither will it dictate to authors about their plays or any lines in those plays, nor to managers as to make-up of a cast. It will not discriminate against the managers' union—the Actors' Fidelity League. What could be more generous or more reasonable? The only point at issue upon which the managers have thrown over the whole arrangement is the clause that Equity players will act only with Equity members. This is a very different thing from what is known as the closed union shop. The managers will be free to establish companies composed of non-union actors. But if there are any Equity actors in the cast, all the others must be of the association and they may join without question on payment of dues. We trust that the Equity will under no circumstances yield to the producers, and we believe that the public is behind it.

THE death of Colonel Richard Henry Pratt, founder of the Carlisle Indian school, at eighty-four years of age, marks the end of an era in Indian affairs, for Colonel Pratt had had contact with the Indians for possibly a longer time than any man alive, and knew them better, perhaps, than any man except General Hugh L. Scott. His contact with the race was that of an army official who became an educator. He believed that the complete absorption of the Indian into the white community was both inevitable and desirable, and that the best service to the Indian would be to hasten that process even to the extent of wiping out the race-memories of the Indian in one generation. Strenuously, efficiently, with good-fellowship and with much love, he applied that philosophy of individualism over forty years' time, during twenty-five years of which he was superintendent of the famous Carlisle school. He even believed that young Indians should be taken from home and sundered irrevocably from their tribe, their community, and their race heritage. He believed further that higher education, especially along industrial and professional lines, should be brought to all Indians asking and hungering therefor. A new generation has arisen which sees the Indian problem through new eyes, through eyes of modern colonial science and anthropology. The so-called "individualization" policy is considered by this new generation to have failed in practice. There is plenty of evidence to support such belief. But the individualization policy is still the official policy; and there are no giants like Colonel Pratt now at work in the Indian Bureau to execute the policy or to revise it. Colonel Pratt viewed his subject exactly as Carl Schurz viewed it and all the other friends of the Indians of his generation. For seventy years he stood as the best friend of the Indians, and his unwisdom was the best wisdom of his time.

Beginning their council with prayer, business men and ministers met Saturday in the office of the Civic and Commerce Association to formulate a plan for a spiritual revival in Minneapolis. The chairman declared that the people must "hook up with God." The Rev. F. D. Tyner said the phrase expressed aptly what was needed. A series of public prayer meetings will be held in various convenient places. Meetings will be conducted tomorrow and Friday at the Mayor's reception room, City Hall; the Minneapolis Steel & Machinery Co.; and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad shops.—Press item.

THE PREACHER and the business man were lunching at the club.

"'Tis sad," they said, "to hear the words that come from Henry Dubb.

He talks of rights and wages while carrying his hod.

—The folks of Minneapolis must all hook up with God."

"Let's say a prayer," the preacher said, attempting to look thin.

"Let's say a prayer to exorcise this noxious form of sin.

Our brothers in the shops and yards must kneel down on the sod.

—For the folks of Minneapolis are hooking up with God."

"Let's have a good-will meeting," the business man replied.

"We'll round 'em up and rake 'em in and once they get inside We'll stop this talk of rights before they lift from us our wad.

—The folks of Minneapolis are hooking up with God!"

The Lesson of the Scandals

WHAT shall be the lasting profit from all the muck-raking in Washington? The question intrudes itself insistently as the Republicans continue to cling to Coolidge and the Democrats, quite leaderless, are united only in a desire to save as much of their capital as possible from the universal wreck. By mid-summer we shall be deafened by shouts of "Turn the rascals out" and, if no determined effort is made to prevent it, we shall merely elect the same or other similar men to Washington and leave the system and the conditions which have produced this corruption untouched. Roosevelt and Wilson assaulted that system and left it intact. The difficulty was that they busied themselves with symptoms and not with fundamental causes. Hence in 1924 we are not only no further along than in 1912 but we have fresh proof of the lengths to which the invisible government will go to achieve its end at the expense of all the people and at the cost of the integrity of our Government.

At the bottom of it all lie some simple questions: Do we propose to attack special privilege in America or to continue to foster its growth? Do the natural resources of the country constitute a trust for all the people, or are they to be disposed of to powerful capitalists whose sole motive in exploiting them is not public service but private profit? Is there no other way to bring these natural resources into service than to turn them over to Sinclairs, Dohenys, and Fords? To our mind the answers are plain. We must preserve our natural resources for all the people and exploit them for service and not for private profit. We must revoke special privileges wherever they have been granted. We must strike at the present possessors of those privileges and the controllers of natural monopolies and near-monopolies because it is through the power of these possessions that they are no more shaken in their positions by such assaults as those of Roosevelt and Wilson than a modern infantry trench would be by troops armed with the muskets of Revolutionary days. A Roosevelt fulminates, makes a breach here and there; his sons turn up as coadjutors and paid employees of the enemy. A trust is broken in pieces; its component parts wax richer than ever and operate as much in harmony as if all of one body corporate. In 1903 we decree that amalgamating railroads shall be divorced. In 1920 we legislate that all railroads shall come together in great groups.

And thus the only worthwhile question in connection with the Washington scandals is whether or not they will lead to the building up of an effective popular program of attack upon the citadels of power. Transportation lines, banks, trust companies, public-service corporations, oil companies, steel corporations, large business enterprises of every kind are allied; their control is often the same; their directorates interlock and their managers and directors, however well meaning and godly themselves, constitute by force of circumstances, often quite involuntarily, the "invisible government" against which so many have inveighed. These groups, it ought now once and for all to be plain, cannot be overthrown until the sources of their power are taken from them. We must take from them ownership of transportation lines; we must oust them from ownership of coal and other mines; we must oust them from monopolies and near-monopolies, even though we may employ the same men later to operate those industries, in our efforts to avoid the dangers that come from government ownership and operation. The point is that, as our experience with the railroads and the State regulatory bodies and the Interstate Commerce Commission now shows beyond cavil, regulation achieves little or nothing. It creates a huge army of supervising experts and inspectors, but rebates and favors persist; great organizations continue to grow wealthy as a result of railroad discrimination, and the railroads themselves become more and more the creature of the bankers who were formerly their servants.

Shall we now declare war upon this whole system, set out to reconquer for the people that which is theirs, and strike from legitimate business the shackles it has placed upon itself by the inter-ownership of many businesses, by the concentration of power in the money-marts, and the control of credit? It seems to us that there can be only one reply. If we cannot capitalize the public indignation at the shame of our Government, we shall simply drift on, from bad to worse, with the "invisible government" becoming more and more powerful, more and more dangerous, more and more in control of our several private activities. To our mind this is the time and the hour to start the revolt for which Woodrow Wilson called in 1912 when he said: "We stand in the presence of a revolution. . . . Some radical changes we must make in our law and our practice. Some reconstructions we must push forward, which a new age and new circumstances impose upon us." As Mr. Wilson also said: "It is an intolerable thing that the Government of the Republic should have got so far out of the hands of the people; should have been captured by interests which are special but not general." "In the train of this capture," he added, "follow the troops of scandals, wrongs, and indecencies with which our politics swarm." Precisely. If we do not now attack the system with a clear vision of our objective, with a determination to get into the very citadel of special privilege itself, why then the hubbub over Daugherty, Denby, Jess Smith, Burns, and all the rest of them will die away and leave us precisely as we were before. After a spasm of reform the same old practices will go on behind the curtain until that is once more torn aside to enable the public to get a fleeting glimpse of what the real owners of our government are about.

Elsewhere in this issue we set forth the story of the incredible betrayal of the people in the effort to bestow Muscle Shoals upon Henry Ford—now almost consummated—because it points the moral of the hour. Congress has not learned the lesson of the scandals; hence it is preparing a greater one than all by thus moving to alienate a priceless possession of the people. To give Muscle Shoals to Henry Ford for a song is just as bad as to give Teapot Dome to Harry Sinclair or Elk Hills to Edward L. Doheny. As we approach the era of giant-power, the nation's greatest water-power is to be given to an individual; we barter away carelessly the source of industrial power sufficient for a kingdom. We are not even accepting the highest bid made for this incalculably valuable property. If the Senate connives at this, if the progressives there do not filibuster against it to the last ditch, then their protestations of anger and shame over the oil scandals become the merest hypocrisy.

All of which reinforces our contention that the hour for the revolt has come. It is the hour for a third party with a simple but far-reaching program, publicly planned, freely and openly discussed. It must include government ownership of railroad properties as its first plank; of coal mines as its second. It must oppose such raids on our resources as the Muscle Shoals deal. It must declare for recapture of alienated natural resources, and for perpetual control of those that remain. It must affirm that to give away public resources honestly is as dangerous and as treasonable as to give them away dishonestly. Never was there a more constructive program than this. It is the progressives' opportunity.

Every time that issues of such a nature have come squarely before the American public the voters have settled them with an unanswerable unanimity of judgment. It will be a long and hard fight but there is no other as worth while. For if once we capture our natural resources we shall be well on the road to the recapture of our government.

Daugherty, Aegis of Justice

NEVER in recent years have the character and administration of a Cabinet officer been so torn to pieces as in the Senate inquiry into charges against Harry M. Daugherty, appointed Attorney General by Mr. Harding and retained in office by President Coolidge. At this writing the inquiry has not been concluded, and Mr. Daugherty has not put in his defense, but there is enough adequately corroborated testimony so that there can be no doubt in the public mind of the total unfitness of the man who is at the head of the Department of Justice and of the complete corruption of the office under him.

Within the first week of the Senate hearing testimony was brought out involving Attorney General Daugherty in the acceptance of bribes in return for immunity from prosecution, in negotiations for the sale of pardons, in the barter of federal jobs, in the issuance of illegal permits to withdraw liquor, in personal violation of the Volstead Act, and in unlawful searches and spyings. Senator Wheeler of Montana, chairman of the investigating committee, said at the end of the first four days of testimony that there was already enough evidence to secure conviction by any jury on charges of corruption and conspiracy to defraud the Government in connection with the exhibition of the motion-picture films of the Dempsey-Carpentier fight and the failure to prosecute the Standard Aircraft Corporation.

F. C. Quimby, who produced the Dempsey-Carpentier films, said that these pictures, which were taken in New Jersey, were shown in twenty-two or more States at a profit of $125,000 in spite of the federal law against transporting such films from one State to another. Arrangements for showing these films were made through three men, one of them Edward B. McLean's newspaper representative in New York, all understood to be close friends of Mr. Daugherty. Half of the profits were to be given up in return for freedom from prosecution. In order to throw dust in the eyes of the public, there were arrests in a number of cities, but after small fines had been imposed the films of the fight were allowed to be shown without further interference. Mr. Quimby's story was supported by Gaston B. Means, formerly an agent of the Department of Justice, who said he had at various times received sums of from $3,000 to $7,000 from the exhibition of the films; he had turned this money over to Mr. Daugherty's special friend, Jess Smith, who committed suicide last spring rather than face, as it is believed, the imminent revelations concerning himself and the Attorney General. Gerald O. Holdridge gave testimony against Mr. Daugherty and W. J. Burns. Miss Roxy Stinson, divorced wife of Jess Smith, added another link by her testimony that she had heard her former husband say that he and Mr. Daugherty were expecting to make $180,000 out of the fight films. Below is some of Miss Stinson's testimony:

SENATOR JONES. I want to ask you just a question or two about the films. What idea did Mr. Smith give you as to Mr. Daugherty's interest in the films? A. Why, that there would not be any prosecutions out of the Department of Justice.

Q. That is, Mr. Smith told you that Mr. Daugherty would see that no prosecutions would be had? A. That was the deal.

Q. That was his deal with Mr. Daugherty or—? A. No, that was the deal with the two of them for this.

Q. They were to get the $180,000? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell you with whom they had this agreement or contract? A. Oh, with the picture men, the picture company. I don't just recall the name.

In regard to the aircraft company Mr. Means told the committee that he had received from Mitsui and Company, the firm which financed the corporation, 100 bills of $1,000 each, and had passed them on to Jess Smith, in order to prevent the Department of Justice from starting proceedings in an alleged overpayment of $6,500,000 on war contracts. Miss Stinson corroborated this testimony by stating that she saw Jess Smith with seventy-five $1,000 bills upon his return to Ohio after a visit to Washington.

Miss Stinson, who was supported by and continued to be friendly with Jess Smith up to the time of his suicide, gave most damaging testimony of what had been told her of conferences that Mr. Daugherty had had in a "little green house in K Street" (Washington) and in the "shack," near Washington Court House, Ohio. These conferences involved deals for pardons, permits to withdraw liquor, federal appointments, and other matters. Miss Stinson said Jess Smith had given her White Motor and Pure Oil stocks, with the assurance that they had cost nothing, and that her former husband had deposited $175,000 in a bank in Washington Court House of which a brother of the Attorney General was president. Soon after President Harding was inaugurated, Mr. Daugherty and Jess Smith met an oil operator, Colonel James T. Darden, in the "shack." They gave Colonel Darden $2,400 each for an oil speculation that involved obtaining Government leases. Miss Stinson told how Jess Smith, who long had a desk in the Department of Justice, although holding no official position there, had also lived with the Attorney General in Washington. Jess Smith had told her that it cost the two $50,000 to live in the capital but that he thought he could afford it because of his relations with the Department of Justice. Miss Stinson visited New York City with Jess Smith, and they were entertained by Joe Weber, the actor, who was seeking a pardon for his brother-in-law. Here is a bit of the testimony:

SENATOR WHEELER. Now, did you talk to Jess Smith afterward? A. Yes; we discussed it and he said they get a lot of them for different people, of course.

Q. Was there anything said to you about any money transaction in connection with it? A. He said, "He [Weber] is awful cheap."

SENATOR JONES. Was that all he said? A. He said, referring to him, "He [Weber] wants a lot, and he is awful cheap."

Q. Is that all he said about it? A. "But," he said, "I think we are going to do something for him."

Miss Stinson told also of conversations with Jess Smith in regard to deals for permits to take liquor out of storage and how her former husband used to come home to Washington Court House, his suit cases heavy with whiskey. Mr. Daugherty came with him.

Mr. Means, in his testimony, said that he had received money, to be passed on, for permits for whiskey withdrawal, while Captain B. C. Baldwin, of the Texas Rangers, formerly a Department of Justice agent, said that specific instructions from Washington were that the department's men were not to take any action in regard to rum-running across the Mexican border.

Munsey Destroys Another Daily

BY his sale of the Herald to Ogden M. Reid, Frank A. Munsey, dealer in dailies and wrecker of them, has wiped out a third great New York daily. He himself speaks of "my work of amalgamating newspapers," as if it were a commendable profession. The merging of the Herald with the Tribune is a tragedy indeed. Not because under Mr. Munsey it could lay claim to intellectual ability or civic leadership or any forward looking point of view, but because it means the disappearance of an historic newspaper, the throwing out of work of hundreds of journalists and printers, and the further narrowing of the field of metropolitan journalism. New York is now down to four morning newspapers and must, therefore, take its morning news from Messrs. Ochs, Pulitzer, Hearst, and Reid. Only one of the four dailies is liberal and progressive. If anything should happen to the World, New York's plight would be grievous indeed; yet the World is sorely in need of more vigor, more news, and more vital leadership, which latter may be supplied now that Walter Lippman is to take charge of its editorial page.

Whatever else may happen, this third death of a metropolitan daily since June last must bring home to everybody the gravity of the situation which confronts American journalism. Mr. Munsey glories in his shame. His amalgamations are, he says, "as sound a piece of economics as the amalgamation for competing lines of railroads or banks or manufactures." That bears out precisely what critics like ourselves have been saying—that the profession of journalism has disappeared and that the newspaper business now ranks in the eyes of its chief owners with any other mercantile enterprise. A sense of public responsibility, a recognition of the fact that the newspapers have a public interest—these things are gone. More than that, if Mr. Munsey's "piece of economics" is sound, why should the process of amalgamation not continue until we have one morning and one evening newspaper both under one management? Already there is little to distinguish the newspapers in the New York evening field, so far as editorial views are concerned. It is no exaggeration to say that it makes no difference whatever which newspaper the average citizen buys on his way home at night.

Nowhere is there sound leadership, or any leadership. They all have the Associated Press service, some of them reinforcing this by the United Press dispatches, but in the main the outlook and viewpoints of these newspapers are much the same. They all regard everything from a purely capitalistic point of view; they are ultra conservative; they are as frantic upholders of the existing political, economic, and social status as any rotary club or chamber of commerce, and they are as bankrupt intellectually. How can one hope for an intelligent electorate under these circumstances? Already, as Mr. Munsey declares, the costs of newspaper publishing in New York are mounting higher and higher until they have become "appalling." How long will it be before, in order to meet those costs, the control of public opinion in the greatest American city is placed in the hands of one or two men responsible only to their purses?

New Yorkers may soon be petitioning the Christian Science mother church to move the Christian Science Monitor to New York City so that they may again have an evening newspaper with real news, intelligently edited and with opinions written from some other standpoint than that of the business man. Certainly the opportunity would seem to be ripe for the establishment of a non-profit-making, cooperative daily like the Jewish Forward. So great has been the mortality of the New York dailies of late that we believe that such a newspaper could readily obtain the Associated Press service, the cost of which to each newspaper has increased enormously with every new consolidation.

Our "Interests" in Latin America

THERE is plenty of idealism in America; there is abundant good-will toward our neighbors on the south; there are thousands of persons in the United States who have a genuine interest in the progress of the Latin American republics toward a better civilization. But there is little contact between such persons and the republics in question. The influences that have a vital and direct relation to Latin America are almost exclusively those of business and finance. Thus for practical purposes we have come to view Latin America, especially the Caribbean countries, not as collections of human beings with ambitions and aspirations like our own but as fields of exploitation easier and more profitable than any left at home. Looking at them with a purely business eye, we see these countries as places in which to lay out plantations near to cheap help and far from child-labor laws; in which to erect factories secure against labor unions and health regulations; in which to float loans at exorbitant interest on terms so inimical to the independence of the countries concerned that we would not dare to offer them to any State, county, or municipality at home. And so the United States, with all its idealism and its genuine good-will toward Latin America, has become, in fact, an all-powerful influence there against bettering the conditions of the workers, against social progress, against the very independence and democracy in government for which we contend so strongly in our own land.

Of this vision of Latin America as an oasis for business where labor organizations do not annoy, where laws may be defied or immunity obtained at moderate price from public officials, where social progress may be ignored, we get frequent glimpses. We note, for instance, a newspaper interview with F. J. Lisman of the New York brokerage house which recently floated a loan for Salvador, persuading Mr. Hughes to commit the Supreme Court and the Department of State to carrying out the terms of this speculation. Mr. Lisman, just returned from Salvador and Guatemala, sees that part of the world not as an aggregation of human beings but as an ever-developing plantation. Outside of bananas the principal product is coffee, while these countries will soon rank as substantial producers of cotton. "Labor is plentiful and wages low." Ah, yes, there is the kernel of the nut! And investors may rest assured that there will be alert American business men in Central America to see that labor continues to be plentiful and wages low.

The London Economist, in a recent issue, gives us a similar suggestion of Central America as a plantation run for the benefit of outsiders: "It is expected that the current Central American banana season will witness the handling of 38,000,000 stems of fruit, compared with 35,000,000 in 1923 and 34,000,000 in 1922. The widely extended cultivation of the trees undertaken by the United Fruit Company in Honduras is, however, threatened by political disturbances in that country." Political disturbances interfere with business. Hence, argue our business men, they should be prevented even if United States marines have to be called in to do it. Can it be possible, we wonder, that this business view of diplomacy has influenced Mr. Hughes in decreeing that there shall be no more revolutions in Central America and that only such governments as he likes shall exist?

But there are parts of Latin America which are viewed in terms of factories rather than plantations. In Peru the Cerro de Pasco Copper Corporation, an American company, built a couple of years ago a great reduction plant in the Oroya valley, one of the noted stock-raising regions of the country. This plant, we learn from a subscriber in Callao, Dora Mayer de Zulen, has become a political issue. Both the air and the water of the valley have been poisoned to a distance of many miles, with great losses to stock-raisers and agriculturists. A Deputy recently stated in Parliament that for the year 1922 alone stock owners lost 70,000 sheep, 6,000 oxen, 2,000 horses, and 7,000 llamas. As long ago as September 2 last a report adverse to the company was made by an engineer of the Department of Public Works, but it was suppressed and only became known through publication in El Comercio last January. The copper company has pursued a policy of indemnification rather than remedy, and has met attacks with promises and "stalling." Our correspondent writes that, Parliament having adjourned, nothing can be done before next summer at the earliest toward relief from the noxious plant maintained by this "great capitalistic kingdom incrusting in our hills."

It is well to think of these things when we hear that American warships, American money, and American men have been called upon to uphold our "rights" and "interests" in Latin America. The rights are not human rights. The interests are not even those of bona fide settlers; they are primarily those of absentee landlords who are trying to roll up profits abroad by the exercise of principles and methods which they find it difficult or impossible to practice any longer at home.

Spring—Even in the City

MARCH IS A SPRING MONTH, according to an ancient tradition, but in the bleak regions of New York State and New England the thermometer and the wind often refuse to admit that March and spring are more than very distant cousins. The calendar notwithstanding, the ground remains frozen and the snow is gracious if it yields so far as to melt into slush.

Yet somehow obscure instincts justify and accept the calendar. You can count on robins and bluebirds and song sparrows any sunny day of later March, and they must have come North in the gray days that preceded the sun. You can be sure that about the cold springs and streams which keep an even temperature throughout the winter the brown cowls of skunk cabbage, that ill-named monk of the spring swamps, are pushing their way through to the light. And in the cities small boys, who paid no heed to a February thaw, suddenly produce marbles from capacious pockets, girls begin rope-skipping, and weary householders learn by the repetition of broken windows that baseball is once more abroad in the land. One common ancestral urge drives the robin northward, the skunk cabbage skyward, and the city boy ballward; spring, though powerless to master the weather man, finds expression in these her more faithful harbingers.

Spring, everywhere capricious, is peculiarly tantalizing in the city. When once the willows have taken on new color with the push of the sap a countryman has evidences of spring to hearten him though frost be in the air; there are no such persistent signs in the city. The indefatigable street-cleaners and excellent drainage system of the city even halt the effect of that atmospheric geniality which to Thoreau was the essence of spring. The warm sun, he thought, falling on the snow-covered earth, caused an almost invisible vapor to blur the woods and fields, softening their outlines and giving them fresh life. "Through this transparent vapor all surfaces, not osiers and open water alone, look more vivid. The hardness of winter is relaxed. There is a fine effluence surrounding the wood, as if the sap had begun to stir, and you could detect it a mile off. . . . As we sit in this wonderful air . . . our voices even sound differently, and betray the spring."

Yet somehow, though the signs are missing, spring does come, even to the most squalid tenement street of the metropolis. Not only the children feel it, and the hurdy-gurdy men give it expression. The sparrows that quarrel over the dung in the street sense it, and turn to courting. That mysterious malady, spring fever, penetrates office-building and factory, and sends thoughts darting through dusty windows to lapping summer waters and murmuring pines. A soft March day between two frosts makes even the city man understand what Thoreau felt when he wrote:

This afternoon I throw off my great coat. The vil-lagers are out in the sun, and every man is happy whose work takes him out doors. I lean over a rail to hear what is in the air. My life partakes of infinity. Is the drawing in of this vital air attended with no more glorious results than I witness? I go forth to make new demands on life. I wish to begin this summer well, to do something in it worthy of it and of me, to transcend my daily routine and that of my townsmen, to have my immortality now, in the quality of my daily life, to pay the greatest price of any man in Concord, and enjoy the most.

Henry Ford—Man or Superman?

By EDWIN DAKIN

FROM the beginning of written history to the exile of Napoleon the destiny of ambitious men depended largely on the amount of man-power they could bring under their control. They were uniformly successful in proportion to the size and efficiency of the army of toilers they could assemble. With the discovery in the last century of generated mechanical power that condition swiftly changed. The ruler of today is not the man who owns human labor. He is the man who owns or monopolizes such natural forces as coal, oil, and waterfalls.

Within the next few weeks another Napoleon is planning to be born.

He will control one-third of all the undeveloped water-power in that Southern section of the United States which is known as the "superpower area." Comprising nine States with a population of eighteen millions, the area centers at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, where the Tennessee River drops suddenly many feet on its way to the sea. He will control this power for his own personal use, unregulated by public-utility laws or the Federal Water Power Act, as the usual public-utility corporation is controlled. Only one other step is necessary for his final appointment—and the appointment of his heirs for 100 years—as czar: that is the formal acceptance by the Senate of the majority report of the Committee on Military Affairs. This report recommends that the offer of Henry Ford for the Muscle Shoal property be accepted. The McKenzie bill embodying that acceptance has already been passed by the House. It may be hoped that in the rush of other scandals the bill may be allowed to die of procrastination in the Senate, without reaching a vote. If a vote is taken, its passage seems assured.

Mr. Ford's offer is less than that of some of the competing bidders. He also refused, if his offer was finally accepted, to be governed by those restrictions of the laws which relate to the use of water-power for the public benefit, and which would apply to any other bidder who was given the property. Despite these facts, the House accepted the Ford offer by an overwhelming majority. This means that for the first time since the Federal Water Power Act was passed, limiting power grants to fifty years, Congress has dared to invalidate that law.

This strange situation is made possible for two reasons: first, the country has very little idea at this time of the almost inestimable future value of the Southern superpower area; second, neither the average citizen nor the average Congressman is aware of the enormous amount of propaganda which has been financed in behalf of the Ford offer. Mr. Ford himself, possibly, is not fully conscious of these things. It is probably true that he has little capacity for mental analysis and an immeasurable amount of almost uncanny intuition. He looks; subconsciously he feels; he knows. Such a theory at least explains with fewer contradictions than any other the strange ensemble of reactions that go to make up the Ford character: his ungovernable temper; his suave public exterior; his fantastic "peace ship" idealism; his coldness to all charitable appeal; his distrust of the individual; his subtle love of mob acclaim; his belief in impracticable and impossible economic nostrums; his unerring judgment as regards his own business welfare; the hunger for domination which has made him the most powerful capitalist in America today.

Those who bow down to the Ford shibboleth do not yet recognize the extent of this power complex, if such it can be called. Mr. Ford today owns coal mines, whole forests, lumber and pulp mills, railroads, cotton-converting factories. The plants where he actually assembles automobiles are probably the smallest part of his interests. It is quite true that the ownership of the sources of all his raw materials helps him to sell a finished product cheaper—as long as he desires to sell at the cheaper price. It is equally true that an absolute monarch, if he has the desire, can operate a country more efficiently than can a republican form of government. Unfortunately humanity has discovered that it cannot depend on the permanence of the philanthropic desire to pass on to the public the benefit of this efficiency or saving. After the power of an individual passes a certain varying limit there is always developed a point of decreasing return, as far as benefit to the masses is concerned. This is true both of kaiser and capitalist. Inarticulate recognition of this truth accounts for the imposed restraints both of magna chartas and of anti-trust laws.

We are not concerned here with the question of how long Mr. Ford intends to pass along to the public the savings he makes in automobile manufacture. The interesting point is that Mr. Ford is no longer content to manufacture only automobiles and gather in the millions attendant thereon. He has long been looking for other fields to conquer. He thought that politics might be a means to this end; the attempt proved abortive. He had previously failed in international diplomacy. It was about this time that he recognized the value of gathering in a railroad or two and natural resources in the shape of coal mines and forests. Shortly Mr. Ford's power-hunger looked further. Having long spurned alliances with Wall Street, which had mocked him in his younger days, he turned to Europe. In the last year there have been well-established reports of his activities in Germany and Central Europe; of advances made to German steel and coal barons; of attempted alliances with Thyssen and Stinnes. Steel, coal, automobiles, railroads—the bones and arteries of modern civilization.

During this time Mr. Ford has been thinking about Muscle Shoals.

For more than a decade there has been building in the South a new and surprising industrial development. For years the South had been rotting in stagnation, owing to reasons not all of them dependent on the ravages of the Civil War. The change came almost unheralded; suddenly nine States which centered around Muscle Shoals realized they were honeycombed with rivers that could be harnessed to make a superpower development unsurpassed in the world. The harnessing began; cheap electric power appeared for the first time in the South; it was so cheap and produced under such favorable conditions that scores of mills in New England picked up their plants and even their employees, and transported them bodily to the Southern superpower area. The power could be carried for hundreds of miles along the country-side; ideal mill villages were set down among the open hills; lifeless villages began to unfold into prosperous cities; electricity for the first time was brought to the door of the farmer as well as to the manufacturer. One electric plant was linked up with another, and the second with a third, gradually forming a system where power could be "relayed" for hundreds of miles across the country if the water supply of one plant failed. Power from Alabama at the present time needs only a short connecting development to be brought into Washington, D. C., and thence to New York to be linked up with Niagara Falls.

Mr. Ford looked at all this growing wealth, and wondered. Then the Government offered to part with Muscle Shoals, for its development by private capital.

At the Shoals the Government built, during the war, two nitrate plants to extract nitrogen from the air for the manufacture of ammunition. It was the intention of the Government to use the plants afterwards for the manufacture of nitrate fertilizers for the soil. These plants cost the Government in round figures $83,000,000.

Mr. Ford offered to buy these two plants from the United States for $5,000,000, with the guaranty that each year he would manufacture fertilizer with a nitrogen content of at least 40,000 tons. He would sell this to the farmer, he agreed, at a cost not to exceed 8 per cent profit on the manufacturing cost. But there was a condition attached to this offer. He would buy these plants and manufacture fertilizer only if the Government would give him a lease on Muscle Shoals for 100 years, and would finish building the dams there so that the power could be properly developed. For this leasing privilege he offered to pay the Government a certain yearly rental—in round figures, about $250,000,000 for the hundred years' privilege, paid in equal annual instalments under various provisions. At the end of the period Mr. Ford should have first option on the renewal of the lease—a condition, it will be noted, which could be easily developed into giving Mr. Ford's heirs a lease on this water-power to perpetuity. Furthermore, after devoting the necessary power to the manufacture of fertilizer, Mr. Ford would have the privilege of using the whole surplus for his own manufacturing purposes, instead of selling it to the public as an ordinary utility company would be obliged to do. This would of course put him out of reach of competition by any other manufacturer. If future inventions of more efficient machinery developed so much power out of the water supply that he could not possibly use all of it, he could sell the surplus and avoid coming under the laws ordinarily controlling the operation of public utilities. For instead of selling it directly to the consumer he could merely sell it to another public-utility company—thus taking advantage of a loophole in the Alabama public-utility law which provides that the law shall be applicable only to a utility which sells power directly to the public. Mr. Ford could make his own terms with any public-utility company, and if that company needed the power badly enough it would have to meet his terms and pass the cost on to the people, Mr. Ford being out of reach of the law.

Mr. Ford made that carefully hedged offer two years ago. There was no unanimity on the subject, and much agitation at the time against the acceptance of the bid; the matter was allowed to drag. Observe what happened in the meantime. Real-estate speculators descended in a body on Muscle Shoals. They plotted out the country into lots, for miles in all directions. They bought it cheap, of course, and saved most of their money for "literature." They sent this literature out in the most approved California-Florida style, by the ton load. The country surrounding Muscle Shoals was described as a second heaven. Mr. Ford was to be god, and he was only awaiting a mandate from Congress to come in and take his throne. The streets were shortly to be paved with gold. The response to the invitation was all that the hopeful heart of any speculator could desire. With the usual sprinkling of widows, orphans, and school-teachers came a generous arrival of farmers. All of these buyers immediately began to inform their congressmen that the country could only be saved by giving Mr. Ford Muscle Shoals. They were of course more interested in saving their investments than saving the country, but congressmen cannot be expected to know such things.

In the meantime, in addition to the ordinary selling literature, the original speculators sent out special farmer literature advertising the wholly mythical idea that Mr. Ford intended to manufacture fertilizer for the farmers at half its present cost. The farmers were charmed with the thought, and even those who had not bought land immediately began petitioning congressmen to give them cheap fertilizer by giving Mr. Ford Muscle Shoals. Farmers sent letters; their farmer-organizations sent lobbies; the sanguine speculators laid aside a fund for lobbying as well as for circulars; in the meantime Mr. Ford also began pulling his wires.

He has denied that he has ever financed any propaganda in favor of his bid. In view of Mr. Ford's action in permitting his biographer to state unblushingly that all of the Ford war-profits had been returned to the Government, Mr. Ford's asseverations or denials are perhaps not to be taken too seriously. If we accept his claim that he has never financed any direct propaganda, the evidence that he has done it by indirection seems too large to be ignored. The exact extent of this propaganda expenditure will probably never be known—just as the direct and indirect expenditure made in the attempt to put a large share of the country's oil resources in the hands of one or two men will probably never be known.

In the meantime, although Mr. Ford's offer was the first, it has by no means been the last. There have been at least three offers made by other interests in very recent months. The terms of these have not been given any undue publicity by Congress. At least one of them is considerably larger than Mr. Ford's offer and more favorable to the public interest.

The Associated Power Companies of the South, for instance, have offered to lease the Shoals for a period of fifty years, without any first option on the renewal, and giving the Government at the end of that time the privilege of raising the rental, if a renewal was granted. They agreed to manufacture a maximum of 50,000 tons of nitrate a year, instead of Mr. Ford's offer of 40,000, submitting to price and manufacturing conditions which were almost identical in substance to those offered by Mr. Ford. They did not insist that the Government should sell them the nitrate plants, as did Mr. Ford, who offered only $5,000,000 for the deed to this property which cost the Government $83,000,000. Instead, they offered to lease one of the plants along with the power privilege, enabling them to manufacture the amount of fertilizer guaranteed. For this fifty-year-power lease they offered in round figures $160,000,000, to be paid in annual instalments. For an adequate basis of comparison with Mr. Ford's offer this amount should be doubled, making an equivalent of $320,000,000 offered by the power companies for a 100-year lease against $255,000,000 offered by Mr. Ford for the same property—part of which property, however, he was purchasing for all time.

It must be remembered that these Associated Power Companies are the same companies that have developed the Southern superpower system to the stage it occupies today. There are good reasons for and against public operation of national resources by private corporations; it remains that in these operations the private corporations are strictly regulated in the matter of fair costs and rates. Those leasing water-power are strictly controlled both by the Federal Water Power Act and the State public-utility laws, and when their power is relayed from State to State they also come under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under this carefully hedged control the Associated Power Companies have performed an acceptable public service.

The Congressional Reporting Committee, however, had to find at least one acceptable reason for throwing its favor to Mr. Ford. The most plausible reason for accepting one offer instead of another would be that the one was higher.

Observe here the workings of high finance. The committee put its brains to work. It figured out that the $5,000,000 cash which Mr. Ford paid for the title to the nitrate plants could be made to equal $20,000,000 in 100 years' time if the Government put it out at 4 per cent interest for the period of the lease. (This of course works out on the principle that if a man pays you $10,000 for your house today, you can really figure that you're getting $40,000, if you count in the interest you can draw on the money in a hundred years.) This item of $20,000,000, so arrived at, was gravely set down in the published report of the committee as an actual part of Mr. Ford's offer. Part of the lease money to be paid in annual instalments every year was called by Mr. Ford an amortization fund and totaled $4,415,154; the committee estimated that this amount put out at interest in the same way would total $49,071,935 at the end of a century, and this item was also actually set down as a part of Mr. Ford's offer. The committee also figured that it would cost Mr. Ford at least $30,000,000 to maintain during a century's time the nitrate plants that he bought from the Government; it took this sum that Mr. Ford would naturally expect to spend in maintenance of his own nitrate plants, stated that he would relieve the Government of that great burden, and gravely published this $30,000,000 as another part of the payment offered by Mr. Ford. By similar methods of fantastic finance, the reporting committee rummaged up a number of additional millions which could be added to Mr. Ford's actual cash offer; finally it was able to announce that Mr. Ford's offer was just a little larger than the bid of any of his competitors. It is true that the minority report of the committee threw a somewhat different light on the situation. But minorities are seriously declining both in importance and fashion.

Mr. Ford has agreed, it will be noted, to form a $10,000,000 corporation to handle the grant of power. He will presumably retain control of the corporation during his lifetime—Mr. Ford has never been known to let anyone else control what he owns. When he dies, no one knows who will control the corporation—but it will not be the Government. For according to the grant such a corporation would be specifically out of reach of present State and federal utility laws.

This, then, is the Napoleon who is confidently awaiting birth in the cavernous womb of Washington. No one who knows the facts knows enough of them to understand why Congress should give its assent to such a situation. Superpower rightly used might eventually make a race of supermen. But they are endowed with a curious innocence who believe that it should be turned over to Mr. Ford so that he may transform himself into a superman.

Putting Muscle Shoals on the Map

By C. F. ADAMS

Sheffield, Alabama, March 8

MUSCLE SHOALS is on the map. Not one of those small black specks that inhabit our maps by the thousands, but a large black circle indicating a highly important center. License plates from all over the United States have become familiar to the local inhabitants. Big touring-cars go purring by any time, their licenses announcing Maine, Massachusetts, California, Florida, or Oregon, as the case may be, and nobody gets excited. It is an everyday sight. The Detroit tags are perhaps the most frequent, which tells a clear story. Yes, Muscle Shoals is on the map.

Wilson Dam, at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, two miles from Sheffield, and the two adjacent nitrate plants are war babies that have not found life a very rosy affair. Nobody seems to love them. Sired by the Wilson Administration during war-time stress and need when the usual ceremonies of finance were dispensed with, these war babies proved to be rather embarrassing youngsters when the war was over and questions began to be asked. They were an indignity the present Government did not altogether approve of and did not care to assume. Yet $100,000,000 worth of concrete and smoke-stacks could not be boarded up and entirely forgotten. They had to be reckoned with somehow. So an official inspection of Muscle Shoals was instituted. And since then Muscle Shoals has been well inspected. During the past four years whole legions of delegations and special representatives and committees and subcommittees and engineers and assistant engineers and photographers and reporters and anyone else who wanted to have a trip in a private car, have passed over the grounds and returned to Washington with data in hand to expedite the reckoning. And while the official reckoning goes on in Washington we are doing some reckoning of our own in Alabama.

"Reckon Ford will get Muscle Shoals?" is the form in which the question is put down here. Everybody asks it of everybody else. "Reckon Ford will come?" they ask before they swap off the mule or pay the taxes or buy the girls a piano. The old salutation of "How do you do?" has given way to the more pointed "Reckon Ford will come?" for our state of being depends on how we reckon.

All this reckoning up there in Washington and down here on the street corners and in local drug-stores has proved to be a good thing in the way of advertising. People from the four corners of the earth, not waiting on the deliberations of Congress, have rushed down upon us, grabbed any kind of lodging they could find, and placed themselves in line to wait for Ford. And as the days go by and the deliberating prolongs itself, so does the line. Every train brings reinforcements. So by this time there is a substantial immigration overflowing our tranquil little cities, filling the hotels, pouncing on the news-stands and buying all the papers before respectable citizens have had breakfast, renting all the taxis, hiring all the cooks, swooping through the drug-stores and drinking all the sorts of dope, jostling elbows unused to jostling, and moving on oblivious. But the esteemed citizen has his inning. He rents out his spare room, in the largeness of his heart, thereby conferring a favor upon the stranger at his door. And later he takes him out and sells him a few acres of the old home place that has been in the family forever. It is a privilege for the newcomer. But with the changing of the ancient title come other changes. The acre no longer remains an acre. It becomes acreage. There is a difference. Acres are planted in the spring and laid by in the fall. Acreage is subdivided and sold on the instalment plan. The landscape has changed. Gone is the "nigger" and the mule, gone is the cotton house and the old rail fence. In their place is a brisk young gentleman, a high-powered car, and a modern little office, where the typewriter clicks and the telephone rings and a general air of something-is-bound-to-happen-soon drapes itself over the scene. There is every essential of a big boom at Muscle Shoals except the boom.

The Muscle Shoals are in the upper part of Alabama, stretching themselves majestically across the Tennessee River as it makes its way through a spur of the Cumberland Mountains, forming the beautiful Tennessee Valley. The shoals, waiting through the ages for man to tame their roaring waters and harness their mighty power, have always been a formidable but picturesque obstruction to navigation. According to legend, the name for the shoals comes to us from the Indians. The red man, making his way up the river, found that it took what we call muscle to put his birch canoe over the rocky shoals, and with characteristic directness called them accordingly. The early white man, being of the same opinion but finding the Indian name difficult, gave us the present translation. However, the prosaic etymologists and geologists like to argue with the legend. They claim that the name was derived from an innocent little bivalve which played a leading role in the formation of the shoals, and that the correct spelling of the name was lost in the early days, probably due to the lack of proper educational advantages in that period.

Have it any way you like, but when you stand on the bank and hear the roar of the waters rushing over the rocks you'll think muscle shoals, yourself! The vast hydro-electric possibilities of Muscle Shoals have long been recognized. Engineers from time to time in the past have called attention to the power going to waste over the shoals, but it was not till the need for nitrate during the World War became urgent that any decisive action was taken. Then in 1916 Congress passed the National Defense Act appropriating millions of dollars for the construction of two nitrate plants and all appurtenances at Muscle Shoals. These giant plants were rushed to completion. But so was the war; and then the nitrate plants and Wilson Dam were, so to speak, mustered out. For four years now we have been piloting our tourists out to the abandoned project and explaining that the boards they see across doors and windows are not a part of the original plans.

Plant No. 2, as the largest of the plants at Muscle Shoals is called, was built at a cost of $69,000,000 and has a capacity for 110,000 tons per annum of ammonium nitrate, cyanamid process. This plant covers two thousand acres and during the war employed twenty thousand men. It was built and was producing nitrate within one year, and is the largest nitrate plant in the world. Plant No. 1, much smaller than No. 2, was largely given over to experiments, the Haber process being employed. Adjacent to Plant No. 2 is a large steam-power plant, one of the largest in America. This steam plant was built so that Nitrate Plant No. 2 could begin at once to produce nitrate without waiting for Wilson Dam to be finished. This tremendous project would have required several years of continuous work, but after the war work was discontinued and was not permanently resumed until July of 1922, when a new appropriation of $7,500,000 a year was made. There are now 4,600 men at work on the dam with Colonel G. R. Spaulding as district engineer in charge. A large construction camp, including homes, churches, schools, and stores, has been built on the north bank of the river for the accommodation of the men and their families. Work is going forward on all main divisions of the dam. Thirty miles of standard-gauge railroad has been built for construction use and thirty locomotives are employed. Two hundred flat cars, box cars, dump cars, and gondolas switch up and down; twenty-five large boats and barges ply back and forth with sand and gravel; and with a hundred rock drills, three large concrete mixing-plants, and ten ten-ton electrical cranes working day and night the place looks busy. Wilson Dam, when completed, will be the largest single piece of monolithic concrete construction in the world, its volume of masonry being 1,260,000 cubic yards. This is three times as much masonry as is contained in the Roosevelt Dam in Arizona and 100,000 cubic yards larger than the Assuan Dam in Egypt. The total length of the dam will be five thousand feet, an almost pure white monolith 160 feet wide at the base and rising 130 feet above the river bed. The bottom of the river at Muscle Shoals is solid limestone rock. The dam rests upon this bottom, and is made one with it, "toed in" to resist the tremendous pressure of the water. The excavation necessary to solidify the structure with the bed of the river is a giant undertaking itself. More than 600,000 cubic feet of rock must be blasted out, and nearly as much earth removed. At the south end, where the power-house is being built, the excavations will go down thirty feet. This is to give swift escape to the water pouring through the turbines. Eighteen great turbines will be installed with a generating capacity of 600,000 horse-power. Wilson Dam is built to stay.

The river at Muscle Shoals has a total fall of 130 feet in the thirty miles of rapids. The dam will create a lake sixteen miles long; four miles above the dam this lake will be a mile wide and a hundred feet deep. Sixteen miles above Wilson Dam another dam is to be built, forming above itself a lake seventy miles long. These two great bodies of water will eliminate all danger from the shoals and the Tennessee River will then be open to the largest river craft, making the vast Tennessee basin accessible from the sea. Important as this is, it is only a by-product of Wilson Dam. The object of the dam is to develop the latent power of Muscle Shoals. The dam when completed will afford adequate power for a region covering a radius of 500 miles, besides supplying the world's largest nitrate plant with sufficient power for the manufacture of explosives in time of war and fertilizer in time of peace. The estimated cost of the project is fifty million dollars.

Mr. Ford Is So Good

By WILLIAM HARD

MR. FORD has proved himself to be a more powerful man and a more persuasive man than Mr. Doheny or Mr. Sinclair. They were able to persuade one cabinet member to go rather far in disposing of public property on terms which both Mr. Doheny and Mr. Sinclair have declared to be advantageous to the Government but also enormously profitable to them and to their stockholders. Mr. Ford has gone much farther.

He has been able to persuade a whole great section of the American population to accept from him a bribe in the shape of a promised reduction of their bills for fertilizers and in return for that bribe they have ardently supported a bill which now has been passed by the House of Representatives and which conveys to Mr. Ford, partly in fee and partly in a one-hundred-year lease, an immensely valuable governmental property on terms which constitute it, in Senator Norris's words, "the greatest gift ever bestowed upon any mortal man since salvation was made free to the human race."

The site of this gift is the Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee River in northern Alabama. The debates on it in the House of Representatives clearly indicate, and in fact absolutely demonstrate, that the only argument, the only alleged argument, for making this gift to Mr. Ford is that in return he will manufacture fertilizers in an annual quantity involving or containing 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen at a price yielding him a profit not exceeding 8 per cent on the cost of production.

One member of the House of Representatives, Mr. Wefald of Minnesota, was shocked by this 8 per cent. He reflected, and expressed the reflection, that Mr. Ford had been shocked by the idea of guaranteeing a profit of 6 per cent to the railroads. He moved that Mr. Ford's profit on fertilizers manufactured at Muscle Shoals should be limited to 5 per cent. He thought that if the Government was willing to build dams for Mr. Ford at Muscle Shoals at its own expense for the production of the electric power for the manufacturing of his fertilizers, and if on this expense (amounting in all probability to a great deal more than $50,000,000) the Government was willing to charge Mr. Ford an annual interest payment of less than 4 per cent, why, Mr. Ford, being so notably a good man, should be willing to sell fertilizers to farmers at a profit of 5 per cent and no more.

His motion, which was in the form of an amendment to the bill as passed, was voted down. The great historic reason why it was voted down, and why all amendments in any way changing the bill to the disadvantage of Mr. Ford were voted down, was thoroughly revealed in a colloquy between Mr. Wefald and Mr. McKenzie of Illinois, who was in charge of the bill, and a further colloquy between Mr. Burton of Ohio, who was the bill's strongest opponent, and Mr. McKenzie. Mr. Burton said to Mr. McKenzie:

"On what basis is this 8 per cent to be computed? Is it the value of the permanent property? Is the right of the lessee to be counted in? Is the value of the water-power to be counted in? Or is this merely on the bare cost of manufacturing fertilizers?"

Mr. McKenzie replied:

"I will say to my distinguished friend from Ohio that I cannot answer that question categorically. I do not know."

Thus Mr. McKenzie absolved himself from any exact knowledge of any exact reason for selecting the figure 8 to be the numeral expressing Mr. Ford's proper profit out of fertilizers at Muscle Shoals. He immediately thereafter, however, showed a perfect understanding of the reason why he was in fact supporting the figure 8. He said:

"I do know this: this maximum of 8 per cent was agreed upon by the representatives of the farm organizations of the country."

Thus we perceive a most important political fact in democratic government. If the Sinclair company or the Doheny company should agree upon a rate of profit which they would charge on a government contract, the agreement would be a thing to be concealed and denied. If a farm organization agrees upon a rate of profit on public property to be charged and gained by a gentleman who offers to reduce the bills of its members for fertilizers on farms which they individually own and out of which they gain and pursue their wholly individual private personal fortunes, why, then the agreement is a thing which is a frank legitimate public argument for the passage of a bill to be paid for through the nose by taxpayers who are not farmers.

This fact was made still clearer in Mr. McKenzie's colloquy with Mr. Wefald. Mr. McKenzie, replying to Mr. Wefald's forlorn and hopeless desire to cut Mr. Ford's profit to 5 per cent, said severely:

"I want to say that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota simply cuts down the 8 per cent maximum profit that Mr. Ford can charge for the manufacture of fertilizers. I want to say further to my friends on this side of the House (the Republican side) that this particular section was agreed to by the representatives of the farm organizations of the country; and the committee accepted it as their judgment. It was written into the bill to satisfy them; and any man who pretends to come from a farming district must understand that in fighting this section he is fighting the representatives of the farm organizations of this country."

Thus the principle emerges which many times, and even monotonously, has been detailed in these letters from Washington. The rural revolt, which it was hoped would lead to an attack upon all special interests, has yielded only the arrival of one more special interest.

Irony, as usual, is contributed to the scene. Mr. Ford, in the Muscle Shoals bill, as actually written and as actually passed by the House of Representatives, makes no promise whatsoever about any reduction in the price of fertilizers. That promise is only in the hot air rising from the committee hearings on the bill. It is not in the bill. The bill contains not one word guaranteeing, or even surmising, any reduction in the price of fertilizers.

Mr. Ford undertakes simply to manufacture a certain amount of fertilizers and to sell this amount at a profit of not more than 8 per cent on a totally unknown basis of estimating his cost of production.

In return for this undertaking he comes into possession of a water-power many times greater in amount than any amount which he proposes and undertakes to use for the manufacturing of fertilizers.

A minority of the water-power to be developed at Muscle Shoals is promised to fertilizers. A majority of it, an overwhelming majority of it, is left free to Mr. Ford to use as he pleases with no restrictions whatsoever.

Mr. Burton of Ohio moved an amendment to the effect that Mr. Ford's enterprise at Muscle Shoals should be subjected to the same restrictions and regulations which today are imposed upon all other water-power developments initiated and consummated by other American citizens. He proposed—that is—that Mr. Ford's Muscle Shoals enterprise should be saddled with the provisions of the standard existing Water Power Act which has been on the statute books since the year 1920 and which is supposed to extend its beneficent or malignant sway over all citizens equally.

Thus, according to Mr. Burton's motion, the temporal length of Mr. Ford's arrangement with the Government at Muscle Shoals would not be one hundred years as written in the bill. It would be only fifty years, which is all that any other American citizen, according to the provisions of the Water Power Act, could get.

Thus all of Mr. Ford's "excess profits," whether from the water-power which he will use for fertilizers or from the immensely greater water-power which he will use for himself, would be paid not to himself but to the United States Government, just exactly as in the case of any other citizen today getting a water-power permit from the federal Water Power Commission.

Thus also, if Mr. Burton's motion for an amendment had been adopted, Mr. Ford, like any other citizen in similar circumstances, would have no preference right for the renewal of his contract with the Government at the end of the period of his contract. Under the bill as passed Mr. Ford gains that exceptional right.

Under Mr. Burton's motion, further, Mr. Ford would be obligated, like any other citizen in similar circumstances, to pay for the whole maintenance of his dam or dams and to bear the whole cost of the maintenance of navigation for the public in the locks through the dams. In Mr. Ford's case these costs for Mr. Ford are restricted to certain named amounts. Numerous amendments for making Mr. Ford bear these costs in full were heavily defeated.

Under Mr. Burton's amendment, if Mr. Ford should start to sell any of his tremendous surplus power from Muscle Shoals, the price at which he could sell it would be regulated either by the local State government or else by the federal Water Power Commission.

All these ideas, and numerous others, by Mr. Burton for assimilating and harmonizing Mr. Ford to the ordinary status of the ordinary citizen of this republic were heavily and emphatically voted down.

The idea was that Mr. Ford, not in the bill but in the air—whether cold from his own reticence as to his intentions or hot from the propaganda of the farm organizations as to his intentions—was minded to reduce the cost of fertilizers for farmers and that therefore he should be exempted from all the rules and regulations in other circumstances imposed upon all other citizens of this republic.

Senator Norris expressed the bare truth when he said:

"Nothing else has ever happened so calculated to shake a man's faith in democratic government."

The proposed contract with Mr. Ford falls into two parts. The first part sells him a lot of property now owned by the United States Government. The second part leases him a gigantic property to be built or completed by the United States Government.

The part which has been sold to him is estimated by the Ordnance Department of the War Department to be worth at a forced sale the sum of sixteen million dollars. It is sold to Mr. Ford at a final cash payment of one million five hundred thousand dollars.

The part which is leased to Mr. Ford is leased to him for interest payments and for other so-called "amortization" payments which for the one hundred years of the contract are found to work out to a total of 2.85 per cent per year on the money expended by the Government.

Two reasons really are found for this extraordinarily exceptional treatment accorded to Mr. Ford.

The first is that Mr. Ford is a heap big medicine man and a different man from all other men and a friend of the people and a seller of cars at a low price and a payer of high wages and a developer of the American country-side and a man who is good. He is a good man. Therefore the Water Power Act should not apply to him. The constitution of Italy should not apply to Mussolini. The Water Power Act of the United States should not apply to Mr. Ford. Both Mussolini and Mr. Ford are supermen. It was supposed that Italy, having had experience with Marius and Sulla and Julius Caesar, should welcome supermen beyond the law. It was not known that this republic had advanced so far toward the condition of the Roman Republic in the first century before Christ.

The second reason for Mr. Ford's exemption from the common lot of common American applicants before the federal Water Power Commission is only an intensification of the first reason. It is that Mr. Ford is so good that he has gained the respect and support of our farm organizations irrespective of the consequences to all other elements of the population.

The essential combined ultimate reason is that Mr. Ford is so good. At last he cashes in on it. He gets the largest, the most expansive, the most indefinitely and miraculously valuable public property of the United States Government at a fraction of its value for that part of it which he buys and at 2.85 per cent interest payments on the part of it which he leases.

Naturally and with all of his native and charming and poignant and devastating wit the radical Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Norris, inquires:

"Has it come to this, that because a man is good and great, and because we have confidence in him, we should give him a special privilege and a particular inheritance that we would give to no one else? Has it come to this, that a citizen can come to Congress and, because he is honest and upright, claim that contracts made for ordinary men shall not apply to him? Should a municipality permit a Christian to charge a higher rate for lighting the homes of the city than it would permit an infidel to charge? Have we reached the point of saying that we are going to permit good men to capitalize their virtue and to be paid a premium for it out of the Treasury of the United States?"

It would be an impertinence to add anything to these remarks by Mr. Norris.

More Light on "Progressivism"

MR. GILSON GARDNER, of Washington, D. C., who was the star newspaper inside eye-witness of the eruption of "Progressivism" in 1912, writes in to The Nation's Washington office to say:

DEAR HARD:

Before this subject of What Is Progressivism? fades into the limbo of forgetfulness, why not glance at the historic origin of the term?

When the noble T. R. was felling wild animals in Africa the noble and red-headed Vic Murdock of Kansas was waging a bitter fight against Cannonism and the rules of the House of Representatives. It was a struggle to get a little more legislative freedom—and the struggle was in the interests of the common people. "Uncle Joe" Cannon, Speaker of the House and upholder of the rules, was the author of that slogan dropped from the poker table, "We stand pat." He had introduced "standpattism" into the political argument. It is clear what "standpattism" meant. If you have got the swag on the table and four aces in your hand you "stand pat." The red-headed Murdock, however, won, and the rules were slightly fractured—perhaps it would be better to say slightly bent. The crowd at Victor's back were known as "insurgents." They had insurged against House discipline. They were rebels.

Then returned the noble T. R. from his African hunt and to a couple of his newspaper friends conveyed this message:

"Tell Victor to drop that word 'Insurgents' and to use the term 'Progressives.' That term expresses itself. It is what the group really stands for. It is a general and continuing word. Insurgency is simply a passing phase. Remember to call them 'Progressives.'"

And that was the beginning of what later developed into the Progressive Party. Mr. Woodrow Wilson with his facility of language paraphrased them as "forward-looking" men.

And that's that!

G. G.

Thus Mr. Gardner reveals the historic politics of the matter. Meanwhile Mr. Donald Richberg of Chicago, who has gained much fame in courts of law in public-utilities cases and who now is attorney for the La Follette Railroad Valuation Conference, has been turning to the historical philosophy of it.

He attempts, in contending for Mr. Hard's prize, to base "progressivism" on a philosophy of history from the days of tribal chieftains down to these days of direct primaries. His remarks accordingly are rather extensive and yet of such interest that we herewith willingly surrender the rest of this page to certain central excerpts from them.

Mr. Richberg makes "progressivism" consist essentially in a personal harmony with the aspirations and processes through which, in his view, human society is continuously impelled toward giving a larger and larger expression to the human personality of every human being. He says:

DEAR HARD:

A belief that the world does not merely revolve but moves from lesser things to greater things rests upon faith. . . .

Evolution to the "progressive" means not merely change but purposeful change. . . .

The tendency of centuries of political evolution is toward a broadening of the base of political control.

The ruling group has grown steadily larger.

"Warrior control" lay in the power of a few. They seized and held the things they wanted.

To aid in retaining this control a larger group of hereditary nobility was developed.

This group in turn was succeeded by a still larger group of property owners.

The present power of the group of property owners is now in the process of transfer to a still larger group of labor controllers. These labor controllers include both business managers and labor organizers. . . .

The economic result of progress toward democracy has been a constant decrease in the power of a property right and a constant increase in the power of a service ability.

The billionaire today has a greater aggregate power than the feudal baron but he has far less power over each property unit and over each human being within his vast domain than the feudal baron exercised over his manor.

Though the total of privilege may be enormously increased, the amount of irresponsible privilege is diminishing.

The mere possession of things as a means of exercising power is becoming less valuable and the capacity to use things as a means of exercising power is becoming more valuable. . . .

The political ruler has become a "leader." The industrial master has become an "organizer." The laws of "ruler and subject," of "master and servant," gradually disappear. The obligations of "public servant and citizen," of "employer and employee," become the measure of power.

The organizer of force gives way to the organizer of cooperation.

This struggle between the principle of coercion and the principle of cooperation, between the principle of mastery and the principle of service, provides perhaps the most significant alignment between progressives and conservatives. Strive as he may to appear (and even to feel himself) a "liberal," the conservative puts his faith in mastery for the solution of all problems. He wants the "strong men" and the "best minds" to rule in political and industrial affairs, deciding what is "best for all" and imposing their decisions on the masses of the weak and ignorant. He is impatient with committees and conferences and town meetings and such efforts to develop and express the opinions of the "mob" on public questions which he is positive they cannot comprehend. The benevolent autocrats of industry promise that "justice" shall be done to "their" wage-earners but they oppose vigorously all efforts of these employees to define and to make sure that they obtain what they regard as "justice," by balancing their collective labor (or service) power against his property (or privilege) power. They regard themselves as master minds created to exercise mastery. This is true conservatism. The contrary progressive philosophy may be summed up in three propositions:

1. Less autocracy and more democracy.
2. Less privilege and more service.
3. Less coercion and more cooperation.

Then these three propositions may be expressed as one, in the language of the Carpenter who preached democracy, service, and cooperation against the autocracy, privilege, and coercion of the master men of Rome and the priests of Jerusalem: "And whosoever would be first among you shall be servant of all." DONALD RICHBERG

Large numbers of other communications on this topic have been received and will—from time to time—be printed in full or in excerpts. Readers who feel moved to write are requested to be as concise as the state of their feelings will permit.

The Wife—Civilian Shell-Shock

By ROBERT WYLIE WELDON

Ten years you've sat (within the room you wrought)
To guard me from the Fear,
Except for hurried trip (when I was out)
Downtown . . . and near, quite near.

Ten years you've sat, except for stolen walk
(With scribbled note on shelf),
By lakeside lane or neighbor's hollyhock,
Anxiously, by yourself.

Ten years together we have hugged our home
Because of this fierce Fear,
And made our prison-close a world to roam,
Counting so dear, so dear,

Our swims, our skatings, picnics, we together,
Our phases of the moon,
Getting our changes from the changing weather
From June around to June;

Viewing our lake (from hills behind our door)
With its blue miles of light,
While those far woodlands on the other shore
Turned green . . . then red . . . then white;

Calling a luncheon at a near café
A journey on the train,
Calling a neighboring concert, lecture, play
A voyage to Greece or Spain;

Reading by lamp of Rome and Gypsy Trail,
Where friends go two and two (Whither I'd hoped with bride of mine to sail While yet this Curse was new). . . .

Ten years . . . and you have still such youth and grace,
One born to see and do. . . .
While even in Town-and-Gown your woman's place
My Fear withholds from you.

You dream no more (though long the dream was dear)
Of any child at breast,
Playing the mother to a cureless Fear
(Cureless, for all my quest).

Ten years . . . and though I try to think my wife
In spirit still is free,
And in so cherishing my wretched life
Works her good works through me,

Yet gnaws me utterly one grief and shame:
You've paid, because you could,
For a foul wrong to me, before you came,
That broke my hardihood.

The gold that forged the path from moon to her
Was crawling nearer on the lolling lake. . . .
She watched it, listening to the wordless purr
Of voices on another bench . . . a break . . .
She knew its meaning well. That silence rushed Into her ear drums like the blatant blare
Of trumpets, and she flung into the hushed
Discordance words she would have whispered there,
Words made to whisper as the night grows old.
But only blackness heard her—blackness lit
With pin-points trembling in the distant cold.
The rocking path had lengthened bit by bit,
Its lapping fangs were closer . . . now the gold Touched shore. She rose and walked out into it.

The Servant of the Prince

By MAXWELL BODENHEIM

For isolation in an apple tree
The servant of the prince was called insane.
They found him clinging to the topmost branch
And flippantly engrossed in breaking words
Into an understanding of the moon.
"The moon encounters nothing with a stare,"
He said, "and asks each man to scandalize
The blank with toys of meaning called conceits.
The moon has no respect for walls of bone:
The moon can sidle into sky-proof heads
And bring a dissolution to the forms
Of thought whose quilted stiffness hides with earth.
With curved, insidious impertinence
The moon attacks each gloating confidence
And murders it to journeys of despair
That find a crazy lure between the stars.
The moon is also cruel to the flesh
That moans of victories and rips apart
Impending ceremonies with a butcher's fright.
The moon slips in between the cries and grips
Each heart until it whimpers and denies
The false proportions of its bloated dream.
The moon is poison innocently thrown
To fat philosophies at night, when words
Of reason float away and lie impaled
Upon the mutinies of trees and rocks.
The moon gives plumes of light to youth, and so Retrieves the cheaply crushed servility
Of legs and arms, and sends a charlatan's
Enchantment to the miseries of breasts.
The moon provides another skin for age
And bundles lies of glory in a soft,
Loose fabric better suited to the touch
Of one new connoisseur and wastrel—Death."
They asked the servant of the prince to tell
Why he had sought the apple tree's top branch
For company while meeting trivial words.
"It is the point where certain fruits of earth Receive the sky," he said, and took their blows.

Pants vs. Plus Fours at Palm Beach

By STUART CHASE

What I want to say is, watch your stock of white linen knickers from now on. The nearer you are to large metropolitan cities the closer you should watch this stock. Even hoi polloi will drop them eventually.

THUS a prophet named "Merchaneer" in the Daily News Record of March 10, 1924. The Record is the trade journal of the clothing industry. Under its auspices a survey has been made of what men are wearing at Palm Beach this season. A corps of statisticians and research workers, with stop-watches and time cards complete, have been dispatched to the great winter resort, and the results of their labors fill eight pages of the Record. Three hundred of America's sartorial exquisites—including oil kings, master bootleggers, stock-brokers, and manufacturers of widgets—have been carefully analyzed from the skin out. "The data were gathered on the beach, at the exclusive clubs, on hotel verandas, and at Cocoanut Grove." The underlying statistical material is presented in no less than 21 charts—of which we reproduce a specimen couple—and the whole investigation is prefaced by Merchaneer's able summary.

Here statistical methodology comes at last into its own. Here we analyze more tangible data than the course of discount rates, wholesale prices, bank clearings, and the net yields of stocks and bonds. Here the socks, hats, jackets, knickers, neckties, and bathing suits worn by the most gorgeous ornaments of the republic are capable of exact observation and exact measurement, and the modes and the medians which flow from the raw data are nearer to the heart of a waiting world than all the bank-discount graphs and cost-of-living charts ever invented. Here science and the mores meet.

The one big thing worth your deepest consideration is the fact—18 per cent of the men on the golf links are wearing flannel trousers instead of knickers. When your time comes to sell flannel trousers in quantity play them hard! A man at a summer resort with just plain white flannel trousers is a hick. People will think he has just one pair that he washes and presses in his room at night. It's like a man who wears nothing but plain blue collar-attached shirts. Very few men can afford to let people think that he doesn't change his shirt every day. Your customers should all have plain white flannel trousers of course. But they should alternate with a pair of stripes—or several pair of various stripe effects. You should sell more flannel trousers than you have sold knickers if you promote the fact—in your advertising—why a man should have a set of flannel trousers. Be frank and tell the men of your town why they should have whites and grays, plain and with stripes.

Bar charts make it plain that in 1923, 59 per cent of Palm Beach bloods wore regular pants off the golf links (the balance being knickers), while in 1924 the percentage leaped to 72! In 1923 a clean 100 per cent wore knickers on the golf links, while in 1924 the taboo had been sufficiently lifted to allow no less than 18 per cent of all golf players to cover their shins. Well may Merchaneer warn the trade to watch its stock of plus fours. An era of deflation has set in. And dear knows, there is more profit in white flannel pants at fifteen dollars, especially in sets of flannels, than in linen knickers at seven fifty.

Pants to be sure are the big outstanding feature of the survey, but pants are not the whole story:

Note the figures on colored shirts with collars to match and get busy! Note that 39 per cent of the collar-attached shirts are worn with the collars pinned down. Last year 91 per cent of the shirts worn on the golf links at Palm Beach were white. This year only 69 per cent were white. Note this, and once again revive hope in the shirt business!

Neckties. Last year 73 per cent of the men wore foulards. This year the ratio has shrunk to 40 per cent:

This summer you can play regimental stripes as the new and correct idea in men's wear. And a brand new scarf in fantastic futuristic designs of unusually bold patterns is making its bid for national favor. Watch it carefully, for it is going to have a run.

Jackets.

Notice the chart on jackets and the fact that belted coats have swung back to 22 per cent. Also note that while last year 72 per cent of the coats were ventless, only 44 per cent this year are without a vent. Do you recall that a year ago I said that the better-dressed man would reinsert a vent in his coat?

From jackets, Merchaneer works up to his peroration, which shows him to be no mean psychologist.

And the public, while they think they are sure what they want, they want to be told what they want. They would believe you if you tried to tell them. They will believe a chart showing in cold, hard figures in printed analysis form what the men they envy and imitate are wearing.

As in all sound statistical surveys, the tabulations and the charts follow the summary and conclusions. Here are page after page of charts filling the full newspaper-sized sheet—bar charts, pie charts, percentage charts, admirably drawn, charmingly shaded. Of the multitude of figures, we can only select an item here and there. Twenty-six per cent of all Palm Beach hats are Sennet straws, and 24 per cent are panamas. Supporting data show that 59 per cent of panamas are worn with brims turned down, 21 per cent

Amnesty and the Civil Liberties Union

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to take issue with an article in The Nation for January 2, entitled The Great Battle for Amnesty by Albert DeSilver. As one of the I.W.W. prisoners recently unconditionally released from Leavenworth, I consider the article unfair and confusing.

1. The article stresses "the educational campaign conducted by the American Civil Liberties Union under the vigorous and dramatic leadership of Roger N. Baldwin." Until this Christmas there were no releases from Leavenworth of I.W.W. prisoners (who comprised nearly all of the political incarcerated there) unless application had been made for clemency or parole, or unless an offer of conditional commutation had been accepted. The last of the political prisoners, thirty in number, released December 22, 1923, signed nothing and promised nothing. All those previously released had signed repressive conditions imposed by the Department of Justice. This, of course, does not include the men who served their sentences.

2. I consider Mr. Roger Baldwin one of those who encouraged and condoned the waiving of civil rights by political prisoners, though his organization is supposed to champion these rights. Civil rights mean to me freedom of speech, freedom of press, free assemblage, and the right of the workers to organize. Yet about two years ago Mr. Baldwin, representing the Civil Liberties Union, visited the Federal penitentiary at Leavenworth and insisted that we file applications for clemency. He stated that if we refused to make such application we would serve our full sentences. Our refusal made him very indignant. How can any person honestly claim that he is defending civil rights when he is encouraging prisoners to sign away those rights—the very thing for which we went to prison?

It was the firm position taken by those who refused conditional release that attracted the attention of the thoughtful public.

3. Conditional commutation of sentence had been offered to eight political prisoners on Christmas Day, 1922. Three rejected it. Then on June 25, 1923, twenty-six prisoners were offered strongly restrictive conditional releases and eleven rejected them. It was the devotion to principle of these men and the efforts of their real friends which opened the way to the final release of all remaining political prisoners in Leavenworth on December 22, 1923, without conditions of any kind. This letter represents the opinion of several of the men who were released at that time.

Let us remember that those who advocate the waiving of civil rights can not consistently champion such rights.

Philadelphia, January 23

HARRY LLOYD

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Lloyd's attack on the fairness of Albert DeSilver's article on amnesty is based upon a total misapprehension of the facts. His contention that Mr. Baldwin asked any man to waive his civil rights is wholly without foundation. Neither the Civil Liberties Union nor Mr. Baldwin ever advocated the waiving of civil rights by anyone.

Mr. Baldwin's visit to Leavenworth on behalf of the Civil Liberties Union was for the purpose of discussing with the prisoners who refused to make applications for release, means for stating their position more clearly. Among the suggestions discussed was a joint application by the whole group. No effort was ever made to destroy the group's solidarity, which was the chief point at issue.

Mr. Lloyd's attitude is based upon a difference of opinion which arose among the I.W.W. prisoners at Leavenworth as to whether the acceptance of conditional release involved a surrender of civil rights. In this controversy, as in the controversy over applications for pardon, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Joint Amnesty Committee took the position consistently that they would help all bona fide political prisoners to secure their releases on whatever terms each man's conscience dictated. Therefore they worked equally for the men who came out and for the men who stayed in to the last.

In this position these organizations were throughout in cordial cooperation with the General Defense Committee of the I.W.W. Their position was sustained by the action of the recent convention of the I.W.W. which repudiated as disruptive the personal attacks on those who differed with them, by this group for whom Mr. Lloyd speaks. They were directed to cease agitating the issue in the organization.

It is not pleasant to have to make such a reply to Mr. Lloyd's strictures, but the unfortunate facts, which we had hoped could be confined to those directly concerned, speak for themselves.

Kansas Prohibition

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Any self-respecting man resents fulsome flattery, particularly when invidious comparison is intended. This may also be said of communities. The State of Kansas has been advertised by zealous advocates of prohibition as a virtuous example for other States to follow. This erroneous impression is subject to correction.

So-called prohibition went into effect in Kansas May 1, 1881, but open saloons continued for twenty-six years thereafter, or until May 1, 1907. During the year 1922 the Wichita police department reported 402 convictions for violation of the liquor laws while 334 cases were transferred on State warrants to the county and 17 cases to the federal Government. The department made 300 liquor raids and 11 stills and 122 gallons of liquor were captured and 50 barrels of mash were destroyed. As of course only a small fraction of law-breakers were apprehended, it will be seen that prohibition is far from being enforced in Kansas.

The Wichita Eagle in a recent editorial on bootlegging showed that it was nearly impossible to secure convictions under the prohibition law, concluding as follows: "These two concoctions (reclaimed alcohol and corn whiskey) are being sold almost openly in Wichita. Boys of high-school age may buy as readily as the old soak or the confirmed drunkard. The profits from the business are so enormous that it is no hardship on a bootlegger to fine him. Thirty days in jail does not deter him. As stated before, he cannot be convicted under the persistent violator clause. So there you are."

From the standpoint of national self-respect, is it not about time to cast off this cloak of dissemblance? Strenuous efforts are being made to clothe this law with a respect that does not and cannot exist. Law must be based on common sense and justice if it is to be respected. Those who place in the same category murder and wine-selling, thievery and beer-drinking, are themselves deficient in moral perception.

Aaron Burr defined law as "whatever is boldly asserted and plausibly maintained." To glorify a bad law is to bring all law into disrespect. A desired end does not justify the medium of a bad law. No question is settled until it is settled right.

The Constitution has, in the interest of human rights, been changed before. It can be changed again. Any bad law should be repealed. In Buckle's "History of Civilization" it is set down:

Every great reform which has been effected has consisted not in doing something new, but in undoing something old. The most valuable additions made to legislation have been enactments destructive of previous legislation; and the best laws which have been passed have been those by which some former laws have been repealed.

The Law and Chiropractic

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Edison would burn up New York, people said, when his carbon electric lamp was being first discussed. Columbus, Fulton, the Wright brothers, and other innovators were not taken seriously when they first sought recognition for their ideas. Chiropractic is such a new idea.

Just at present considerable publicity is being given Chiropractic, unfortunately not always of the desirable kind. The public has been interested in exposures of medical quacks and diploma mills. Unfortunately for Chiropractic it has been discussed in the same columns and made to associate with quackery of a brazen sort. If Chiropractic were legally recognized in this State, such discussion would not matter much. But the status is that of non-recognition. It is not illegal to practice Chiropractic in New York because it is not the practice of medicine. On more than one occasion decisions have been handed down in the courts of New York State declaring that Chiropractic cannot be considered the practice of medicine. And yet it is not officially recognized by the State.

Chiropractors must be patient. They ask the public to be patient also and to refrain from taking sides before investigating dispassionately the merits of their profession. The organized practitioners in the New York State Society are asking for State regulation and control with safeguards.

A Program for World Team-Work

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Under Our Own Peace Plan The Nation declared for slow but sure education under wise leadership. A possible form of the idea would be for six of the great Powers each to establish 2,000 or more three-year scholarships for developing potential statesmen, diplomats, journalists, and leaders in education, religion, and medicine. The 12,000 prospective representatives might be gathered, from five to twenty-five in every country, in existing universities equipped for introducing cosmopolitan departments, or in one or more specially founded world institutions at Washington or elsewhere.

Under the first plan, if the nations authorized, on the average, ten representative universities apiece, every one of the sixty institutions would internationalize an average of 200 potential statesmen. Of these, one hundred would be from the home country sanctioning the international university, and the other half from the five other Powers joining, twenty from each.

In forty-five years alumni above forty would come to 120,000 or more. With scholarships of $1,500, the cost of 12,000 students would be $3,000,000 a year to each country—nothing by contrast with the extravagance of billion-dollar armaments.

The World Conference on Education representing over forty nations resolved to investigate the possibility of founding a world university. Since then interest has developed so rapidly that the League of Nations may anticipate America in the plan, advocated in this country over six years ago. Should not far-sighted editors cooperate so that the first institution of cosmopolitan perfection may be launched under American ideals?

Under the African Sun

Claw and Fang. Stories of Animal Adventure. By Ernest Glanville. With illustrations by Warwick Reynolds. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

THE craft of writing animal stories is a very difficult and very delicate one. It is no easy matter to manipulate the mind of a reader into following with sustained interest the imaginary thoughts and actions of wild beasts. For such an undertaking three things are generally necessary. First, a sound knowledge of natural history; second, an almost clairvoyant intuition as to the probable behavior of animals under any given set of circumstances; and, third, literary tact of a high order. Mr. Ernest Glanville in "Claw and Fang" has proved himself to be master of the first two requirements but, upon occasions, he is sadly lacking in the last.

He is evidently a man who has been a close observer of the wild life of South Africa and one whose imagination has been deeply stirred by what he has seen. Again and again in his admirable volume he manages to create the atmosphere of that enormous hinterland which to this hour retains its immunity from the vulgar intrusion of the white man. Turning over the pages of this book those of us not unacquainted with the wonderful stretches of unbroken country he describes are made to hear once more the familiar veldt mutterings, the distant grunting of lions, and whooping of hyenas, the yelping of jackals, and indeed all those mysterious sounds which, night after night, echo across the dark undisturbed levels of those remote plains. We see also in the clear light of the blazing African sun the dry dongas, the hot lizard-haunted rocks, the narrow game-paths, and the long outlines of wide rolling hills. At his best Mr. Glanville works this magic upon us with but a few words thrown hastily together. He may refer only to the sound of reeds splitting in the intense heat of the midday or to the characteristic attitudes of lions as they move across open country "with swaying gait and lowered heads," but he achieves his end.

There is poetry in many of his passages, as, for example, in the picture he gives of the meeting of the lion and crocodile on the river bank: "Ngonyama crouched, immovable, to wait on events, a thing of bronze watching a thing of stone and in the brooding silence of the drought-stricken forest no visible creature intruded on the scene." A single sentence of his will sometimes be strikingly suggestive as when he alludes to "the eye of an aevsogel set like a gem in a hideous bald pate."

The same closeness of observation distinguishes his account of the meeting of Ngonyama with the pack of wild hunting dogs. The lion is uncertain as to the mood of the animals that surround him, and then suddenly he turns his head from the dead zebra he is devouring to catch "a fleeting view of strained and fierce excitement in the aspect of the dogs." Nobody unfamiliar with the character of these peculiarly dangerous and treacherous carnivora could have possibly suggested in so convincing a manner just that look of alert hesitating malice that these animals display when they are preparing to rush in upon their victim. One also appreciates Mr. Glanville in his more reflective moods when he meditates, for instance, upon the long warfare that has been sustained between men and lions, a warfare that has been waged without armistice from the time of the Assyrians and Carthaginians right up to the arrival of the modern big game hunter. "Truly when these men hunt, the ways of the veldt-life are turned upside down. The lion eats dust and is put to shame."

Mr. Glanville is thoroughly conversant with the lore of the veldt and upon occasions can indicate its secrets almost too neatly, as when he says in referring to the expedients of frightened game: "When you run, run; and if there is danger in the way, get past it." How often have I not watched this theory of safety put into practice in the wild rush of stampeding zebra, of stampeding impalla! When the lion cubs creep out on to the open plains and are detected by the grass-eaters they feel profound discomfiture. "They could not stand the mute accusation of all those attentive eyes." To be the object of such concentrated gaze is a sensation not easily to be forgotten by a susceptible human being, but whether or not young lions are impressed by it is another matter.

In comparison with most books written on Africa this is so interesting that I am reluctant to lay stress upon its failings. But the volume does contain unpardonable lapses in taste. The silly facetiousness of some of the animal dialogues amounts at times to sheer banality. How can Mr. Glanville expect us to preserve our sense of illusion when he can put such words as these into the mouth of a lion: "All right—keep your mane on," or can write sentences like the following:

"If their company was wanted, very well; if not, then it did not signify to them a single twitch of a whisker."

Even his fine chapter on the Black Eagle is marred by the same carelessness: "The dead branch rattled under the impetus of his kick off."

What possible justification can there be for this kind of thing between jackal and ant-bear? "Hullo, Snuffles—let your old cellar?—'So long, Nosey!'"

"Claw and Fang" will take its place among that ever-increasing assortment of good books that are not and never can be considered as literature in the more exacting sense of that ambiguous word.

LLEWELYN POWYS

An Ivory Tower

The Journal of Marie Lenéru. Translated from the French by William Aspenwall Bradley, with an Introduction by François de Curel. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

TIME was when general reticence made any personal revelation, committed to writing, seem remarkable; but since exhibitionism has become the moving force of novelists as well as diarists, we have developed a discriminating taste in confessions—forced to it by abundant mediocrity—and our standard of excellence is high. This standard is satisfied, I think, by Marie Lenéru's Journal, now put competently into English by Mr. Bradley.

Marie Lenéru was born at Brest, in 1875, and she died at Lorient, September, 1918. After a normal, happy childhood, she became deaf and nearly blind at the age of thirteen: her partial blindness continued for about ten years; she always remained totally deaf. (Maurice Barrès's statement, in the preface to "Saint-Just," that she was mute is incorrect: it was inability to hear her own voice that kept her silent in the presence of most persons.) Immured by her imperfect senses, Marie Lenéru lived an inner life of burning intensity, until she finally found escape in writing. Her first finished composition was a study of Saint-Just, which she submitted to Barrès in 1906. Two years later she sent her first play, "Les Affranchis," to Catulle Mendès. It was entered for La Vie Heureuse prize, which it won, was published by Hachette, and was successfully produced at the Odéon in 1911. Laudatory voices reached the isolated woman. Then she wrote other plays—listed in her Journal—some of which were produced and favorably received. Her last drama was "La Paix," posthumously published in 1922, the same year that saw the publication of "Saint-Just" in Les Cahiers Verts series. That was the extent of her public literary career.

Her formal compositions that I have read are surprisingly good, in view of the handicap under which they were produced; but they are insignificant when compared with the Journal. In "Les Affranchis" there is more cerebration than life; "Saint-Just" is a romantic, intense, but imperfect study; the characters of "La Paix" seem to exist for argument rather than for their own sakes; but in the Journal there lives a character who is truly memorable. Marie Lenéru is her own masterpiece.

One could do justice to the Journal only by extensive quotation: it is crammed with wisdom set in the tight forms of La Rochefoucauld and Vauvenargues, subtle observations surprise one on every page, but it is chiefly remarkable for the intellectual and emotional history that it records. It is a poignantly tragic story, the story of a woman alive with feeling and intelligence, condemned to life-long confinement in an ivory tower. This woman desired life so avidly! "To have read all books, smelt all flowers, caressed all animals, lived in all climates, known all races, tasted all joys and all melancholies, known all admirations and all lucidities, and dying, to have at last cast aside only a rind squeezed and twisted by a master-hand. Amen!"

Denied this external life, Marie Lenéru lived fiercely within herself, seeking to recover in memory all the music, all the sounds she had ever heard, seeking to extend the sense of vision to its limits once it was recovered. She to whom conversation was denied found escape in an art form based on conversation. Shut off from the world, all the world's problems furnished exercises for her brain. In her Journal she notes that M. Curel was surprised that one of her limited experience should write such plays as hers, and she replied: "The truth is that the limits are in us, or rather the extent is in us. What reaches us from without, after a very brief time, can merely be repetition." But outward experience, repetitious or otherwise, is needed to feed the inward flame, and Marie found an inexhaustible fuel in books. Once her sight was recovered she read herself almost blind. That she survived, as she did, this intensive association with the minds of others is proof of her own vigorous originality.

Marie Lenéru's struggle against the limitations of sense becomes a drama that moves the reader deeply, a drama in which he would act a helpful part. One cannot read without emotion such passages as the following, which may lead some to the Journal itself:

The progress of my eyes reconstitutes my life. Just as our intellectual memory depends upon the quality of our attention and our means of assimilation, so our general memory—that is to say, the impression left by life, our consciousness of having already lived—is mathematically related to the play and power of our physical organs. I was isolated in the present moment, not connecting myself in the evening with what I was in the morning, and night interposed a death between one day and the next. Little by little my sensation of the present widens, combines better with the eve and the morrow. I am encompassed by time, and my memory is improved. And in space, as in time, the point where I live appears to me less broken up. I divine more clearly the street beneath my window, the city about me.

BEN RAY REDMAN

Greek Jurisprudence

The Jurisprudence of the Greek City. Outlines of Historical Jurisprudence. Vol. II. By Sir Paul Vinogradoff. Oxford University Press. $7.

N this volume Sir Paul Vinogradoff deals with the jurisprudence of the Greek city-state of the fifth and fourth centuries before Christ. At the outset, therefore, we are warned that slight use can be made of the papyri and inscriptions of the Hellenistic period, and that the principal sources of information are the writings of Aristotle and his school. Abundant use is also made of the orators, with occasional references to such inscriptions from the classical period as are apposite to the theme in hand.

After demonstrating the existence of a "common law" of Greece as against the law of the barbarians, Sir Paul passes to a study both of the popular and of the philosophical notions of the concept of law as understood by the Greeks. The Greeks generally regarded law as a complex of rules having a more or less sacred character. But in the disturbed conditions at the close of the fifth century the old beliefs were being questioned by the man in the agora. Popular skepticism had its counterpart in the Sophists represented by Protagoras and Gorgias, who, applying their theory of relativism and "suggestion," endeavored to examine how far laws are artificial and how far ingrained in the nature of things. Reaching the conclusion that man is the measure of all things, homo omnium mensura, they thereupon asserted the impossibility of positing immutable law. What then was to be taken as the foundation of each city's sovereignty? The Sophists answered with a word well-known today—force. "Then, methinks, did men establish laws as means of punishment, that Justice might be autocrat."

Many thinkers of this period, however, refused to follow the skeptics and took deeper soundings in their quest for a justification of law. Socrates, speaking through Plato, asserted that the law of the city was immeasurably above that of kin or ancestors, and that the right of the commonwealth took precedence over any private right. The citizen is bound by an implied contract with the state to submit to and obey its laws. To justify the idea of law Socrates invoked the natural unity of the human understanding. The keynote of his "idealistic intellectualism" is his doctrine of a power in the mind of man making for unity. Thus the idealistic philosophers found the solution in the universality of reason.

Professor Vinogradoff disagrees with Fustel de Coulanges, and consequently with Guiraud and Beauchet, that in primitive society the private ownership of land was directly traceable to the cult of ancestors. "It requires a more vivid imagination than is generally possessed by scholars nowadays," says Sir Paul, "to accept the view that men appropriated fields not for the sake of the harvest, but because they had buried their parents in some part of the compound." In regard to international arbitration among the Greeks, which is considered in the chapter on Relations Between Cities, profitable use might have been made of M. A. Raeder's "L'Arbitrage international chez les Hellènes," the most comprehensive work on the subject. Again, something might have been said of the innovation by the Greeks of pledges for the peaceful settlement of future disputes likely to lead to war. Such a pledge was included in the thirty years' truce entered upon by Sparta and Athens in 445, and again in the peace of Nicias in 421.

As a whole, the second volume of the series merits the utmost praise. Lawyers and laymen alike will look forward to the third volume dealing with the Middle Ages.

The Garrulities of an Octogenarian. By Henry Holt. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

Remembered Yesterdays. By Robert Underwood Johnson. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

ALL the traditions of heredity and early training made Mr. Holt a conservative; his temperament and intellect impelled him toward radicalism. His radicalism never carried him far, his character being already too firmly bound in the matrix of the former influences to permit the latter ever to be more than a pleasant heat thrown off by the cooling metal of his personality. Though it has pleased him to call his book the "Garrulities of an Octogenarian," its utterances have nothing of the sunset calm and acquiescent spirit that we are accustomed to expect of old age. They have the cock-sure, challenging ring of adolescence itself. His body may have grown old, but his intellect has kept the fire of youth. It is clear that Mr. Holt has loved wisdom, or, rather, that he has loved truth, and has diligently sought it; and it is a proof of his own acquired wisdom that he has often, as he frankly confesses, retraced his steps in defeat. Yet one fancies that he has not always been open-minded toward discipline. A certain temperamental impatience may easily have led him into antagonism with beliefs or theories that did not run along with his own mind, and he lacked the New England rigidity that has gloried in self-suppression as a sort of discipline that is good for the soul. Even after the passage of two generations the memory of his college years leads him into the expression of the bitterest sentiment of his whole chronicle, where he speaks of the students of his day as despising and hating the dogmas about them, and being, in their search to find faith, "like babies sucking the breasts of dead mothers."

Perhaps it is also due to the same inherent impatience with intellectual restraints that Mr. Holt has elected to make his chronicle not so much a formal autobiography as a glorified scrap-heap of whatever came to his mind at the moment of writing. Yet in the incongruous mixture lies much of the alluring charm of his recollections. Old customs and glimpses of long-forgotten modes of travel, the latest advice of his physician and the earliest counsel of publishers, his scorn of certain modern books and his praise of the Victorians, his talks with famous men long dead and striking pen-pictures of others but recently gone, old beliefs and new faiths—all these are marshaled before one's eyes with the confident touch of youth. Loyalty to his friends is not his least striking characteristic. Indeed, a not insignificant part of his book has been given to appreciations of the men whom he calls his "four great teachers"—Francis A. Walker, E. L. Godkin, Herbert Spencer, and John Fiske. These formal sketches appear out of place in a work purely autobiographical, but to that fact Mr. Holt is wholly indifferent, apparently.

He has had many enthusiasms, the first, and likewise the most abiding, beginning in 1865, when a copy of Spencer's "First Principles" fell into his hands, and his eyes, as he declares, were "opened to a new heaven and a new earth." One cannot help wishing that Mr. Holt had made clearer the exact influence that Spencer's philosophy has had upon him. The great philosopher bobs up in the author's chronicle in much the same irrelevant manner in which "King Charles the First" was forever poking his head into the famous "Memorial" of Mr. Dick.

Though in the foreword of his "Remembered Yesterdays" Mr. Robert Underwood Johnson has disclaimed any intention of writing an autobiography, he has nevertheless set down his recollections in a reasonably near approach to a chronologically well-ordered recital. His many pauses by the way for the stories and character-sketches of the host of notable men and women he has known are not so much disconcerting breaks in the continuity of his narrative as they are illuminating torches to mark the various interests of successive periods in his life.

Mr. Robert Underwood Johnson's autobiography could hardly have been otherwise than more or less formal, for his sensitiveness to orderliness and a studied regulation of conduct has always been acute, and he has had a vast respect for accepted standards, qualities in him that have united to make him a conservative. That something like a touch of the enfant terrible in Mr. Holt, in his revolt against creeds and certain disciplinary restraints, has no parallel in Mr. Johnson's cherished memories of the past. All the stages of his growth from the half-rural small town of his boyhood in Indiana, through his four years of college life, through his brief months of training in Chicago for his future, though then unknown and unsuspected, work in the East, to his destined post on the editorial staff of the old Scribner's Monthly (later to be known as the Century Magazine), are given in his happy chronicle in lingering and uncritical detail.

Mr. Johnson came to the magazine in the first fresh vigor of its fortunate youth, in a period that also was fortunate—the twilight hour of the Victorian age, when all standards were forever settled, as we thought. And it being a period of fixed literary forms and standards, Mr. Johnson settled himself with boundless enthusiasm and energy into the congenial task of upholding them and advancing the fortunes of the ambitious young journal. Through the forty years that he served the magazine, successively as assistant, associate, and editor, he kept his old ideals and steadily resisted the tide of innovations of a changing age. The story of his editorial life he narrates with great particularity, and with those intimate touches that give to literary history a certain unique charm even for unliterary readers.

But he was more than an editor, and his extra-editorial interests have been wide. In that portion of his book that he has named Spiritual Lobbying, he has told the story of his arduous labor for an international copyright law, for the conservation of the forests of the nation, and in other great movements. Mr. Johnson's capacity for extra-editorial work did not end with his retirement from the Century; nor was that the end of his happy good fortune of dropping into the one place where he would most like to be. All his life he has been a lover of Italy, and when, unsolicited, the ambassadorship to Rome came to him, he must have had the feeling that it was in a way the topmost bough of his pleasant tree of life.

How Is Russia 'Different'?

The First Time in History: Two Years of Russia's New Life.

By Anna Louise Strong. Boni and Liveright. $2.

HOW would one know that Moscow is under Communist control? How is it "different"? These are the questions asked of anyone who has had a recent glimpse of Russia. And they are hard to answer, for on the outside the life of Moscow looks much like that of any other European city. Red flags on government buildings instead of over excavations in the streets; a new tram-car or two called the "Red October" or the "Lenin"; bearded peasants and workmen in blouses instead of society leaders enjoying the opening night at the opera—things like these are "different," but do not take one very far in interpreting the new regime.

A brief stay in Moscow does little but raise all sorts of questions in the mind of the observer. Here are men at work repairing pavements and streets and painting buildings; under what authority is that being done, and is it part of a plan, or as haphazard as it seems? New trams and new car-tracks: who owns them, how are they financed, and what is the status of the worn and shabby women conductors who handle the filthy paper rubles? New shops for clothing and toys and household wares opening up each day in the government arcade in the Red Square; other new shops, with no sign of government ownership, also opening up on the business streets: how is the competition between public and private enterprise carried on, how fair are the rules of the game, how are prices fixed? Excited throngs every morning on the square in front of the Industrial Bank, speculating in dollars—the illegal Black Exchange: why is it permitted, and what has it to do with the government plans for a gold reserve and a stable currency? On all sides confusing tales of the housing difficulties: how one may buy an apartment from someone for a hundred dollars and hold it indefinitely or lose it in a week, without hope of redress, on the whim of the landlord; or how one may secure a room at the price of repaving the sidewalk in front of the house; or how one cannot stay more than two or three nights with a friend, without dealing with a house committee. Is all this the result of municipally owned housing, or of utter planlessness? Jewish officials in the Foreign Office, now giving, now withholding favors concerning passports and admissions into the Kremlin: do the Jews govern Russia and control the Communist Party?

One day a Communist professor, patched and shabby but enthusiastic, tells of the progress made by the raw, untrained boys and girls, preparing in three years for the universities. And the next day, in a quiet sunny library, a professor of the old school, patched and shabby and resigned, dwells on the impossibility of maintaining university standards in the face of the advance of these barbarians from the "plow and the stand." A scandalized newspaper correspondent reports the desecration of a church—transformed into a young people's club, with atheist mottoes and a picture of Saint Marx above the altar. Another newspaper man displays with glee an amazing collection of anti-religious cartoons, selected from a paper called the Atheist. And Saturday nights and Sundays the church bells ring, and beautiful services are conducted in the churches.

With all these confusing facts and impressions in mind, one listens to people who for years, in one role or another, have been watching Russia. A Russian-American who has been revisiting his native province after an absence of twenty years reports that education there is temporarily shot to pieces, but that, paradoxically, more thinking is going on than ever before. An American who saw the early days of the revolution bemoans the fact that Moscow is becoming too much like other cities, and finds the real gains of the revolution out in the villages—in a new spirit of local enterprise and self-help. And Miss Strong herself, back from the Crimea and a visit to a beautiful villa, now run by the Department of Health as a rest-cure for tired workers, tells about the oil industry in Baku on the Caspian and the mica mines and feldspar quarries in Karelia on the White Sea. One feels the desire to do nothing but ask question for days and days.

All these questions—about finance and industry and education and religion and municipal housekeeping and Communist control and Jewish influence—are discussed in Miss Strong's survey, the fruit of over two years of travel and observation and study. To give her answers is too much a matter of statistics for quotation in a review. To summarize such a fascinating story as that of the oil fields of Russia would lessen the excitement of reading it. A clarifying of much that is bewildering on the surface, and a renewed conviction of a purpose still intelligently and stubbornly at work, directed toward the organization of a society different from any we have yet seen—that, to one who has had a mere look-in on Russia, is the result of reading Miss Strong's book.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

A Worthy Collection

Modern Swedish Masterpieces. Short Stories Selected and Translated by Charles Wharton Stork. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

HERE is proof that it can be done! Now the skilled and well-paid workmen in the American conte-fabrique who demand set models from the critics of their work may well turn to this volume for guidance and inspiration. Not because it would be impossible to get an equally worthy collection from the work of four American writers but because no such collection exists. Mr. Stork has chosen his material as well as he has translated it—and that is high praise indeed. For while I am not prepared to follow him so far as to entitle more than five of these stories masterpieces, it is a long time since I have turned the pages of a more readable anthology.

It is because they are vital that these stories are truly interesting rather than merely titillating. In reading them we see immediately that the authors are aware of the world around them, that they recognize the conflicts within individuals and the problems of society, that they are conscious of certain duties and responsibilities and standards incumbent upon them as members of the universe. This does not mean that each story is a pièce à thèse. Certainly A Masterless Dog is not a tractate for the S.P.C.A. or The Drizzle a moral for the Almighty or The Fortified House an attempt to guide the footsteps of royalty.

There is no purpose to reform in these stories but there is a purpose beyond the income to be derived from their publication. The manner in which each responds to the creative urge is highly individual. Hjalmar Söderberg is intimately concerned in his stories. His participation in the ordinary incidents he describes endows them with strange significance through the power of his whimsical, piquant, and none the less severe humor. Sigfrid Siwertz writes in a contemplative mood, rationalizing the experiences of life. "... marriage is a deep word, deeper even than the word love. Marriage is something big, hard; even rough, if you like. It is brimmed with sweetness and suffering and bitter necessity as inescapable as the fact that you as a delicate creature have lain crumpled up in your tortured mother's body. One may say in a certain manner that a fleeting, loose relation is purer and finer than marriage, but that is a desertion from reality, an unorganic arabesque, a petty splendor. Marriage is an heroic word. Yes, because man and woman must inflict heavy suffering upon each other."

Though The Fortified House is in my opinion one of the five masterpieces of the volume, the other historical tales by Verner von Heidenstam are done indifferently well. In comparing them with The Falcon by Per Hallström we may see the difference between exploiting historic material and recreating the spirit of a past age. Yet The Falcon is inferior to Herr Hallström's other story, Out of the Dark, the most modern, the most realistic, and the most imaginative tale in the book.

In his translation Mr. Stork has cut to the bone of each sentence, interpreting word for word wherever possible. Occasionally, as on page 151, the result is a very awkward construction, but in the main the vigor, the rhythm, and the characteristic qualities of the original are preserved.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Books in Brief

Consciousness, Life and the Fourth Dimension. By Richard Eriksen. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

This is not a book for the layman; its thin and cautious thinking is clothed in a concentrated modern philosophic lingo which is caviare to the general, and worse than that to the private. The book might illustrate the mot that language was invented to conceal thought. "The origin of matter, then, involves a quantification of qualities," he decides; we for one are not disposed to deny it. His statement of Einstein's theory subtly perverts it, before intelligently criticizing it. The weak spot in the chain of the great relativist (that the velocity of light is the highest velocity attainable) is discovered by Eriksen; but his corrective treatment is no closer to an acceptable hypothesis than that of the master. As a lumbering critique of historical hypotheses concerning the underside of phenomena the book has some value.

Love Courageous. By Concordia Merrel. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

Being faithful to one's mother's memory at the expense of one's own convictions is the source of considerable sadness among heroines—especially heroines like Virginia Goring. Their misguided steadfastness is the stuff out of which heartaches are made, and if the reader is so constituted as to be able to extract profit from their vacillations, he will enjoy "Love Courageous." It requires, however, a generous measure of patience.

Sketch Book of a Cadet from Gascony. By James Warner Bellah. Alfred Knopf. $1.50.

This collection of stories and sketches amply merits the distinction which it earned in being awarded Mr. Knopf's annual prize for work of literary merit by a Columbia University undergraduate. Mr. Bellah's writing has form and flair; his themes are tentative, but his manipulation of them gives evidence of a creative sense capable of high development.

Le Livre des Symphonies. By Anne-Armandy. Paris: Chibre. 5 francs.

It is not surprising that when in manuscript these poems were awarded honors by the jury of the Catulle-Mendès Prize this year. And it was not necessary for the poet Fernand

Greh to tell the author that her "grand Tagorean symphonies are of a beautiful and pure gravity"; for the venerable critic Edouard Schuré to pronounce these verses "a mixture of the Song of Songs and the Baghavat Gita," and for Mme Anne-Armandy herself to admit modestly in a dedication to Tagore that "these humble songs are timid echoes of your own," in order for us to perceive in this work a marked Indian influence. The delightful Paul Fort wrote of the volume: "I can recommend with fervor this beautiful collection, a work, in my opinion, of the first order"; but Mistral's line at the head of the opening poem is perhaps the key to the charm of this little book—"Lou souleü mi fa canta."

Euripides and His Influence. By F. L. Lucas. Marshall Jones Company. $1.50.

Language and Philology. By Roland G. Kent. Marshall Jones Company. $1.50.

Catullus and His Influence. By Karl Pomeroy Harrington. Marshall Jones Company. $1.50.

These new volumes in the series called Our Debt to Greece and Rome are listed in what seems to be the order of their merit. Mr. Lucas is excellently sensible about Euripides, reading his plays primarily as works of art which inevitably express the intellectual temper of their author, not as pieces of propaganda for this or that modern idea. Mr. Kent gathers interesting if not original data concerning the influence of the Greek and Latin languages. Mr. Harrington writes cheaply about one of the best of all poets. He is more familiar than his subject happens to allow; he is something of a prude; and when it comes to tracing echoes of Catullus in English poetry he omits to mention the most brilliant example—Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress."

Anthony Dare. By Archibald Marshall. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

It appears that Mr. Marshall has temporarily exhausted his vein, or that his vein has—again temporarily, one hopes—exhausted him. In any event, "Anthony Dare" lags behind its predecessors, both in richness and in narrative grace. It is a novel of competence and substance, but without the undercurrent of sparkle which distinguishes the author's best work.

Leviathan. By William Bolitho. Chapman and Dodd, Ltd. 5 shillings.

Mr. Bolitho writes journalism with a philosophic detachment; his papers are at once commentary and interpretation. He is more interested in the implications of current politics than in the policy of ephemeral office-holders; he is poking around behind the scenes while the public out front is applauding the speeches and watching the exits. When he writes that "changing guard at Buckingham Palace is the State Ballet of the English," he sums up British imperialism in a phrase; his paper on Curzon and Chicherin has the flavor of journalism in its best estate.

Drama Too True

AT a performance of "The Show-Off" the other day—I had missed the play on its first appearance—I heard behind me the rumbling of two heavy voices, voices that, somehow, sounded of too much rich food, thick black cigars, diamond rings, paunches, bald heads. This is what I heard.

"What d'yuh think o' the show?"

"Aw, I don't know." A yawn. "I don't care what you say; I like a music show."

"Hm-mh. Yah!"

"Maybe the comedy ain't so much. But I like the tunes and the girls. This here. Aw well"

"I like a good show myself. But I'll tell you what's the matter with this. It's too true to be entertainin'."

"You've said it."

Such were their words. During the next intermission I was able to inspect the two gentlemen. Their voices had reported them aright. Prosperous Babbitts. Perfect Babbitts. Ah, first and second nights do not tell the story of the theater. Every critic should be forced from time to time to mingle with an average audience and listen to the audience, not to the play.

In front of me sat a little party who enjoyed "The Show-Off" heartily. But they weren't Babbitts. They weren't even Nordics. . . . I withdraw to less dangerous ground.

"The Show-Off" at the Playhouse is, except for five preposterous minutes at the end, an exceedingly veracious, telling little play of American life, beautifully observed, admirably acted. But for those five minutes thrown fearfully and in haste at the two gentlemen behind me and all their kind, this might be a memorable play and its author, George Kelly, akin, at least, to the American Ibsen of the future. The family drives straight to ruin on the lies of the matchless Aubrey Piper. But the carefully yet so obviously planted god pops out of the machine and instead of myrrh and aloes there is a pool of syrup at the end.

If "The Show-Off" was too true for the gentlemen behind me and, until the very end, almost true enough to suit me, such is not the case of "We Moderns" by Israel Zangwill at the Gaiety. It is not true at all. It is violently false in method and substance. And this is all the more deplorable because, of course, Mr. Zangwill knows better. But epigrams are his undoing. The Wildean nineties are in his blood. Once his epigrams were expensive. Now they are cheap and immoral. It is, for instance, immoral to let a character say: "Psychoanalysis is indecency reduced to a science." Loud guffaws from the audience, which is, whatever the excesses and follies of amateur psychoanalysts may be, confirmed in all its pet prejudices, in all its unclean repessions, in all its stuffy and unclean intolrances. For a clever man like Mr. Zangwill to play thus into the hands of the Philistines—that is what I call immoral. It is an unforgivable breach of that solidarity among the thinking minority without which all is indeed lost. And Mr. Zangwill's whole play is patterned on that epigram. It is intellectually immoral to discredit good doctrine by having it practiced by a rotter. What doctrine in the whole history of human thought could not be discredited thus? I remind Mr. Zangwill of a saying of Nietzsche's with which he cannot possibly be unacquainted: "What master has not been betrayed by his disciples?" What, in brief, Mr. Zangwill does is to take certain speculations and certain attempts at the practice of a cleaner and more rational life and exemplify their practice not as they are embodied in clean and rational and mature people, but as they could conceivably be misused by a scamp. The ridiculous effect of this misuse, which is, of course, no argument at all, is to reduce everyone in the play to a level on which with unction and humility he quotes the Psalm of Life. The audience can hardly restrain its enthusiasm. Every time some particularly dangerous superstition is confirmed and some particularly civilized truth discredited, applause drowns the voices of the actors. An immoral play. It will have a long run. It is not too true to be entertaining.

Gorki Says Woman's Sphere Is Man

MAXIM GORKI'S belief that woman's primary role is not herself to create, but to inspire man to create, is set forth in the following authorized interview with Gorki by Louis P. Lochner, which appeared in the Berliner Tageblatt for February 19, 1924:

"If a woman tells a man to blow out the sun"—whereupon he puffed out his cheeks and blew lustily—"then he will blow, despite complete conviction that it is impossible. Or if a woman asks a man to pick flowers for her in the midst of a pouring rain"—whereupon he turned up his collar, buttoned his coat, and shook himself like a poodle coming in out of the rain—"don't you think he would go?"

It was Maxim Gorki speaking, smiling as he spoke. We were talking about the position of woman in art and literature, in material progress, and philosophical investigation.

It is a rare pleasure to chat with Gorki. He speaks only Russian—with which, to be sure, he mixes Italian words and turns of speech—so that the entire conversation is carried on through his gifted interpreter and companion, Marie Budberg. But the play of his features is so expressive, his deep, resonant voice so perfectly reflects his mind, that one understands much of what he says before the interpreter repeats it.

The heart of Maxim Gorki's conception of the position of woman is humorously expressed in the two remarks already quoted. He repeated them more precisely and earnestly later:

"The highest task of woman is to inspire man, to furnish him with incentive, with life and enthusiasm. She is not so much creative as the greatest driving force behind the creator."

He admitted a few exceptions. History records an impressive list of great women. But, according to Gorki, the root of their greatness lay chiefly in their ability to attract great men to themselves, and to inspire and stimulate them, and much less in their own creative activity. Justifying this conception he continued:

"The greatest feminine figures of history can be compared with the queen bee, who forces the drones to work. They were great through the men whom they inspired. There are women who have done wonderful things. Catherine of Russia did more for civilization and culture than Peter the Great had done in thirty years. Marva Boretzkaia opposed Ivan the Terrible more obstinately and resisted him more successfully than any other individual. One of the greatest periods of English history is inseparably connected with the name of Queen Elizabeth. Isabella of Spain was farsighted enough to make possible for Columbus what male rulers in other European empires had scornfully rejected.

"Think of the role that George Sand played. She herself was not particularly gifted but she had an extraordinary power of discovering interesting men and of making them more compelling. She influenced, encouraged, and inspired Chopin, Liszt, de Musset, Turgenev, and Dostoevski."

These ideas were new to me. I recalled Gorki's stirring appeal to the mothers of the world to make war impossible in the future, and recalled to him these phrases: "You mothers are the only eternal power, constantly recreating a world wasted by death—in the very moment when death mows down one human being a woman in some corner of the earth is giving birth to another, triumphing over the destructive forces. . . . Life comes and goes out of you. . . . You are the eternal enemies of death. You are the power which tirelessly struggles and which conquers. . . ."

Was that not in contradiction with the ideas Gorki had been developing? How can one deny creative power to woman, the eternal creator of new life? I expressed these doubts.

"Do not forget," Gorki replied, "that life can be looked at from two sides. One is the material, the biological; the other, the intellectual, the speculative, the gnostic. Schiller was right: the world is ruled by hunger and love. Woman is the chief exponent of love and the enemy of hunger. Love grows out of her effort to preserve her child from hunger and to make it possible for all whom she loves—husband, child, parents, brothers and sisters, friends—to keep hunger from their doors. Or, in a larger sense, her greatest effort is to make life more comfortable, more worth living from a material point of view.

"Hence her activity is limited to the things which lie within range of her love. She strives to serve, first, her home and her family, then"—here Gorki drew a series of concentric circles in the air, each larger than the last, as if drawing the growing sphere of the material interests of the woman—"then her friends, her neighbors, her fellow-countrymen, and so on. If, however, you overstep the bounds of this limited material range, she will not follow, still less lead you. To solve the riddle of life, to seek to understand the basis of knowledge—those are things which do not concern her and to which she will not give herself.

"Come back to the material side of life. Through her efforts to protect those whom she loves, to strengthen them, and to preserve their position in the world, she has done much for our present-day civilization. It was her opposition to a nomad life which gave us settled homes, which built towns and cities. Woman felt that her child was not safe while the family wandered from place to place, and that a permanent home under a safe roof was better for him. It was woman who made the first medical discoveries, who first tamed wild animals, who learned and taught how to make clothing out of plants—all through the instinct to protect her property. She is the moving force behind scientific and technical discoveries, for it is she who incites man to trace out these things, in order to give her more material comfort.

"Woman knows exactly what she wants discovered and she will do anything to find it; but she will not pass beyond the boundaries of her own sphere. But man seeks to explore things which surpass his understanding, beyond the material sphere—hence his philosophical speculations."

When Maxim Gorki had thus set man upon a pedestal and given him a certain preference over woman I was not prepared for what followed.

"It must be admitted," Gorki added, "that man has attained nothing in the field of pure philosophy. Since Plato we have hardly moved one step forward, and Plato himself achieved nothing tangible. In the field of experimental, applied philosophy much of value has been done—and that leads us back to the material where woman is the inspiring and driving force." He pointed to the electric lights over our heads. "Experimental philosophy has given us electricity."

We turned to art. Gorki would not grant woman creative power in art. Here too her task was to inspire man.

"There is no great feminine figure in the plastic arts. One would expect that woman, who makes and develops the body of her offspring, would be particularly adroit and skilled in modeling and molding. But that is not at all the case. The greatest plastic artists have all been men.

"The same is true of music and painting," he added after a pause. "Name me a single great woman composer or painter. If there are such they are exceptions. As interpreters of music they may be extraordinary, but they do not create."

Since I knew that Gorki was an enthusiastic pacifist I asked how, in view of the hereditary task of woman to protect and preserve human life, he explained the fact that during the Great War so many women were war-mad and denounced the croakers and slackers. "In other words," I asked, "how does it happen that all women are not pacifists?"

"That is the fault of our erring civilization," he remarked. "Every normal woman is opposed to war. That is her natural instinct as the bearer and preserver of life. But 'civilization' has crippled that primal instinct. This 'civilization' calls itself nationalism, patriotism, class conflict, or what not. It is often strong enough completely to exclude the primal instinct to preserve life. Pacifism is the natural role of woman; the war spirit only artificially conceals it."

It was natural that in this discussion of the role of woman in civilization we should talk of women's rights and of the woman movement in general. "What do you think of it?" I asked Gorki. A roguish glint came into his eyes as he answered:

"There are definite limits to the fields within which women should be active. For instance, I do not think much of their participation in legislation, in the field of law. A constitution conceived and written by women would in all probability be thoroughly bad, for that is a field naturally foreign to woman."

"On the other hand, in material questions, such as hygiene, nutrition, housing, domestic science, woman's influence is not only equal but superior to man's and is surer to lead to good results. For that reason it is on the whole wise to elect women as well as men to parliamentary bodies. They may have a good influence on domestic policy."

Elections in Germany—and Women

LOCAL elections in February in three districts of Germany gave a hint of the results from the general elections which will probably take place in May. In Thuringia a Socialist-Communist majority in the Diet has been replaced by a majority for the so-called "Law-and-Order Bloc" (Ordnungsbloc). The Socialist-Communist majority of 1924 was attained with only 48 per cent of the total votes because the Right and Center Party forces were divided between six parties. This year these parties united and won a majority in the Diet, although a new extreme reactionary party also took the field. The result of the popular vote, in thousands, was as follows:

Communists	73	149
Social Democrats	265	189
Ordnungsbloc parties	367	384

In Mecklenburg on February 17 the same tendency for the extreme parties to gain was manifest. The vote, in thousands, was as follows:

	1921	1924
Communists	15	39
Socialists	73	33
Independents	21½	2
Democrats	14	10
Populists	57	22
Nationalists (Extreme Right)	37	61

In the Lübeck City Council the Social Democrats lost 9 seats, the Communists gained 4, and the Extreme Right gained.

An interesting comment on these results is that of the independent Tagebuch (Berlin) for February 23. The Tagebuch has a mild Social Democratic flavor but is very unorthodox:

The Tagebuch has never concealed the fact that the realization of woman suffrage has brought a shameful lowering of the general level of politics. German women, to whom the vote was presented in November, 1918, before a harsh struggle had made them ripe for it, have everywhere swallowed fairy tales and legends. Non-political as women are—not only or especially German women—they quickly

Germany France and England

by Maximilian Harden

Translated and Edited by WILLIAM C. LAWTON

Maximilian Harden is a voice crying in the wilderness. He contributes here the most arresting political work that has come out of Germany—out of Europe, for that matter—since the war. Persecuted and reviled by his own countrymen, Harden will yet be counted a prophet; a German, singularly unbiased, who can see beyond Junkerism and the hopelessness of new wars. $2.50

Yea and Nay

A SERIES OF DEBATES

Imagine a tea table conversation with Rebecca West, a political discussion with the brilliant Philip Guedalla, or a heart-to-heart talk with H. G.

Wells on the evils of present-day education. If you are a woman, the idea will thrill you; even men will be interested. That is what YEA AND NAY is all about. A group of unstudied, friendly debates, in which are engaged many of England's greatest literary and political celebrities. It is unique among contemporary letters. $2.00

FOURTH SERIES

by Frank Harris

Author of "Oscar Wilde," "Montes the Matador," etc.

In this fourth volume of his famous portraits, Frank Harris has analyzed several Americans much in the public eye. Included are Charles Chaplin,

Senator La Follette, Otto Kahn, H. L. Menckin, and many others. Frank Harris never writes about anyone whom he has not known intimately, nor, one might add, about anyone who is not well worth knowing. $2.50 become the prey of demagogues. Political arguments do not touch them but they yield uncritically to the cheapest pathos. Hence the Communist and Right orators have won easy victories among the women voters. For the moment the Right artists in pathos are rolling up more votes than the Communists. It is no wonder that the electoral figures in Thuringia show the following instructive results:

Meiningen:	Men	Women
Ordnungsbloc	1,467	2,470
Extreme Right	883	1,084
Apolda:
Social Democrats	1,431	1,592
Ordnungsbloc	3,146	3,975
Extreme Right	467	433
Schmöln:
Social Democrats	1,319	1,611
Ordnungsbloc	1,107	1,467
Extreme Right	77	87
Meuselwitz:
Social Democrats	778	754
Ordnungsbloc	912	1,064
Extreme Right	90	69

Feminine votes were overwhelmingly predominant in the Law-and-Order Bloc, which stood under the patronage of the reigning general. The Social Democratic gain in women votes was much smaller. If one adds the fact that the majority of the voters between 20 and 24 votes and has voted for the Extreme Right because it represents another group of immature minds, then one realizes that the ready liberality of universal suffrage has chiefly profited the nationalist demagogues. . . . It is tragic that the Left parties should now have to pay for their own lies. It is droll that their dogmatic exaggeration of the democratic principle should benefit the narrowest-minded opponents of women and of youth.

Russia's Foreign Trade in 1923

ACCORDING to data gathered by the custom management of the USSR and published in the Moscow Economic Life of February 20, the exports from the USSR during 1923 amounted to 228,503,000 poods of various goods valued at 205,818,000 gold rubles. In 1922 the Union exported 56,346,000 poods of goods to the value of 81,621,000 gold rubles. Thus the volume of the export trade increased four times and the value, more than 2½ times.

The main items of the export were the following: Food products to the amount of 117,000,000 gold rubles; raw materials and semi-finished articles, 87,300,000 rubles; manufactured goods, 1,600,000 rubles.

The values of the exports to the various countries are as follows:

To Germany, 61,319,000 gold rubles; Great Britain, 33,511,000; Latvia, 23,890,000; Esthonia, 11,267,000; Holland, 11,829,000; Turkey, 10,222,000; Finland, 7,989,000; France, 6,320,000; Italy, 6,364,000; Belgium, 4,061,000; Denmark, 3,585,000; Poland, 2,431,000; Persia, 491,000.

The following are the values of the imports into the USSR from the various countries:

From Germany, 53,779,000 gold rubles; United States, 44,258,000; Great Britain, 37,537,000; Poland, 7,982,000; Sweden, 6,540,000; Finland, 6,069,000; Esthonia, 5,780,000; Latvia, 4,000,000; Norway, 3,275,000; Persia, 2,304,000; Holland, 2,134,000.

The total value of imports during 1923 is placed at 179,143,000 gold rubles.

TO READERS OF THE NATION:

As a result of joint conferences held in Chicago, St. Paul, Omaha, Denver, and elsewhere, it was agreed to call a National Farmer-Labor-Progressive Convention in the Twin Cities on May 30th next, to nominate new party Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates.

This Convention is pledged to the Abolition of Special Privilege, and the conferees designated as their platform: (a) public ownership of railroads; (b) control of money and credit by the people, through government and cooperative banks; (c) public control of natural resources; (d) preservation of civil rights guaranteed by the Constitution; (e) prevention of judicial abuses.

Candidates must be nominated whose courage, honesty, and adherence to principle cannot be questioned; whose political sagacity and economic knowledge are of a high order, and who cannot be diverted from the task we have in hand.

We will appreciate your filling in your answers to the questions following and returning to the above headquarters as promptly as possible.

FRANK A. PATTISON, Chairman.

ELECTION QUESTIONNAIRE

- In view of the admitted corruption, lack of principle, subservience to special privilege, and practical identity of the Republican and Democratic Parties, as graphically illustrated in the recent Sugar, Oil, and Department of Justice scandals, do you favor a new political party?
- Are you in general agreement with the national platform which has been adopted as the unanimous expression of the organizations affiliated in the new party movement?
- Do you endorse the National Farmer-Labor-Progressive Convention called for May 30 in the Twin Cities?
- Will you attend this Convention and serve as a delegate if selected?
- Any local unit comprised of 25 people or more, who subscribe to this platform, is entitled to one delegate. Shall we send you a blank petition so that you can obtain the necessary signatures and qualify as a delegate?
- Whom do you favor for President on the new party ticket? Indicate your choices by marking an X in each column.

BY A GENEROUS majority in the House, a sum of $10,000,000 has been appropriated for the relief of hungry German children. It is like a breath of clean air through a foul-smelling room to have an action of this sort emanate from Washington just now. Selfish motives may have played some part, as opponents of the measure freely charged; the German vote, the farmers' interests may have been considered. But neither of these could have helped to pass such a measure in the days when hate dominated every action or policy touching Germany. The material good such a sum of money can do is immense; its spiritual value is far greater. We are inclined to believe that Representative La Guardia was right when he declared that the bill would do "more good in five minutes than the League of Nations in five years."

LET US REALIZE what is happening in Honduras. None of the candidates in the last election received enough votes legally to become President, and so the forces then in power declared their intention to continue in office. The other candidates began a revolt and naturally at some times in some places some foreign residents have been inconvenienced and possibly endangered. The same has been true in Ireland and Germany in recent years, but we do not recall that the United States has landed troops in those countries nor set up a dictator as boss of the situation. Americans or other aliens going into foreign countries should go prepared to accept the hazards of life that exist there. The only help they are entitled to ask of their government is insistence that they receive equal protection with natives and other foreigners. Least of all have Americans in Central America a right to ask special favors in time of revolution. Newspapers there charge that some American business group is behind each faction in the Honduras fighting, and events are not running true to form unless this is at least partially true. If there is especial hostility toward Americans, they have only themselves and their government—with its black record of interference and usurpation—to blame. In any event no American has been reported as killed or even hurt in the disturbances so far.

AND YET A COMPANY of 176 from the U. S. S. Milwaukee has been sent 100 miles inland to Tegucigalpa, the Honduras capital. The de facto government in the republic asked that this force be withdrawn. It received a point-blank refusal from Franklin Morales, whom the Washington dispatches refer to as the "American Minister." Who is this "Minister Morales"? He was our official representative in Honduras up to the middle of February, at which time the State Department, in a burst of high righteousness, severed diplomatic relations. Mr. Morales remained in Honduras, however, "in a wholly unofficial effort to bring the rival political leaders together." Mr. Morales is no longer the American Minister to Honduras; it is hard to see that he has any status other than that of a private citizen. The State Department ought to know this at least as well as anybody else, but finding itself in a hole in consequence of its hasty rupture of diplomatic relations, it has recreated "Minister Morales" (for newspaper consumption, that is) and has made him high pandrum of our army of occupation in Honduras. For that, no doubt—in keeping with our course in Nicaragua, Haiti, and Santo Domingo—is what the company of 176 is destined to become. Anyhow we wish the newspapers would stop referring to "Minister Morales." It would be nearer the truth to speak of Dictator Morales and Invader America.

ACCORDING TO THE MONTANA Board of Education a teacher is not a human being with the normal rights and interests that belong to his fellow citizens; he is merely a machine set up in a State university to grind out long sausage-strings of facts at very little per year. When Arthur Fisher was ejected from the Law School of the University of Montana it was known that the charges against him were based on his active interest in the Nonpartisan League and the Farmer-Labor Party and in their organ, the New Northwest. Although the dean of the university recommended that he be kept at an increased salary and the Service Committee reported against his dismissal, the State Board of Education voted to consider him "on leave of absence" until the termination of his contract, and he was prevented from meeting his classes. In a careful report recently published, the Association of University Professors has upheld Mr. Fisher on all counts, and has pointed out that "no teacher in a republic can be expected to un-clothe himself of his interests and activities as a citizen of the state." If a college professor may not support a party or engage in public affairs why, we ask, should he be allowed to vote?

IT IS ODD that Will H. Hays should deny so vehemently that Harry F. Sinclair gave 75,000 shares of oil stock to help wipe out the deficit of the 1920 Republican campaign while serenely admitting that Mr. Sinclair contributed $75,000 for the purpose. Doubtless the shares in question are worth more than $75,000, but we fail to see that the amount involved matters much to anybody except perhaps to Mr. Sinclair. That gentleman testified some months ago that he contributed to both the Republican and the Democratic campaign funds. Such expenditure was intelligent but what stock-brokers would call speculative. On the other hand, for a business man seeking government favors to help a party that has won should be rated as a gilt-edged investment.

HOW OUR LANDLORDS LOVE to play Lady Bountiful when they can do it at a profit! Again they are urging legislation to help the deserving middle class live in remodeled apartments in Greenwich Village and other places without the inconvenience of conforming to the present housing laws for hallways, fire-escapes, and the like. Their press agent writes: "Those who seek the right to convert three-story dwellings into three-family houses are . . . white-collar tenants, whose incomes have not increased in proportion to the cost of living, and who by nature are averse to making homes in tenements or low-grade apartments." Poor little white-collar tenant! Bad, wicked cost of living! Good, kind real-estate boom! But about that other large part of the human race, who, it is implied, by nature prefer to make homes in tenements and low-grade apartments, the landlords display less concern.

WE HAVE SEEN no more impudent interview in years than that given in Nice by J. P. Morgan to the Edcureur. In the course of his statement Mr. Morgan is reported as praising France's intelligent and industrious population which "now is giving a magnificent example how to win peace. If the ruling classes only make a similar effort, France will soon be invincible in the economic domain. In any case we shall always be at her side and sustain her when necessary because we know we can count upon her as the champion of right." He added that "it was with admirable unanimity that the big bankers of the United States answered the appeal to help you vanquish the coalition formed against your franc." Mr. Morgan knows well that there was no need to form any coalition against the franc; that its collapse was due, first, to the failure of France to balance her budget; second, to the failure to raise the taxes decreed by law; third, to her deliberate support of the new militarism of Europe by her loans to Rumania, Poland, Jugoslavia, etc.; and fourth, to the widespread denunciation of her policy toward Germany.

NATURALLY, MR. MORGAN and his financial friends went to France's support. Some of them are reported to have many unsold and "undigested" French securities in their vaults; all those who floated the French loans have a personal interest in protecting the securities they sold.

While we rejoice for the French people that their currency has been strengthened, we do not envy them their additional obligations to Mr. Morgan, and from the point of view of the whole European settlement we consider the American loan to France a grave misfortune. Mr. Morgan, least of all, has the right to give the imperialist France of today carte blanche through his swashbuckling assurance that America "will always be at her side and sustain her if necessary." The Congress has refused to give France that assurance in the matter of military aid. Mr. Morgan, powerful as he is, can hardly bind the American people to perpetual aid to a people whose government has for the last five years opposed every ideal for which America fought.

THE PRISON GATES have finally closed upon Walter Kaufmann, Edward Rumely, and Norwin Lindheim because of their alleged participation in an illegal transaction in connection with the sale of the New York Evening Mail. We are convinced that this is a miscarriage of justice. These men were barely convicted in the midst of the war hysteria; some of the evidence they were entitled to bring out they were not permitted to produce. Their imprisonment makes life and reputation insecure everywhere and constitutes another indictment of our courts. We note with pleasure that the daily press is beginning to speak out about the case, and we sincerely trust that before these words reach our readers President Coolidge, who now seems indisposed personally to investigate the matter, will have granted a full and free pardon. We are entirely at one with Mr. S. S. McClure, who writes as follows:

In an editorial career of nearly forty years I have never known such a travesty of justice. I have never before had such a sense of insecurity. Dr. Rumely is a man of extraordinary courage and energy. He has suffered tremendous financial losses. He is now in prison. He is no longer on trial. The Government of the United States is on trial.

WE HOPE the House of Representatives will pass the Norris resolution, which has gone through the Senate, proposing a constitutional amendment to make the terms of the President and Vice-President begin on the third Monday of January and that of members of Congress on the first Monday of the same month. It is ridiculous that we should still be living under a system imposed by stage-coach days. There ought not to be four months between the election of a President and his inauguration, and still more there ought not to be thirteen months between the choosing of Congress and its first regular session. The short session of Congress—after the country has chosen another—is an absurdity that ought to be ended.

MR. GOMPERS in his war with the left wing of the labor movement has recently gone beyond his own record for heretic-hunting. He has compelled the New York Bookkeepers, Accountants, and Stenographers Union (which happens to be financially and morally dependent on the executive committee of the A. F. of L.) to suspend a member, without trial before the union, for the sole offense of being an active Communist. Such suspensions are not new in the prevailing factional warfare, but heretofore unions have always alleged some specific offense against union discipline or against some rule of the union. In this case the victim of Mr. Gompers's wrath was suspended merely because he was active in the Workers Party, which party had directed its members to belong to the Trade Union Educational League; this League is, in Mr. Gompers's opinion, undermining the trade-union movement! By this act the president of the A. F. of L. writes himself down a spiritual brother of the judges who jail members of the I.W.W. in California for belonging to a radical society, of the legislators who expelled the Socialist Assemblymen in New York, of the Protestant fanatics who insist that a man cannot be both a good Catholic and a good American.

THE PASSAGE by the House of Representatives of the bonus bill by vote of 355 to 54 in forty minutes is pretty clear proof that a large majority of our legislators do not wish to go before the country without a record of having done something for the veterans. We have so often dwelt upon our reasons for opposing the bonus that we shall not repeat them now. We believe that the individual will benefit only slightly and that this raid upon the Treasury is but a precursor of many similar ones for fifty years to come—our children's children will still be paying for the war. There is undoubtedly a widespread feeling that more should be done for our ex-service men; there is resentment that the Government has not taken better care of the wounded and disabled and a feeling that all that can be got out of Congress for the veterans is therefore pure gain; and, finally, it is indubitably true that the opponents of the bill include numerous big-business interests which, having made money out of the war, now seek to pay as little of the necessary price as possible. It is a consolation that if the country has to pay $2,000,000,000 or more for the bonus people may some day realize a little better how the costs of the war continue multiplying instead of ending with the struggle.

MAYOR CURLEY of Boston, from using Ku Klux methods against the Klan, has turned his extra-legal weapons in another direction and refused to license a lecture on The Need of Birth Control in America, scheduled to be given by Margaret Sanger under the auspices of the Boston School of Social Science. Margaret Sanger had spoken on this subject before the Women's City Club of Boston in 1923 and the year before at the Copley Plaza Hotel. That might have been considered precedent enough if precedent were needed. The lecture was not intended to give specific information concerning contraceptive measures, which is prohibited by Massachusetts law, but to discuss the problem of birth control, a problem that is definitely placed before the country by the pending Vaile and Cummins bills in the House and Senate. The officers of the Boston School of Social Science have pointed out to the more-zealous-than-law-abiding Mayor that his action severely restricts their civil liberties. They make this declaration:

We maintain that every citizen of our country has the inalienable right to discuss publicly laws which come under consideration of both houses of the national legislature. Therefore we appeal to you to revoke your decision not as a matter of policy, or of leniency, but because it is your duty as Mayor of Boston to see that there be no curtailing or infringement of the rights of citizens.

THE MOST CONVINCING REASON for the election of Calvin Coolidge next November comes to us from the Boston Herald, organ of Massachusetts Big Business. Declaring that the Massachusetts people do not realize how much they stand to lose if Coolidge is not elected it declares that

In this section we cannot afford to lose the Presidency. It is enormously important to our business security that the seat of power in the nation should remain where it is, rather than be transferred to the Southwest, with all the effects which such a decision would have on the tariff and taxes and expenditures and policy. . . . Our business welfare, our future on the sea, our other industrial opportunities all hinge upon the outcome of this year's Presidential election.

The Herald insists that if Ralston of Indiana or a man of that type is elected and "a radical Democratic coalition" takes charge of the House and Senate, a new Democratic tariff in the interest of the Southwest and inimical to New England will be the result. We confess we had not thought of such a dread possibility. The more we think it over the more correct appears the Herald's argument—certainly from its standpoint that the interests of New England and her manufacturers must and shall remain superior to those of any other section or group.

WE CANNOT let the death of James L. Slayden, for many years a Representative from Texas, go unnoticed. Here was a man to tie to at all times. He was deceived not at all by the buncombe about the war, and when he retired from the House he went on devoting his energies to the cause of peace. As a friend of The Nation writes, "he was sincere and would not truckle to the people or lie to them on any issue, but would rather be retired than not to tell them the truth. He understood free government; he had some knowledge of humanity, and when that infamous war started he knew the terrible scourge that would be visited on the world; he knew of the avarice, the lust, the hate, and the wounds that the world would always have. His was always the spirit of fairness and tolerance and self-sacrifice." What the country needs in times like these is more men in Washington like the late James L. Slayden.

NOT BECAUSE IT WAS A GREAT POEM or a profound song, but because thousands of persons have sung it with emotion and real sentiment, "Silver Threads Among the Gold" has become almost a classic. If this were not so the unhappy history of its composer and his family would be only another story of wrangling and bitter lives. As it is, one is moved to read that Hart P. Danks, who wrote the song, died twenty years ago friendless and alone, after a separation from his wife; and that she, who was the song's inspiration, has now died too, as lonely and as destitute. The son and daughter have spent the years since their father's death quarreling over royalties, which appear to have been considerable, to the point where the sister attempted to have the brother arrested for failure to pay what she thought was her due. In 1874 the youthful Danks and his wife, secure in their happiness, could sing of life fifty years later when they would be old, and could pledge themselves that the interval should not make any difference in their feeling for each other. And now this sordid story.

“La Follette, Dictator”

THAT is what the New York World calls him, saying that Mr. La Follette is “the most important political factor in the United States today.” With this statement we heartily agree—if only Mr. La Follette will realize his power, vision the proper use to be made of it, and act with courage and vigor. There is no question whatever that he can exercise today a veto-power over the acts of the Republican leaders. We believe him to be powerful enough in the Northwest to be able to defeat the nominee of the Republican Convention if that nominee should be Calvin Coolidge or a man of similar caliber. We believe that Mr. La Follette will fail in his duty to his countrymen if he permits any such nomination to take place without announcing that he will oppose it to the morning of election day. As the Senator has not been in the habit of being untrue to his countrymen, but has been serving their interests in season and out of season, through good and evil repute, we are of the opinion that he will exercise his great power when the time comes. We are glad to see dispatches in the daily press which portray him as finally realizing that there is nothing further to be hoped from the Republican Party. They also suggest that the Wisconsin delegation, after making the same plea for a liberal platform that it made in 1912, 1916, and 1920, will walk out of this year’s convention and refuse to lend itself to the quadrennial fraud which its party, in national convention assembled, has been perpetrating on the country for twelve years and longer.

Once more we appeal for a third party. We do so without the slightest thought as to whether such a ticket can or cannot win under the leadership of Mr. La Follette or anybody else. We are not concerned with the prospects of immediate victory, nor shall we be discouraged if we are told that there is no prospect of victory for many years to come. What we are looking for is the establishment on sound foundations of a new political order in America, and we realize that this cannot be done in a day or a night. We are quite aware that the British Labor Party, which is now governing England, was not a mushroom growth, but was the result of years and years of preparation, of ceaseless education of intellectuals and laborers alike. We should not even be discouraged if we were told that any third-party movement was doomed to perpetual failure so far as capturing the offices is concerned. Such a party might be defeated year after year and yet prove to be of the utmost service to the country through the spreading of its doctrines and the upholding of its standards. If it were true to itself and its principles, it could not fail to exercise a most powerful effect upon the political development of America if only by making people think. Mr. La Follette’s career illustrates exactly what we mean. In 1908 the Senator offered thirteen planks for incorporation in the platform of the Republican convention of that year. They were rejected with scorn and derision, and he was once more branded as a dangerous and foolish radical. But no less than twelve of these proposals are the law of this land today, nine of them by the votes of the very party which turned him down with such contumely, and the thirteenth is in part upon our statute books. That is education for you; that spells political success, even when one is denounced as a radical visionary from one end of the country to the other. We are bold enough to believe that a third party with ideals and a program and the courage to stick to them through thick and thin could exercise its influence precisely as Robert La Follette has influenced and educated his party. How amazing is the vote in the North Dakota primary election! Although La Follette had officially withdrawn, more persons voted for him than for Johnson.

In many ways, it seems to us, Mr. La Follette is facing the severest test of his career. He is sixty-eight years of age, and he is not in good health—he has spent himself in the service of the country. He has never bolted his party, not even in 1912, when the temptation must have been superlatively great. He must naturally be longing to say that younger men should lead now, that he has earned the privilege of retiring to his farm and of lifting his voice merely from time to time. We do not believe that he can do anything of the kind. There is no man who so personifies the spirit of revolt in this country today. As the World says, “in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Iowa, Oregon, and Washington his voice is potent beyond that of any other man.” If he speaks the harsh truth, Mr. Coolidge will shrivel up wherever the Senator goes, because everywhere throughout those States men know that Robert La Follette is honest to the backbone, that despite all the abuse hurled at him in these last ten years no one has ever said one word which reflected upon his personal integrity or imputed to him a single unworthy ambition. The Senator has chosen to remain silent at present, probably until the Republican Convention has met and adjourned. If he fails to speak out then he will have missed a great chance in his career, and we shall be but little affected in that opinion if by some miracle the convention should nominate William E. Borah, or some excellent man not now connected with our political life. That game of presenting to the voters an honest and good man to cover up the misdeeds of the party has been played too often. We hope he will run either independently or as the spokesman of a formal third party.

It seems to us that there is but one excuse which will avail him should he fail to throw himself into the breach, and that is the legitimate one that his health may not permit him to do so. In that case, we must turn to someone else, to Senator Norris, to Senator Borah, if he will see his duty, or to some one of the newer men with a reputation to make. We are for a third party because we know now that the regular conventions will be permitted to formulate no policy of progress, no program for economic advancement and freedom, no platform which will pledge us to end our imperialism in the Caribbean and commit us to using our influence in Europe toward ending the suffering and despair of great peoples whom we helped to lead into their present morass. We are for a third party because we believe that our whole political thinking is decades behind the times, that it needs to be lifted to a higher plane without the loss of a moment if we are to redeem our reputation abroad and prove to the world that we are determined to wipe out the shame and disgrace we have been enduring in Washington. Merely to empower one of the old parties to go ahead along the old lines, even with new men, would be to confess our lack of genuine patriotism, the absence of any real devotion to the republic, and the moral bankruptcy of men of conscience everywhere.

Our Downtrodden Bankers

OUR deepest sympathies go out to the Wall Street bankers. Once more they are the victims of base official ingratitude; once more they find themselves tricked, betrayed, flaunted, undermined. The evil-doers are, of course, the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Have they not from the very beginning of their pernicious activities assumed the role of disturbers of traffic and despoilers of the makers of good business? Now they have struck a blow which is thus properly characterized in the news columns of our esteemed contemporary the New York Tribune:

A fresh endeavor to disrupt the domination of railroad finances by J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and their respective associates, launched without warning by the Interstate Commerce Commission, threw consternation yesterday into the hearts of bankers and railroad executives, as traditional relationships, built up over more than half a century, appeared in jeopardy. It is upon these relationships that the credit structure of the nation's transportation system has been reared and that funds to tide it over numerous crises have depended.

We confess that our indignation at the Commission knows no bounds. We do not, however, know which is worse, the attempt to shake the domination of these great bankers or the omission of that proper notice and warning to which the rulers of our financial world are surely entitled from any official body that contemplates poaching upon their preserves. But this reminds us that we have not yet taken our readers into our confidence as to the crime committed. Know then, in the words of the Tribune:

The purpose of the Commission was disclosed in an apparently innocent opinion handed down in connection with a recent application by the Chicago Union Station Company to sell two issues of bonds. The sale of the larger issue, amounting to $7,000,000, to Kuhn, Loeb & Co. was approved. Then, in ruling upon the request for permission to sell $850,000 first mortgage 4½ per cent bonds, Series A, which were not covered by any prior arrangement with the bankers, the Commission required that "they be sold to the highest bidder after public advertisement."

The bankers explain that they can get along without the railroads, but that the carriers would find it rough sledding if their banking affiliations should be thus "arbitrarily shattered." They point out, too, that the issue involved is not large enough to afford a real test of the experiment. They show that the Commission, in addition to the assumption of "apparent innocence," has also masked its deadly purpose by a seemingly guileless declaration that this method of selling railroad securities is "in the nature of an experiment." Now the bankers are not concerned, they tell us, by the loss of business. It is this confounded policy of interfering with one of our most firmly established private financial enterprises—we had almost said with one of our most respectable monopolies. The bankers say it is unfair to make them carry the weaker roads and then forbid them to help themselves, without competitive interference, to the rich plums offered by the more prosperous railroads. Worst of all, and here again we have the Tribune's authority for our statement, the railroads are equally unhappy about this divorce procedure, because they are entirely satisfied with their connubial status quo. Whom Mammon and the god of things as they be have joined together, let no mere Commission put asunder!

Our sympathies go out the more to the bankers because this policy might drive our foremost institutions into banking instead of financing and underwriting. It might take from them the power to appoint our railroad presidents without troubling the stockholders or employees of the railroads with unnecessary consultation. The more we consider the matter the more suspicious we become that the Interstate Commerce Commission must have fallen under communistic influences, and we hereby call upon the Civic Federation and the New York Commercial to make an immediate inquiry into the family and business affiliations of each member of the Commission. We have no doubt whatever that these two worthy organizations will be able to prove, to their entire satisfaction, that Moscow suggested the whole thing.

The far-reaching character of this decision can hardly be exaggerated. If we once begin to separate the railroads from Wall Street where shall we stop? Not short of government ownership, we are convinced. Why, this very act of the Commission will be used to sustain the contentions of those who insist that this necessary and harmless alliance between bankers and railroads must be terminated forthwith. Long-haired cranks who want the Government to stick its nose into everybody's business are doubtless jumping for joy the country over. We simply cannot visualize so anarchistic a situation as this decision may easily bring to pass. To think that the railroads may be free to set forth their needs in any market the world over and to advertise for loose capital from San Francisco to Constantinople makes us shudder to the very depths of our moral nature. Could free love itself be any worse?

Mississippi—A Ray of Hope

NEGROES are still lynched and whipped in Mississippi, and held to the land by debts that cannot be paid. Schools for colored children are still few and poor and ill-equipped, and Negro men and women who have the means to do so are still emigrating. The state of civilization described by Beulah Amidon Ratliff in her article on Mississippi printed in The Nation of May 17, 1922, is evidently intact; but none the less there is hope for Mississippi.

Many things may be amiss in a community, but if its citizens are willing to admit or even to listen to a description of their faults, they are on the high road to reform. The Legislature of Mississippi has recently heard one of the most complete and searching and damning indictments of its civilization that could be leveled against any State, and its accusers were its own disfranchised and oppressed citizens—the Negroes. Led by Dr. S. D. Redmond, a delegation of colored men presented to the State Legislature a memorial discussing the status of the Negro in Mississippi and making a number of clear-cut demands. That the statements made in this memorial are true is the shame of Mississippi—and of the United States. That they were listened to with respect and honestly and fully reported in the press is a reason for encouragement. The memorial described the menace of mob violence and lynch law and the need of a guaranty of personal security and impartial law enforcement. It protested against the unequal and illegal distribution of funds for education between the races. Although over 50 per cent of the population of Mississippi is colored, educational facilities for Negro children are almost non-existent. And it "respectfully asked," if this discrimination in the application of public-school funds is to be continued, for "a division on racial lines of the taxes levied for school purposes, giving to the whites all taxes paid by individual whites, plus their per capita share of school taxes paid by corporations, and to the Negroes all taxes paid by them, plus their per capita share of the taxes paid by corporations."

The memorial also points out that as rural schools, agricultural high schools, and other such institutions may be established only by "a vote of the qualified electors of the respective school districts" and as the Negro is nowhere allowed to qualify or vote, "the white qualified elector votes a school for himself and quits, votes none for the Negro, but taxes the Negro to pay for the white man's school."

The memorial asked the State for a reformatory for delinquent colored children who are now thrown into prison with adult criminals; it described the helpless situation of the Negro tenant farmer; it pointed out the desperate need of facilities for caring for tubercular Negroes; it protested against the illegal and indecent accommodations in Jim Crow cars in the State. In a general appeal for lawful behavior it asked that merchants be forbidden to display firearms of all sorts to tempt "the youth and other irresponsibles to purchase and unnecessarily clothe themselves with deadly weapons," and it urged that the manufacture and sale of liquor be made a felony.

The final sections of the memorial are worth quoting:

In view of the further fact that Mississippi sent more Negro soldiers to the World War than whites and that the Negro has fulfilled every requirement as a patriotic citizen . . . he asks in return only that he be made a citizen in fact as well as in name, realizing that there is no such thing as citizenship under a democracy without a ballot.

The Negro fully realizes that the lack of the ballot in this State today serves as a bar sinister upon his brow wherever his interest may appear and thus causes him to be placed at 100 per cent discount to begin with wherever he is concerned. Such a condition can but serve to keep one in the very highest imaginable state of dissatisfaction at all times. . . . And while this is not, of course, intended by any means as a threat, yet we would most respectfully say that with the present immigration quota . . . but 360,000 annually and the industrial growth of other sections of the country demanding an increase of from a million to a million and a half population annually . . . we see nothing short of our beloved State giving up in time most of its population unless some marked relief is afforded along several lines. And since population is the greatest asset a State can possess, could we conceive of a greater loss?

The memorial finally expresses an abiding faith in the "lofty sense of justice" of the Mississippi Legislature and in its readiness to provide justice and relief. Without any such faith we feel, none the less, that something may be done to hurry the processes of civilization in Mississippi. A group of Negroes has been found articulate and courageous enough to voice its wrongs; a white legislature has listened to some unpleasant home truths; if Mississippi is not made a fit dwelling-place for colored men and women, they will leave, and the economic life of the State will collapse. These facts seem to offer some hope for Mississippi.

Electing Classics

THE International Book Review asked its readers to vote for the ten most notable books published in this century. One thousand seven hundred and fifty-three people answered—a tiny fragment, it is clear, of the reading public of the country. One cannot call these readers high-brow; one must grant the group as a whole a considerable catholicity of taste.

Of the ten books receiving the highest number of votes—Wells's "Outline of History" being in the lead—six are the perishable and noisy and brittle products of a voluble age: "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," "If Winter Comes," "The Americanization of Edward Bok," "The Life of Christ," "The Crisis," "The Virginian." These books are not without merit; they are not without interest; they are obviously not of the grain that even the humblest classics show. The answers of the Review's readers, analyzed by authors rather than by books voted for, give a better result. Two artists almost if not quite of the first order creep in: Joseph Conrad and John Galsworthy. But they lag at the end. Ibáñez and Hutchinson still lead the procession of the favorites.

The four authors ranking after the first ten are Jack London, Kipling, Maeterlinck, and Lytton Strachey. Here one comes upon the catholicity of these readers. Large votes were also given to Knut Hamsun and Romain Rolland; it is creditable that of Mrs. Wharton's 188 votes 120 were cast for "Ethan Frome"; it is astonishing that Shaw received only twelve votes more than were cast for Hardy's "The Dynasts."

Verses is no great favorite. Mr. Masters is the poet who ranks highest; the interest in Rupert Brooke was never, perhaps, strictly poetical in its character; the other poets on the list—Edna Millay, A. E. Housman, Carl Sandburg, Francis Thompson—are all admirable. But the votes they received are few, and even Mr. Masters, who received the highest number, cannot compete with William Locke or Jeffery Farnol or Margaret Deland.

Great books are not neglected. There is Ferrero's "Greatness and Decline of Rome"; immediately below it is Somerset Maugham's "Of Human Bondage." Far above both, alas, are Harold Bell Wright and Gene Stratton-Porter and Mary Roberts Rinehart. The voting, from this point of view, created strange fellowships. The same number of votes was received by James Oliver Curwood and Lord Dunsany, by May Sinclair and Henry van Dyke, by Robert Chambers and Albert Einstein, by "Pollyanna" and "Smoke and Steel." The group of readers in question was evidently composed of people of the most varying tastes, the most distant levels of cultivation, and one can imagine that a verbal debate among any considerable number of them would have been an interesting if not a dangerous occasion.

Of all the books on this long list there is perhaps none that is surer of lasting fame than Gissing's "Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" or A. E. Housman's "Last Poems." The former received twenty votes and the latter ten. Very well. But for a long time to come twenty out of every 1,753 intelligent readers will read Gissing's book and ten will read Housman's verses. And in the meantime other Papinis and Boks and Ibáñezs will arise and the present crop will be forgotten.

Third Party Facts

By WILLIAM HARD

IN the fog of surmises about a third party there are a few facts precisely located and clearly visible. These facts are chiefly three.

One. On June 17 at Minneapolis or St. Paul there will be a third-party convention or conference dominated by Northwestern progressive or radical groups; and this convention or conference will without doubt tend to move firmly toward nominating an independent progressive candidate for the Presidency.

Two. On July 4 at Cleveland there will be a gathering dominated by official representatives of numerous trade unions; and this gathering may—or may not—nominate or indorse an independent progressive candidate for the Presidency.

Three. Robert Marion La Follette, senior United States Senator from Wisconsin, is minded at this moment to run as an independent progressive candidate for the Presidency.

Attention is invited to the careful phrasing of the three statements above made. It is not said, for instance, that Mr. La Follette is minded to run for the Presidency as the candidate of a third party. It is said that he is minded to run as a progressive and as an independent.

The prospect is in truth that if Mr. La Follette runs he seems to be likely to do it almost as independently of any third party as of the Republican or Democratic Party. Mr. La Follette, not indeed by his words, but transparently by his actions, shows every sign of being almost as afraid of third-party platform-makers as he is disdainful and distrustful of the platform-makers of the parties already established.

Mr. La Follette, if one may judge from the local writings here of those who are closest to him, intends to avoid becoming the candidate of any assemblage of persons who might tie him to a platform which he would find too heavy to carry. He seems to fear that he might be given an excessive load of fads, fancies, visions, vagaries, nostrums, and (as the phrase here now runs) "nutty notions."

In order to avoid these "nutty notions," and also for reasons of technical political strategy, hereinafter to be mentioned, Mr. La Follette's method of procedure, as now apparently contemplated by him, could be described without extravagance of imagery to be approximately as follows:

He will go out to a lonely spot on the prairie. There he will have with him only those whom he fully trusts. At a given moment (not yet known) he will start running thence at full speed toward the White House. He will wave a banner with words on it written essentially by himself. Such organizations as wish to run after him may do so. Numerous organizations will. They will catch up with him and paste labels on his back saying:

"We are for him. He is our candidate."

If Mr. La Follette in any given case does not like any given organization thus indorsing him, he can repudiate it. If he approves of the organization, and if he approves of the principles which it represents and proclaims, he can accept its indorsement. Or, in both sets of cases, he can just simply say nothing and just keep on running.

In other words, in States where there is an organization of which he is willing to be the candidate, he can have La Follette presidential electors put on the ballot by action of that organization and in its name. In States, on the other hand, where there is no organization of which he is willing to be the candidate, he can have La Follette presidential electors put on the ballot simply by petition from citizens at large. The situation thus created certainly cannot be strictly technically described as a "party."

That such is in substance the plan now under way is clearly shown in an article appearing in Washington in the weekly paper which is called Labor and which is owned by the standard railroad trade unions. This article is anonymous, but is known to have been written by a gentleman in the closest relations to Mr. La Follette. He says:

If La Follette should decide to be a candidate, presidential electors will probably be filed under his name on an independent progressive ticket, and it is doubtful if efforts will be made to put up candidates for the Senate, the House, and other offices.

Continuing, this gentleman points out the apparently sound political strategy of this plan at this time. He says:

The La Follette organization would then be free to indorse Republicans and Democrats running as candidates on the old-party tickets who have been supporters of the progressive program at Washington. A La Follette candidacy would not mean that progressives who must run on the old-party tickets in order to win in States like Iowa and Alabama would have to sever their old-party ties.

In other words, Mr. Brookhart could run for United States Senator in Iowa on the Republican ticket and Mr. Huddleston could run for Congressman in Alabama on the Democratic ticket; and at the same time the Brookhart followers and the Huddleston followers could vote for La Follette for President on a simple outright La Follette presidential ticket.

Becoming still more specific, the authoritative writer in Labor says:

It is certain that Senator La Follette will take no step which might weaken the progressives of both parties now in the Senate and the House. It is for this reason that his candidacy on an independent ticket is more probable than his leadership of a third party.

The distinction is plain, and it is crucially important. If Mr. La Follette chooses to run for the Presidency, there will be no other important candidacy for that office outside of the candidacies of the regular Republican and Democratic nominees; and if Mr. La Follette does run for the Presidency, there will be in fact, according to the present plan, no third party on a national scale at all but only a national independent progressive presidential candidacy plus a continuation of progressive movements within the two old parties in all States where the two old parties are dominant.

In other words, the truth is exactly contrary to the way in which it has been customarily phrased in the newspapers. The truth is that if Mr. La Follette runs, there will not be a third party unless Mr. La Follette's present plan is upset.

Third Party Chances

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

I. Backgrounds, 1918-1922*

UNTIL a few months ago the two old parties were training for their quadrennial marathon in accustomed fashion. The platforms were shaping themselves normally into mutual confutation from sheer resemblance. President Coolidge's political Calvinism was played up as Safety and his personal colorlessness as Sanity. The tory press discovered in his genuine gift for straight and simple English an unusual capacity for coming to grips with realities. A good half of the Democratic delegates were pledged to Mr. McAdoo, the lone "progressive" heir of Jeffersonian Democracy. And the party bookmakers were playing for the marginal voter between the hereditary Republicans and the Solid South.

Then rather suddenly—at least for the great public—came the oil scandal. The two old parties were quite used to the refined product as campaign lubricant, but in this crude oleaginous avalanche they were mired. This stimulated the perennial good-government evangelists as well as the sundry third-party hopes.

By this time it is clear that the Roosevelt reformers will gain nothing from the scandal. We have grown since 1912. Dimly a growing section of the electorate begins to appreciate that individual corruption is merely the expression of the social and spiritual bankruptcy of the two great parties.

Now then is the chance for the various third-party movements to gather into a united front, not indeed for the impossible task of capturing the White House in 1924, but to lay the foundations of a new party and to increase appreciably the "radical" bicameral bloc in Congress under its open label. It is true that the American scene is littered with the skeletons of rickety third-party movements. The Anti-Monopoly and Reform parties in the seventies; the Greenback and Labor parties in the eighties; then the Populists, the Grangers, the different socialisms, workers' parties in sporadic succession. But they indicate less the impotence than the extraordinary vitality of our political protestancy. They failed simply because in any highly complex culture nothing short of an overwhelming social issue, such as the slavery question of the last mid-century, can nourish a third-party movement into success. Industrial democracy is such an issue now. And labor is its natural champion. Slowly, bitterly factious, suspiciously discerning its community of interest with the small and the tenant farmer, with the radical progressive, it is developing third-party sentiment.

The war emphasized the self-feeling of American labor.

During the war labor made considerable gains in organization, some in the standard of living. But its main gains were of a spiritual nature: in the long run it was bound to react inversely to the endless beatitudes of Woodrow Wilson, to the delusions and deceits of dollar-a-year martyrs, four-minute idealists, welfare heroes, and other facile talkers and fakers. And in the summer of 1918, when peace was in the air, labor began to wonder, probably more than ever before in American history, about its own strategic place in the industrial order, about the relation of government to public utilities, about the inevitability of unemployment and depression cycles, about the sacredness of management. And though these doubts came to the average worker most inarticulately, still labor as a whole felt very definitely that its war-time gains must be consolidated.

While Woodrow Wilson was polishing his Fourteen Points labor was preparing for the struggle. The basic industries under the National War Labor Board became restive. At Bridgeport, Connecticut, the machinists went on strike against an award by the board. And immediately they formed a Labor Party. This political movement spread quickly to Hartford, New Brunswick, Meriden, and Danbury. In itself the Connecticut movement was insignificant. But it was symptomatic of the political expression of industrial unrest. Throughout the summer of 1918 labor parties sprang up in different sections of the country, usually out of actual or threatened industrial disturbances, and so spontaneously that the leaders lacked the time and information to get in touch with each other.

But even prior to our entry into the war and during it, the Nonpartisan League had exercised by its mere existence and success a contagious educational political influence on

Why We Need a New Party

* This article will be followed by a second article dealing with the present situation: 1923—and After.

the industrial worker. By the summer of 1918 the League had almost 175,000 members in the Northwestern States, half of them in North Dakota, which was then—and to a large degree still is—in its political control. It was making inroads in the legislatures of Minnesota and Wisconsin, and it was developing active organizations in Texas, Iowa, Idaho, Wyoming, Kansas, and Oklahoma. The original League program was remarkable for its simplicity. It stood for tax exemption of farm improvements; for state-owned and operated elevators, mills, and packing plants; for fair grain grading and for rural credits. But, unfortunately, from this simple platform of 1915 the League had gone by 1918 into all kinds of banking and business enterprises under the leadership of Arthur C. Townley. Townley combines in a rare degree organizing ability, imagination, and idealism of a high order. But his character lacks those essential brakes which keep a movement from leaping beyond its strength. The over-ambitious business program of the League landed it in honest but none the less disastrous difficulties. And today the League is mainly a farm price-fixing exchange. But its influence on the political awakening of the farmer not merely in the Northwest but also in the Middle and Southwest can hardly be exaggerated. It helped to keep the La Follette fires burning during the war. Indirectly it provoked the agrarian counter-reformation of the Capper-Tincher bloc in Congress. And, most significantly, it created the political atmosphere for the current farmer-labor movement in Minnesota, which elected two United States senators and forebodes a stable populist reformation in the Northwest.

The Nonpartisan example had its influence on the Chicago labor group. Until recently John Fitzpatrick, the long-time president of the Chicago Federation of Labor, was always in the leftest wing of responsible trade unionism and a staunch believer in the political future of labor, a heterodoxy which cost him the chronic suspicion of the American Federation of Labor oligarchy. In November, 1918, Fitzpatrick asked the Chicago Federation of Labor to take steps toward forming a labor party. At this meeting the Chicago Federation presented a political platform which came to be known as "Labor's Fourteen Points" and which served as a model for most of the subsequent labor parties. This program demanded a universal eight-hour day and forty-four-hour week; government prevention of unemployment; the encouragement of producers' and consumers' cooperatives; legal insurance against accident and illness; public ownership of all public utilities; civil liberties; and the proportional representation of the workers in public office, education, industry, as well as in the "armies, navies," and "diplomatic" relations of the world.

This somewhat utopian platform was adopted by the Cook County (Chicago) Labor Party in January, 1919. In April Fitzpatrick ran for Mayor of Chicago and polled 56,000 votes. In the same month an Illinois Labor Party was formed. Soon after it elected in Collinsville and Batavia, Illinois, almost full municipal tickets; and through the State it elected sporadically a good many officials. In May, 1918, the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor organized a Labor Party. The trade-union movement began to organize on the political field in North Dakota and Minnesota, in autonomous alliance with the Nonpartisan League; in the industrial centers of Ohio, Michigan, Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Montana, Idaho, and Oregon.

In January, 1919, the Joint Reconstruction Committee of the central labor bodies of New York City called a meeting of all labor groups in its district to form a Labor Party. Eight hundred and eighty-four delegates representing 152 local and 41 international unions as well as the New York and Brooklyn central bodies, the Woman's Trade Union League, and the United Hebrew Trades responded. The convention organized the American Labor Party of Greater New York and adopted a platform based partly on the Chicago program and partly on the reconstruction program of the British Labor Party. Soon after, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Kansas City (Kansas), Omaha, Portland (Oregon), and scores of smaller cities organized labor parties. During 1919 the movement freckled the continent and one of the main topics of conversation in American labor was this new political awakening.

In November, 1919, these groups held a national convention in Chicago. About 1,000 delegates came from thirty-seven States and the District of Columbia. They came mostly from local unions, from the lesser international unions, from Socialist bodies. Again the Chicago program was adopted, only slightly modified and extended. The new platform came out especially against the use of the injunction in labor disputes. It indorsed the Plumb Plan. It came out for the abolition of child labor and of all private employment and detective agencies; for the limitation of income and inheritance. But in spite of its hopeful enthusiasm and wide representation the new party could not help but appreciate its uncertain future even in the world of labor, for the official presbytery of the A. F. of L. kept neutrally malevolent, while the United Mine Workers, all the railroad unions, and the other powerful craft unions had boycotted it.

In July, 1920, the new Labor Party met in nominating convention in Chicago. It was timed to meet simultaneously with the second national convention of the Committee of 48, which then seemed quite representative of liberal opinion, especially in the larger Eastern cities. The committee then, as now, was headed by J. A. H. Hopkins. Mr. Hopkins wanted another Roosevelt Progressive Party. The rank and file of the delegates to the "48" Convention were far redder, though they were too sporadically gathered to know their mind. In order to find out what they wanted they voted to accept the invitation of the Labor Party to meet in common.

The platform of the Labor Party should have warned Mr. Hopkins that it was more a "liberal" party. But Mr. Hopkins was determined to be broad. From the Morrison Hotel he headed the "48" Convention to Carmen's Hall with brass bands and banners. And within the next forty-eight hours he lost practically all of the "48" committees, including the convention chairman, Parley Parker Christensen, who became the presidential candidate of the newly formed Farmer-Labor Party.

Christensen was a dark horse. The new party wanted Senator La Follette. For a whole hot afternoon the delegates were in suspense while the leaders urged La Follette by long-distance wire to accept. La Follette suggested changes in the program, in the organization, in the platform, which was practically the same as the 1919 Labor Party platform. But finally he decided not to take the chance. It is needless to say that La Follette is not a Roosevelt progressive. A few weeks ago I was discussing him with Mr. Hillquit, the whip of the Socialist Party. "Of course," said Mr. Hillquit, "La Follette in thought and action has been one of us all his life." La Follette decided not to head the Farmer-Labor Party in 1920 because he was then fashioning what amounts to a third party in Wisconsin which would give him the bicameral hold he now enjoys in Congress; because he was in touch with the agrarian situation in the Northwest; because he knew of the efforts of the railroad brotherhoods and other powerful trade unions to organize the Conference for Progressive Political Action which is now at his service for a third-party movement if the oil scandal has definitely eliminated McAdoo. So he chose to keep on playing the role of the Republican arch-saboteur.

In the presidential race of 1920 Christensen and his running mate, Max S. Hayes, an old Cleveland trade-union Socialist, received one vote out of every ninety. During the next year the Farmer-Labor Party established offices in Chicago and New York City. During 1920 and 1921 the party was active wherever it had an organization, and here and there it was successful in minor elections. But toward 1921 the studied neglect of the officialdom of the A. F. of L. and of the big unions was beginning to tell on its morale. The New York offices had to be given up. The officers of the party, mostly local trade-union officials, were kept busy in the economic field. The party subsided somewhat. But it kept a nucleus of organization.

The opposition of President Gompers of the A. F. of L. to independent political action is historic. It really was the main issue which brought him into power in 1881. Since then his hostility to third-party action has grown in intensity through his long and bitter struggle with the Socialist opposition in the Federation. Whatever Gompers believes, he believes with the tenacity of a bigoted intelligence, with superb tactical acumen, with shrewd vigilance, and the vehement sincerity of untiring character. The fair historian of American labor will undoubtedly admit that during its first long generation—during the Gompers era—American labor had to develop its organization almost exclusively in the economic field. The history of this development is the biography of Samuel Gompers. And now he cannot change his mode of living. When the Chicago program came out Mr. Gompers asked: "I have read the fourteen points of the proposed Labor Party. Is there one of them which is not contained in the curriculum, the work, and the principles of the bona fide labor movement?" He answered his rhetorical question with a dogmatic, No. And then, with the living erudition of personal reminiscence, he traced the tragic failures of American labor in politics as against the "nonpartisan successes" which have given labor "a commanding position in the legislative chambers of this government." What he said in December, 1918, he had been believing since the late seventies and believes today. Last August I called on him just as he was sending an enthusiastic telegram of congratulations to Magnus Johnson. "But Johnson was elected on a third-party ticket!" I ventured. "And with our heartiest nonpartisan indorsement," was the instant rejoinder.

But during 1921 and 1922 the rank and file of one big union after another came out in favor of independent political action. And the counter-reformation in the A. F. of L. and in the railroad brotherhoods began to stir. This counter-reformation was led by a former Salvation Army captain and present head of the International Association of Machinists, William H. Johnston, one of Gompers's friendly and most judicious enemies.

Johnston was elected to the presidency of the machinists on a radical platform in 1911. He is an old-time Socialist, who once ran as a Socialist candidate for governor of Ohio. But since 1911 the spirit of his radicalism has been greatly tempered by events and official tenure. There is something very fine and honest in Bill Johnston which unfortunately does not show at its best because it is imbedded in a man who is very smooth. "It's easy to go the whole length when you have no responsibilities," he once remarked to me with sad resentment at the continuous indictments of the radicals in the labor movement.

So Johnston decided to play the game in a worthy cause at the right time. And he called the First Conference for Progressive Political Action in Chicago in February, 1922. To such a respectable call they all came; the big railroad unions, in and out of the A. F. of L., the United Mine Workers, the International Typographical Union and a host of smaller unions, the Socialist Party, the professional liberals and third-party carriers, and also the Farmer-Labor Party. At this conference 2,750,000 organized workers were represented, about half of all the organized workers in the United States at the time. Such a responsible and imposing congregation could not violate the articles of faith too radically. Accordingly, it compromised between the Gompers and Fitzpatrick attitudes. It came out for nonpartisan action, but it decided to organize with zest in every State. "The representatives from different States" were delegated to arrange "for State conferences at as early a date as possible," so they might do intensive electioneering up to and during the congressional and gubernatorial campaigns the following November. The conference formulated no platform but a declaration of principles which dealt in generalities but none the less came out against the "long record of injury and usurpation" by the two old parties and their reactionary alliances in industry and finance which "have prostituted the highest offices of government" and "surrendered Americanism to Garyism, creating new privileges and immunities for capital, and trampling underfoot the rights of man." The conference came out against the use of the injunction and the military in times of strike; against the incarceration of political prisoners; against imperialism in Haiti and Santo Domingo. It arranged to meet again in December, 1922, in Cleveland.

There is little doubt that the conference had considerable influence in the "radical" elections of November, 1922. It flooded the State of Minnesota with propaganda for Hendrik Shipstead, who was running for United States Senator on the Farmer-Labor ticket. The Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party was practically independent of the National Farmer-Labor Party. Its success was made possible by the populist education of the Nonpartisan League and the co-operative movement which had been fostered by Magnus Johnson and others for many years. Shipstead ran on a simple platform: for nationalization of coal, water-power, and the railroads; for national farm marketing; for democratic operation of the Federal Reserve Act; for an excess-profits tax; for regulation of all big business; against the Esch-Cummins and Fordney-McCumber bills. But it was not so much Shipstead's platform as the fact that he was running as a "radical" against the Nelson-Kellogg-Preus machine which elected him. The Northwest was ready for a third party. And this readiness in Minnesota received the well-organized backing of the La Follette group and the Conference for Progressive Political Action.

The conference also put its energies into the successful campaigns of Brookhart, Wheeler, Dill, Frazier, and the whole Wisconsin congressional group. Elated by these victories, the conference met in Cleveland in December, 1922, to celebrate and to perfect its organization. But there it ran into the snag of radicalism. The left wing of American labor had undergone a profound development since 1919, when the detonations of the Russian revolution had first reached it by splitting our Socialist Party. Revolutionary consciousness met the progressive forces of American labor full face in this Cleveland gathering. 1923 proved a fratricidal year in American labor. But it also served to clarify issues. In the next article I shall trace the political drifts in American labor since the Cleveland conference.

The Rise and Fall of Mr. Munsey

By ROWLAND THOMAS

THIRTY-FOUR years ago, in 1890, Mr. Munsey bought the old New York Evening Star. Since then he has at various times owned sixteen other newspapers in several cities. Into these enterprises he has put a sum commonly estimated at twenty millions of dollars.

These facts dispose of the assumption, persistently prevalent, that in the journalistic field he is like a freshman who might find himself alone in a chemical laboratory and mix unknown substances with possibly spectacular, possibly ludicrous, and possibly disastrous results. Whatever else Mr. Munsey may be as a newspaper man and newspaper publisher, he is no tyro. On the contrary, he has had a longer, more varied, and more costly experience than most of his competitors. By the magnitude of his activities he has fairly earned a place as one of the outstanding American journalists of this generation. How has he done it? What has he accomplished? And, as a newspaper man, what are his controlling characteristics?

Thanks to a habit of issuing printed statements whenever he does anything he considers important, it is possible to subject Mr. Munsey to a kind of impersonal and ex post facto psychoanalysis and discover what ambitions, ideals, and motives have ruled him at various stages of his past newspaper career, and where at present, journalistically speaking, he thinks he is going.

For a decade after his unfruitful experimentation with the Star he concentrated his energy on the publication of periodicals which eventually made him very wealthy. But in 1901 he bought another New York evening newspaper, the Daily News. The same year he bought the Washington (D. C.) Times, and in 1902 he acquired the venerable Boston Journal.

In 1903, while he was publishing these papers, Joseph Pulitzer celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his ownership of the World. Mr. Munsey seized the opportunity to write to him as follows:

There is no line of endeavor more difficult than that of daily journalism, when conducted on big broad lines. Few men have both the literary and the business instinct to become great generals in the newspaper world. In journalism a man must have a keen literary sense, a keen news sense, must know affairs, must be warmly in touch with human nature, must be ably equipped on public questions, and must, in addition, be a business man the equal of the financial giants in finance and other great enterprises. The ruling spirit, the Great White Czar, of a big newspaper, the man who dominates every department and everything, who stamps his personality on all branches, business and editorial alike, on every one from the biggest editor to the printer's devil—such an executive must be a God-created genius.

From this fine vision of the heights which await the tread of the "personal journalist" who has the genius to scale them, Mr. Munsey was recalled by certain cold, hard facts which to the business man in him were very disturbing. The Daily News was losing money for him. Try as he would, he could not build up circulation or advertising for it. In 1904 he washed his hands of it almost overnight, with the curt announcement: "I have resorted to every expedient I knew without success. I will waste no more money."

He continued his Boston and Washington enterprises, however, and showed himself so far undiscouraged by his rough experience in New York that in 1908 he bought a long-established paper, the News in Baltimore, and in Philadelphia undertook the task of building a new paper from the ground up by starting the Times. Finally, in 1912, he bought back into the New York field again by acquiring the Press.

A new vision had replaced the one of which he had written so glowingly to Mr. Pulitzer. His horizon had expanded. To be the "Great White Czar," the guiding genius of a single institution, no longer allured him so strongly. The business man in him was competing with the journalist. He had a new and great ambition. He had already hinted at it when, in announcing his purchase of the Baltimore News, he wrote: "This is an age of organization and consolidation." The whole secret came out when, in 1912, he announced to the readers of the Press in a big box on the front page: "I have bought the Press because I want it. It completes my chain in the five big cities of the East—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington."

But once again rude awakening came to him. He had his chain of papers and a burning issue to support—the Progressive split from the Republican Party and his very active support of the Roosevelt candidacy. But in spite of all this and every circulation device he could adopt, his garden of journals wilted. In 1913 he sold the Boston Journal, which died soon thereafter. In 1914 he stopped the publication of the Philadelphia Times, writing off his investment as a total loss. In 1915 he sold the Baltimore News, announcing:

I bought the News with a view to making it one of a chain of papers. Theoretically the idea looked sound. Great savings seemed certain and increased efficiency and usefulness seemed equally certain. No idea in the wide world has greater appeal to the imagination than this newspaper-chain plan. No other business or occupation in the world gets a man quite so hard as the newspaper business. But the chain plan has one fatal defect. It implies salaried management instead of ownership management, and without ownership management a newspaper cannot be made to pay.

Economic determinism, of which he was later to become the journalistic apostle, eventually had its way with the rest of the chain which had afforded him such joy of anticipation. The Washington Times was disposed of in 1917, and after being compelled to take back temporarily his Baltimore interests for business reasons, he finally closed them out in a series of consolidations and sales which involved the extinction of the second oldest daily in the country, the Baltimore American, in which "The Star Spangled Banner," almost a century and a half before, had been published for the first time. Thus he became free to concentrate his attention wholly on his New York holdings.

There, in 1916, he had acquired that shining journalistic monument, the Sun, and its companion sheet, the Evening Sun. Almost immediately he merged his original property, the Press, with the Sun. This required him to dismiss some two hundred employees of the Press. He gave them all two weeks' salary, and announced: "My principal regret is that so many men will be thrown out of employment. But that is something that cannot be helped."

This statement is notable. Since the day it was made Mr. Munsey has made many consolidations and issued many explanations of his purposes and hopes. But never since has he referred to the human factor involved in these changes.

In 1920 he bought the newspaper properties of the Bennett estate, comprising the New York Herald, the Evening Telegram, and the Paris edition of the Herald. He consolidated the two morning papers as the Herald, and replaced the Evening Sun with the Sun. He was dealing now with papers which were national and international institutions. His shuffling of them created consternation alike in newspaperdom and among the general public. Recognizing this, he issued several statements:

The name of Mr. Bennett's chief paper shall never perish by any act of mine. The New York Herald stands out sharply as the biggest-timbered newspaper in the world save one, the London Times. The Herald was near perishing when I purchased it.

Of Dana's historic Sun, transmogrified into an evening paper, he announced:

The Sun is now one of the very best and most profitable newspaper properties in America, soundly intrenched in commercial methods and with a great advertising following. It should ultimately take its place at the head of all American newspapers as the greatest of them all.

His next startling move was the purchase in June, 1922, of the Globe and Commercial Advertiser, founded by Noah Webster in 1793. A wave of protest was evoked by his announcement that its identity would be merged into that of the Sun. He made this explanation:

Newspaper-making has come to call for so large an outlay that only big papers can keep up the pace and give the public what the public demands and has a right to expect. The same law of economics applies in the newspaper business as in all others. Small units are no longer competitive factors.

And the same point of view was even more clearly set forth by Mr. Munsey when, on January 28 last, he bought the Evening Mail and consolidated it with his Evening Telegram. Other publishers have sought lasting fame by establishing newspapers. But Mr. Munsey's mind follows other lines. He wrote:

The New York evening newspaper field is now in good shape. Three newspapers have been eliminated as individual entities from New York journalism by myself alone.

Nobody else had a hand in this clean-up. There is no greater menace to a community than newspapers that are struggling to keep alive in an overcrowded field and without strong financial stamina.

One step remained. The morning newspaper field was also "overcrowded," until last week, when Mr. Munsey, finding himself unable to purchase the historic New York Tribune from its owner, Mr. Reid, sold his historic New York Herald to be merged in the Tribune. The usual statement appeared:

My work of amalgamating newspapers in the evening field in New York has been as sound a piece of economics as the amalgamation of competing lines of railroads or banks or manufactures. This principle applies equally well to morning journalism. As I have two other papers, the sale meant less to me than the sale of the Tribune would have meant to Mr. Reid. Moreover, this will enable me to concentrate on the Sun. Whatever is in me to do in the way of public service will be done through the Sun precisely as it has until now been done through the New York Herald.

That announcement was printed on Tuesday morning. It found most of the men who had been making the Herald as workers in the editorial and mechanical departments wholly unprepared for the news. Economic determinism is always a savage and forbidding thing when it crunches human flesh. And in this case it crunched both tender sentiments and things more material. To many of these men the Herald was an institution. They had grown up with it. Its life had been their lives. The end of its life was for them a devastating experience. Their eyes were dazed. They wandered blindly through the corridors. There was the practical side too. Without warning their work had ended. Would other work be provided for them, or would they be left jobless in the city from which so many newspapers had been eliminated? Beyond the printed announcement, no communication was had with them by their employer. For hours they milled about the building, waiting to know their fate.

Finally, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, the wheels began moving. Editorial and mechanical departments were put through the sieve of selection. Some were told to report for work at the Tribune. Some were sent to Mr. Munsey's other papers, the Sun and the Evening Telegram. About two hundred were summarily discharged.

Among the editorial employees thus cast adrift were men whose service dated back to the days of Commodore Bennett, while others were novices. To each of them was handed an order for two weeks' salary, payable from funds provided by Mr. Reid, who as purchaser had no direct concern with Mr. Munsey's employees. Whether he distributed his largesse out of sentiment or in lieu of a fortnight's notice was not stated.

Mr. Munsey was strictly the business man to the last moment of his connection with the New York Herald. Its dissolution occurred the day before the pay-roll week was up. When the discharged employees came in on Friday for their last pay, they found that this shortage in service rendered had been taken into account. Instead of a full week, their envelopes contained five-sixths of a week's salary. There was about his share in the whole final episode an icy remoteness sharply in contrast with that glowing vision of which he had written Mr. Pulitzer twenty years before—the "God-created genius" whose personality, "warmly in touch with human nature," should be stamped on all alike, "from biggest editor to printer's devil."

Old Parties, or New?

The Nation has obtained the following statements on the political situation from two men of differing views who are at the heart of the struggle against dishonesty and special privilege in the management of our national affairs. Unlike most of their colleagues, these two senators are free to speak: one, because he is already the representative of a third party; the other, because he is fearless and independent of party ties and has no political ambitions.

From Lincoln to La Follette

By HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

United States Senator from Minnesota

NEW parties are not formed because someone makes a wish or because someone passes a resolution. But history travels in cycles, and it is my opinion that we are getting into the course sailed by the country just before the formation of the Republican Party. The signs seem to be the same. Great problems were then, as they are now, clamoring for political solution. Whigs and Democrats were dodging the issue of the extension of slavery and the problem of the Supreme Court. Lincoln did not hesitate to charge that the Supreme Court had been packed with men chosen for their known views on issues coming up for settlement. But the Whigs and Democrats were afraid to meet the issues squarely. Members of Congress dodged because they were playing safe for reelection. Public men acted first of all as members of a political party, and the chains of their parties bound them. The force of the issues broke the old party lines, as dammed water accumulates force until it bursts its bonds.

Today neither of the old parties has any adequate program for the relief of agriculture, nor a real tax program—by a real tax program I mean one which compels those best able to pay taxes to pay them; nor a plan, or even desire, to preserve the natural resources of the country for the people. Both parties are on record as wishing to leave control of money and credit—the greatest force in the country, controlling all other resources—in the hands of private corporations through the Federal Reserve system.

What happened in Lincoln's day? There was chaos and disagreement then too. Lincoln had to argue with ultra-radical Abolitionists, ready to resort to force and violence, as well as with ultra-reactionaries. At the first Republican State Convention in Illinois in 1856, he said: "The Government is arrayed against us. . . . We should repel friends rather than gain them if we adopted anything savoring of revolutionary methods. We must appeal to the patriotism and the sober sense of the people. We shall make converts day by day. We shall grow strong by calmness and moderation. We shall grow strong by the violence and injustice of our adversaries, and unless truth be a mockery and justice a hollow lie we shall be in the majority after a while, and then the revolution which we shall accomplish will be none the less radical from being the result of pacific measures." That speech should be a beacon light for us today. Lincoln faced issues squarely in his day as La Follette has been facing them in our day, and about him as a rock gathered the storm-tossed lesser craft which finally formed the Republican Party—the new party of that generation.

We have been electing "good men." We have been conducting Y. M. C. A. campaigns and electing "honorable" men—and it does not get us anywhere at all. Henceforth we must be for issues, not for men. We must get through with the idea that the other fellow is a crook and that our crowd is honest. An honest man may be elected on a bad platform, and be tied to a bad program by his party associates. To say that we must put the old parties out and a new party in simply because they are dishonest and we honest would be bunk. I do not underestimate the importance of strong, honest men who have the courage and force to carry through. But most men think they are honest and act according to their own convictions. We need men who have the right convictions; the issues must count. At least a new party is young and has the future before it; it represents life, not death; it has a chance. The war killed the Democratic Party; the reconstruction period is killing the Republican Party. Whether the people will revive their corpses or turn to a new party with a program is for the future to tell. One can only watch the signs in the political skies, and judge by history.

Put Not Your Faith in Parties

By GEORGE W. NORRIS

United States Senator from Nebraska

I HAVE small faith in a new party. There is too much belief in parties in this country. Under our electoral-college system it would cost millions of dollars to start a new party and before it was four years old it would have settled down and become as bad as the old parties. Unless its leaders were Christ-like men—in which case they would not be political leaders—its candidates would be dictated by a few bosses conferring in private, just as in the old parties.

No man should be proud of party regularity; it is nothing to boast of that a man has never voted anything but Republican or never voted anything but Democratic. What we need is not more parties, but less consciousness of party. A man who runs for office on a party ticket is bound by party associations; he is no longer free. We have no method at present by which a man can run as an independent. The cumbrous machinery of the electoral college makes it impossible for a man simply to announce himself as a candidate and await the popular response. If the people could have voted directly, Hiram Johnson or Senator Borah could have swept the country in 1920. They had no chance; the people were tied to party wheels. The people are independent enough if they have half a chance to express themselves—the result of the La Follette sticker campaign in North Dakota is evidence enough of that. But the emphasis should be laid rather upon increasing the opportunity for independent expression of opinion than upon increasing the number of party machines.

A party ought not to be an end in itself; it should be regarded as a means to an end.

Sedition in Ancient China

By DAVID OWEN

IN the kingdom of Sung during the declining days of the Chou dynasty some 450 years before Christ the philosopher Mo-ti lived and taught. But his doctrine did not flourish, and to posterity he was to become merely an obscure heretic. His formula of mutual good-will and human solidarity was thought subversive to the divinely ordained scheme of things in the Middle Kingdom, to the venerable virtue of filial piety, to the sanctity of the fivefold relationships, and the meticulous practice of personal morality. The obscurity which has been the lot of Mo may have been due to the almost undecipherable state of the Chinese texts, the result, perhaps, of "the burning of the books" in 213 B.C. under the great Tsin emperor. But the more active cause was the doctrinaire Mencius, who arose as the defender of the faith delivered once for all to the saints of China. "If the doctrines of Mo are not suppressed and those of Confucius set forth," said the old dogmatist, "then those perverse speakings will delude the people and stop up the path of benevolence and righteousness." That Mencius accomplished his task thoroughly not even his bitterest critics can deny. In the words of an ancient Confucian writer, "Mo was blocking up the way of truth, when Mencius refuted him and scattered his delusions without difficulty."

The key to the philosophy of Mo-ti is to be found in the single expression "universal good-will." To lack of that quality he attributed all of the evils of the time—a catalogue of evils devastatingly contemporary:

What are the conditions really harmful to a country?

There are many: aggressions of powerful states against small; oppression of the poor by the wealthy, of the weak by the strong, of minorities by majorities; contempt of the great for the humble; lack of good-will on the part of governments; and the corruption of ministers.

But if the way of love were actually practiced—

Princes bearing good-will toward their fellows would fight no more battles; heads of families, loving others, would not bear grudges against them; men would love their neighbors and would neither steal nor do harm to them; officials and ministers would be benevolent and loyal; fathers and sons with love between them would be governed by a filial spirit; brothers, loving each other, would find themselves in harmony and would be easily reconciled if there were a quarrel. Then, when there is good-will among men, the strong will not harm the weak; majorities will not oppress minorities; the rich will not be arrogant toward the poor; the noble-born will not be contemptuous toward the man of humble birth; and the charlatan will not dupe the simple-minded. . . . Misery, injustice, jealousies, and hatred may be kept from society by the practice of universal good-will.

When a man practices good-will toward others they respond by loving him; when a man helps others, they aid him; when a man does wrong to others, they do wrong to him; when a man hates others they reciprocate by hating him.

The citizen of the ideal society is described in words strikingly similar to another ancient picture of the man of good-will:

He who accepts the principle of universal love . . . when he sees his fellow-man hungry he will feed him; cold, he will clothe him; sick, he will nurse him; dead, he will bury him.

Nor must the spirit of mutual helpfulness be confined by class lines:

Chen-tu-ti said to Chou-Kong: "Why should we look down upon men of a lower class? Pearls come from muddy water, but every prince prizes them. Let us change our opinions."

The old philosopher delighted to hurl rather kindly dialectic at the respectable prejudices and pious fears of his contemporaries. It must have been distressing to the bureaucrats to hear him observe that a "king is only a name" or that "when the people speak, the truth will be known." Though by no means an absolutist in his attitude toward war, he was not easily convinced by official fictions of wars to carry out the decree of Heaven—the idealistic guise in which even then aggression was made to appear. His was the disturbing faculty naively but trenchantly of reducing war to its lowest terms:

If a man goes into his neighbor's garden and steals peaches and plums, public opinion condemns him and the magistrate punishes him. Why? Because he has done wrong to his neighbor. One who steals a dog, a pig, or chickens trespasses more seriously against justice. . . . His anti-social qualities are more evident and his crime more deserving of punishment. And likewise, the offense of him who steals a horse or a beef is more grave than that of him who steals a dog. . . . All of these thieves are condemned by public opinion.

But when one prince attacks another's kingdom, none blames him. He is praised and people call it human nature. When one man kills another, public opinion says, "It is a crime and the murderer deserves death." If this be true then one who kills ten men deserves death ten times over. So with one who kills ten thousand men. . . . But those who commit the greatest of crimes against justice by making war we praise, considering their acts honorable. We write maxims to commend their exploits to posterity.

Here are men who, seeing a little black call it black, but seeing a great deal of black call it white. I say that such men do not know how to distinguish black from white.

The king of Lou was making preparations to attack the kingdom of Chen. Mo-ti went immediately to the monarch to protest against the outrage. The following conversation is reported by the disciples of the philosopher:

The philosopher Mo said: "Let us suppose that in your kingdom the big cities attacked the small and that powerful families made war on weaker, what would you say?"

Lou-ang-ouen answered: "In the kingdom of Lou all are my subjects. If the strong oppress the weak, I shall punish them."

Mo-ti replied: "Heaven is master of the whole universe as you are master of your kingdom. If you attack the people of Chen, will not Heaven punish you?"

Lou-ang-ouen said: "Why do you want to dissuade me from this war? In invading the kingdom of Chen I am carrying out the decree of Heaven [sic] because for the last three generations the people have been guilty of unspeakable crimes. . . . I am aiding Heaven by punishing them."

Mo-ti responded: "Imagine that a father having a bad boy punishes him and that every father in the neighborhood, providing himself with a stick, begins to beat the boy, saying, 'By punishing this boy I am carrying out the wishes of his father.'"

"That would be absurd."

"But that is just what you are preparing to do."

Mo-ti encountered the obstacles immemorably met by idealists. He was told that his way was not practical, that it was contrary to human nature.

Those who teach in the kingdom say: "It is true that if this universal good-will were to exist, it would be of great benefit, but it is the most difficult thing in the world to achieve."

Our master says: "It is because those who teach, the litterateurs and the eminent men, do not understand the great advantages of this principle that they speak thus. Take for example an assault on a city, a battle, or the sacrificing of one's own life for the sake of honor. Everybody has always regarded these acts as difficult. But if it please the commander to ask them, officers and men are capable of carrying them out. How much more easily should the people be able to follow the way of mutual good-will which is by nature so different."

Yes, but the rulers and prominent men say: "Ideally, the universal practice of good-will would be good, but it is an impossible dream. It is as if one should try to seize the mountain Tai and carry it across Ho or Chi."

Our master said: "That is a bad comparison. To pick up the mountain Tai and carry it across Ho or Chi might be called an extraordinary tour de force, and from antiquity to our day no one has ever done it. But how different is the law of universal good-will and mutual helpfulness! . . . Love of humanity is the great principle of the world; one must practice it even if he is the only one."

Notwithstanding Mo-ti's repeated assertions that his doctrine was not incompatible with the real human nature it never gained a secure foothold in the practical Chinese mind. China gave her allegiance to the tyranny of Confucian particularism with its high, though prudent, ethic, rather than to Mo's ideal of reciprocal good-will. Hecklers often twitted him over the meager progress made by his doctrine. One of his rejoinders suggests a penetrating insight into the perennial affairs of us simians: "It is not pleasing to the rulers and the powerful."

In the Driftway

THE Drifter looks with compassion not unmixed with astonishment on the violent gestures being made by editors, Members of Parliament, and eminent Englishmen in the direction of King George V. "Look to your son," they say. "Have him on the carpet. Lay down the law as a parent should; tell him he must not approach a horse again or he must not ride in a steeplechase again or he must not agitate the nerves of his future subjects again—tell him anything you like, but insist that your orders be obeyed." How fine it must sound to the speakers, and how feeble to the King. The Drifter has never envied any king particularly, but he has only sympathy for the father of the Prince of Wales; for what twentieth-century father has the courage to make rules for a young man in his thirtieth year, and what young man in his thirtieth year cares a tuppenny bit what rules his twentieth-century father makes?

* * * * *

THE scene is almost too painful to contemplate even from a distance, but it must go something like this: Father and son dine together, talking casually about the weather and the state of the nation, or some such safe topic. The son has been summoned for a lecture and he knows it, and his father knows he knows it. But while the father is acutely uncomfortable, the son is calm and almost too polite; he is not about to deliver a homily or make rules for the behavior of someone else; he can afford to wait. Finally the unfortunate moment can no longer be put off; the father coughs apologetically, begins to speak, coughs again. "About that matter of steeplechasing," he says at last. "Sir?" says the son, all courteous attention. "Yes," replies his father even more feebly, "I fancy we shall have to do something about it." "What do you suggest, sir?" the young man is compliance itself. His parent suffers a violent fit of coughing: "Perhaps people are right in complaining," he stutters. "We really shouldn't want anything serious to happen to you. You have a certain responsibility, of course." "Of course," replies the young gentleman with a bright smile, as if addressing an invalid or a patient in the only partially insane ward, "of course. But don't you worry about me. I shall take care of myself and my responsibilities, too. Good-night, sir. I have a hard day tomorrow and I really must get to bed."

* * * * *

THERE are, to be sure, other methods, and the Drifter has no means of knowing which one the Prince's father uses. They are all equally ineffectual, from the one which begins: "My son, I have something very important to say to you; something which concerns not only your welfare but the well-being of those around you, etc.," to the more candid "Hang it all (or its Royal equivalent), I don't want to lecture you, but you know what everyone is saying." They all end in the same way in well-mannered households; the son rises and bows his farewells as handsomely as a Russian count, the father is left alone with a feeling of utter futility—and the ill-temper that is generated in less genteel environments is no more efficacious. No, the Drifter would not like to change places with the King of England; far better to give orders only to waitresses or taxi-drivers. There is no more chance of their being obeyed, but at least the fate of an empire does not hang upon them.

Traveling Fellowships for Candidates

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am afraid a third party will be a sad blow to the movie population, the daily papers, cartoonists, and columnists, but something should be done before the slump in interest comes. It is too early yet for another war.

The time is ripe for a third party if candidates can be found competent to pass an examination in elementary economics and European politics. I would suggest that third-party candidates sojourn in Europe for five years before the campaign begins here. Morgan might be induced to defray all expenses, as he seems to be flush at present. Vanderlip should be engaged to conduct the grand tour of candidates and explain to them the vagaries of exchange and other thimble-rigging games. Daugherty might go along and save the candidates from three-card sharpers, diplomatists, and other entertaining tricksters. Tex Rickard should be granted film rights.

FRANCIS NEILSON

Lenin Breaks into the Dictionary

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Having had occasion to consult the Standard Dictionary today, I accidentally came across the following on page 1416 of the 1923 edition:

Lenine . . . Nikolai (1870-). Russian Bolshevik leader (Nov. 7, 1917); real name, Vladimir Illich Ulanov or Utulyanov; arrested by order of Trotzky, Jan. 8, 1919.

Now, aside from the fact that Lenin was never arrested by Trotzky, was this the most significant thing that the editors of the Standard Dictionary knew about Lenin in 1923 or at any other time after his accession to power? Or can it be that the editors of the Standard Dictionary took their cue from the New York Times's method of handling Russian news prior to Walter Lippmann and Charles Merz's exposé of that method? If so, what becomes of the lexicographer's supposed impartiality and strict adherence to the truth?

MAXIMILIAN HURWITZ

A Suggestion for Dartmouth

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The president of Dartmouth College is reported as saying that he would bring in Lenin or Trotzky as instructors if they were available. There is the great "if" as usual. They are not available. Mr. Hopkins probably knows that.

Now if Mr. Hopkins means business, and if he really wants to bring about "open-mindedness and an ability to think" among his students, let him call in some or all of the following:

Eugene V. Debs, high-minded Socialist;

Upton Sinclair, author of "The Goose-Step";

Oswald Garrison Villard, Editor of The Nation;

James Harvey Robinson, author of "The Mind in the Making";

Alexander Meiklejohn, late of Amherst.

Or let him arrange a debate between Bishop Manning of New York and Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts. The debate could easily run through a year, or five or ten, and would stimulate thought without end.

I have other plans if these are not acceptable; the case is not hopeless. I sincerely hope Mr. Hopkins will not turn back and let his students say in future years:

Myself when young did eagerly frequent

Doctor and saint, and heard great argument

About it and about: but evermore

Came out by the same door as in I went.

How to Pay the Allied Debt

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Many years ago when I used to plant my intellectual cabbages in a little corner of the esteemed Sunpaper I urged the immediate foundation of a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to the American Language.

I now submit exhibit A as writ by one Edgar A. Guest and published for the public weal by one Munsey of New York in his news-sheets.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE

Calvin Coolidge, President!

Was it written in the stars?

Did God whisper his intent

To the dreamy lad who leant

On the weathered pasture bars?

Did the little boy in school

Know that some day he should rule?

Did the gentle mother know

Something others never knew

In that happy long ago,

Him she loved and cherished so

Had a mighty work to do?

Did God ever let her see Little Calvin's destiny?

Did God whisper: "Train him well.

Teach him to be strong and true.

For some day a tolling bell

To a sorrowing land shall tell

Why this son was sent to you?"

Did God tell her ere she went

She had borne a President?

Calvin Coolidge, President!

Once a lad behind a plow,

Whistling gaily as he went,

With his humble place content,

And a mighty ruler now.

Surely 'tis God's hand we see

In a great man's destiny.

EDGAR A. GUEST

The English Language plainly has a case against Mr. Guest for at least five billion dollars.

Our society (meanwhile to be incorporated) brings suit.

We win that suit, for how could we help it?

We use the money to pay the Allied debts.

But we leave Mr. Guest to the mercies of that Anglo-Saxon God who allows such rhymes as "let her see" and "destiny" to fall upon this earth and no doubt Brother Dante will dig a nice special little circle in the sub-basement of his traitor-parlor.

Esthonia and Soviet Russia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of March 5 Louis Fischer writes an article about the national minorities in Soviet Russia. Unfortunately Mr. Fischer did not confine himself to Russia but expressed some doubts about the future and the policy of the Baltic states.

These doubts have no foundation. The Baltic peoples are quite opposed to Russian political dominance, and there is no section but will oppose Russian rule.

Relating more especially to Esthonia, I should like to state that Esthonia was not detached from Russia by the Brest-Litovsk treaty of March 3, 1918, but that her independence was established by the will of the Esthonian nation expressed in its declaration of independence of February 24, 1918, and manifested in its war for liberty, after which the present Russian Government recognized Esthonian independence, according to the peace treaty signed at Dorpat on February 2, 1920.

Mr. Fischer overlooked also the agrarian reform put through in Esthonia in 1919 and in Latvia in 1920, by which all the large estates were proclaimed state property and taken over after payment of compensation. These estates have already been parceled out to the peasants. Neither the peasants nor any one else in the Baltic states would be satisfied with the sort of political and cultural autonomy existing today in Russia for the non-Russian peoples.

There is no "jingoism of the ruling, estate-owning classes" because there is no estate-owning class which rules. The supreme power lies in the hands of the whole people represented in a State Assembly which is elected according to a most liberal electoral law, all citizens, men and women, of twenty years of age having a vote.

The relations between the majority and national minorities, including the Jews, are very friendly; cultural autonomy for racial minorities has been granted by the constitution and guaranteed by the League of Nations. In Esthonia the national minorities constitute only 5 per cent of the entire population.

Helping Europe's Students

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On December 15 last there sailed from New York a vessel which was hailed by students in Germany as the "friendship ship." It contained a large quantity of foodstuffs sent jointly by the Student Friendship Fund for European Student Relief and the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee as a Thanksgiving-Christmas gift from the students of America to their less fortunate fellow-students overseas. These stores have now been distributed by the European Student Relief among all the institutions of higher learning in Germany, and in every case through the local branch of the great German national self-help association.

But this gift is only one isolated action undertaken by the European Student Relief to combat the threatened extinction of European education and culture. Since 1920 more than $1,500,000, nearly a half million articles of clothing, over 70,000 books, and large quantities of fuel have been distributed by the organization. Approximately 105,000 students in seventeen countries of Central Europe, Russia, and the Near East have been aided. In Russia alone last year 30,000 students were fed daily. And, interesting fact, by far the greatest portion of the funds has been contributed by students in thirty-six nations.

In every relief field constant emphasis has been placed upon the avoidance of anything resembling pauperizing charity. This has been accomplished by the use of "self-help" methods—the development of student cooperative kitchens, employment bureaus, shoe repair shops, tailor shops, etc.

This year schools and colleges throughout America are holding campaigns to support the Student Friendship Fund. Generous sums have already been received, but the students are unable to carry the burden alone. The cooperation of the larger public is urgently needed. May we hope that readers of The Nation will assist? Checks, or requests for further information, should be addressed to the Student Friendship Fund, 347 Madison Avenue, New York City.

Books

Our Early American Drama

A History of the American Drama: From the Beginning to the Civil War. By Arthur Hobson Quinn. Harper and Brothers. $4.

THERE was a time, not so very long ago, when college professors scouted the idea that there was such a thing as an American drama; they ignored it, even when they were examining into those very materials which constitute the early American drama's one great value—the materials of national consciousness, out of which came a feeling, in literature, for American character and locality. Professor Barrett Wendell, when he wrote his volume on American Literature, did not give even a passing mention to the field which, in the present volume, it requires four hundred and eight-six pages to bring as far as the Civil War.

In a short review it is impossible to give the Quinn volume the searching examination it deserves. There is much claimed for it: the publishers state that "this is a pioneer book in a branch of our native literature which, although of the greatest interest and importance, has remained, until now, uncharted." The very bulk of the work presupposes much original research, and such an extensive reference book should show evidences of thorough familiarity with source materials and a willingness to examine into unfrequented fields. Otherwise, "The American Drama to the Civil War" might easily be replaced by a handbook of reasonable proportions. For it must be admitted that early American drama in the reading is dull and lacking in those fine fires of art to be found in the drama history of other countries. Mr. Quinn has read these plays assiduously—not always with enlightenment and not always with a live dramatic sense—but he has failed to reach deep into his materials for the significances of time and place, the perception of which, for example, made Moses Coit Tyler's "Literary History of the American Revolution" such a notable contribution.

This is the first single volume to include a minute enumeration of the progressive steps in the development of American drama. But it is not a pioneer in an unworked field; it leans too heavily on the efforts of others for this statement to remain unchallenged. For in the last fifty years there have been numerous studies of various phases of the American drama and a great many excellent editions of early plays—too many to take account of here.

Consider this imposing looking volume from another angle: the originality of its investigation. There is no deep penetration into the social structure of colonial America in which the American theater established itself, no reasons for colonial taste such as were established by Oral Coad in his paper, Stage and Players in Eighteenth Century America. And Mr. Quinn avoids documentary study of Puritan prejudice, of which there is ample evidence in numberless localities, North and South. There is no fair statement concerning America's first play, "Androborus," centering around a condition confronting Trinity Parish at the time (1714); in fact, the bibliography of local historical events with which this play deals is altogether ignored. (See Coad, Nation, August 17, 1918, and the Bulletin of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, April 15, 1916.) Bibliographies at the end of the book show an unwillingness to enter into such disputed points as the identity of John Leacock, author of "The Fall of British Tyranny."

In other words, this compendious study avoids any very thorough investigation and does not even strive to take up the plow where it was left in the field by others. We look in vain for enlightenment on a number of points. What has the book to say of Creole Drama, a subject difficult to rehabilitate but none the less the expression of a colorful part of New Orleans life? Nothing. There are several references to Yates Snowden's estimable pamphlet on "South Carolina Plays and Playwrights" (1909), but there is no attempt to suggest that distinctively sectional theater hinted at in the essays of Harby and the writings of William Gilmore Simms. In the chapter American History on the Stage the compiler does not add much to what has already been written by Lancaster on "Historical American Plays" (1900), or by Hutton on "Indian Drama" and "Revolutionary and War Drama" (1891). Mr. Quinn has, with evident pains, noted those plays in which Washington figures as a character, but he does not seem to have been aware of the number of times Washington was used on the French stage.

Certain chapters we turn to because they show fullness of treatment. It was Mr. Quinn who suggested to his student, Foust, the original study of Bird from uncollated manuscripts: and to Foust he is indebted for the substance of a long essay of 49 pages. In his consideration of Boker, where he leans pronouncedly on others, he fails to make full note of his sources. His bibliography on Boucicault likewise indicates that he was using material published by others as early as 1906.

One could go further into the incompleteness and consequent lack of authority of this comprehensive volume: the absence of background in the discussion of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" due to insufficient research; the none too clear comment on the influence of the American actor on the American dramatist; the avoidance of examination into the critical attitude toward native plays by Poe, Peter Irving, John Wells, Cornelius Mathews, Oliver Bunce, and Crafts of South Carolina. Nor can one say that the long check list of American Plays at the end of the volume gives one as much hold upon a perspective progress of native dramatic writing as that contained in P. I. Reed's dry but significant thesis, "The Realistic Presentation of American Characters in Native American Plays Prior to Eighteen Seventy," published in 1918. The bibliographies, too, are lacking in many respects.

In other words, this book, useful as it is, leans heavily on the points of view and researches of others. One might almost call it a digest of what has been done. We cannot, therefore, claim for "A History of the American Drama" a preponderance of originality or profundity of research. But it is certainly at present a unique and useful compendium.

MONTROSE J. MOSES

Hoboes

Stiffs. By Melbourne Garahan. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

THE American hobo is a bird of passage, and most of the thrills he experiences—the great thrills of his life—he derives from riding trains, eluding the crews that man them, and circumventing the railroad detectives who lie in wait for him at division points. The English hobo on his native heath has no adventures of this kind, for trains in England, and on the Continent as well, are not constructed with an eye to hobo convenience. If the English hobo yearns to "deck" a passenger train or "glom a rattler" he must come to America to do it. That is what William H. Davies did, and the most interesting part of his "Autobiography of a Super-Tramp" records his peregrinations as a railroad vagrant. Mr. Garahan, unlike Mr. Davies, dispenses with America and the railroads. He remains in London and its purlieus, centering most of his experiences about a tramp lodging-house where he spent a year. But despite the fact that there is little change of locale, he manages to write a very fascinating book. His intention is not to point a moral or make suggestions to social agencies or committees on homeless men, but merely to recreate the experience for its own sake as a vivid and dramatic bit of London life.

"Stiffs" is the story of Danny Morgan, a sailor who because of weak eyes is disqualified from the calling he loves. Bitterly resentful of this handicap, but with spectacles astride his nose, he defiantly ships out as bos'un on a collier. The voyage ends disastrously. The mate takes a violent dislike to him, chiefly because of his spectacles, and hectors him unmercifully.

This persecution leads to a rough and tumble fight which results in Danny's dismissal and return to London. Here he proceeds to squander in riotous living a large sum of money presented to him by his grandmother for the purpose of furthering his education. His father, enraged by this, casts him off, and Danny repairs to Bruce House, a cheap refuge for outcasts, where he spends many months living by his wits, practicing the devious and cunning shifts whereby the stiff procures food and shelter.

The outstanding feature of the book is its gallery of portraits which are done with a sympathetic perception of the comic weakness of each. Bruce House is a Noah's Ark of stranded flotsam. There is Busking, the old actor, who tours the public houses singing for his bread; and Gardner, a gambler, whose sole aim in life is to collect enough for a bet; and queerest of all is old Ferguson, the poet, who orders pudding in blank verse and writes an epic poem called "Hell," which brings Dante's "Inferno" up to date, furnishing the Devil with all the resources of modern scientific discoveries and inventions.

But of all the personages who frequent Bruce House, Cherry stands out as the most vivid. There is none with whom to compare him in any other tramp book—except perhaps Brum in "The Super-Tramp." Cherry, however, is more resourceful than Brum, more eccentric, and, unlike Brum, he is gifted with a waggish tongue. One of Cherry's pet aversions is preachers. He was in San Francisco just after the quake of 1906 and ventilates his disgust for the frantic evangelism which was rife at the time:

There is nothing to beat this here religious madness. . . . There was a biler explosion on one of the Oakland ferries, and some of the newspapers reported all about it and said "fortunately there was no damage, only seventeen parsons blown sky high." A bloke stopped me once when I was loaded with bricks and joists and says:

"Are you for God or for the Devil?"

I dropped me load, and here was the astonishing sight of me tearing after that lunatic, him shouting "Mercy" and me shouting "Hell." But he was too fast for me. Did you ever observe how these religious coves can run? All of 'em in Frisco was sprinters and kept in training too.

To place "Stiffs" as a tramp document alongside Davies's "Autobiography of a Super-Tramp" or Jack London's "The Road" is to reveal both its strength and its weakness. In full-length portraiture it is more effective than either of its fore-runners; but into its autobiographical substratum are rooted growths which suggest the exuberant florescence of fiction—an imaginative reconstruction that has overleaped itself. This highly entertaining fictional facility is most marked in the dialogue at times and in the concluding chapters which record the pursuit of Cherry. The pursuit is somewhat theatrical and savors of an artifice consciously employed to accelerate the reader's interest. Neither in Jack London nor in William H. Davies is there a single touch of this adventitious romance. Both "The Road" and "The Super-Tramp"—the one in its unflagging zest for experience, the other in sober philosophic acceptance of it—strike deep into the mystery and pathos that surround all human life. To assert that "Stiffs" lacks the fundamental authenticity of these classics of Trampdom is not to belittle it. Although it is not a notable addition to hobo literature, it is a delightful one.

GLEN MULLIN

Scientific Pessimism About Democracy

Political Action. By Seba Eldridge. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

THIS book is a serious and in the main valuable attempt to apply what is known, or what is thought to be known, about social psychology to political theory in the hope of determining thereby what is possible in the peaceful and orderly progress of our democracy. The author himself more precisely defines his book as a "naturalistic interpretation of the labor movement in relation to the state." He begins his study by considering the instincts—hunger, fear, repulsion, pugnacity, the sex instinct, the parental instinct, acquisitiveness, self-assertion, submissiveness, curiosity, constructiveness, gregarious impulses, play tendencies—the physical environment, cultural factors, the intellectual processes, hedonic factors, and habit.

An examination of this portentous list leaves him with an opinion of man and of human institutions which our ancestors would have considered a satisfactory justification of the doctrine of human depravity. And there is no divine grace in Mr. Eldridge's picture.

It follows that he has a pretty low opinion of what may be accomplished by political action. Change there probably will be, fundamental change, but not a change wrought by reason. The defects of political democracy are incurable. The underlying assumptions of political liberalism as to the efficacy of ideas, the value and possibility of free discussion and the like are false or at best inadequate. By these standards the editors of The Nation are, we gather, hopeless optimists—an opinion which we cheerfully pass on to some of their critics. Indeed there are not many books which fly in the face of more cherished American notions than this. But Mr. Eldridge is doubtless safe from the inquisitors by reason of his correctly academic and far from brilliant style.

It is obviously unfair to judge such a book by its style and absurd to measure it by its agreement with any comfortable, preconceived hopes about the wisdom of the people, actual or potential. In this hour of disillusionment a less careful analysis than Mr. Eldridge has produced would suffice to convince us how modest a place reason plays in the government of human affairs. If we cannot do all that the earlier believers in the "infinite perfectability of mankind" had hoped, there may be all the more reason to find out those restricted limits in which rational progress is possible. It is to this task that the close and cogent reasoning of Mr. Eldridge's 368 pages is directed. As a challenge to complacency and an invitation to others to press on along the difficult road that leads to a real science of social action the book is worth while.

Nevertheless three general questions may be raised even in a review where detailed analysis is impossible. The first concerns the danger of a too precise application of certain psychological theories—as, for instance, that of the instincts—over which a tremendous battle still rages. Mr. Eldridge makes some verbal and rather naive concessions to the behaviorists in the matter of instincts, but this does not alter his general dependence on Professor William McDougall. And he is a weak reed.

In the second place one must ask whether Mr. Eldridge is not too dogmatic in rejecting or severely limiting Dewey's faith in the possibility of reorganizing education around social objectives: his opinion, for example, that those habits which, rather than reason or instinct, rule mankind may be deliberately altered for the better. Perhaps that hope is false; it can only be proved so after effort and observation which as yet are lacking. Mr. Eldridge finds that the education of college professors has not emancipated them from "the institutions, traditions, and ideals under which they have been reared." But, as the editor of the series in which this book appears points out, these men have never had the kind of education Dewey preaches nor was the need for it generally recognized even among students until the last few years.

Finally I should question whether Mr. Eldridge's conclusions do not require checking up by a much more explicit examination of history and economics than he has given. He accepts the economic interpretation of history, with some well-grounded modifications, but he does not apply economics to such questions as the probable course of the class conflict. The probabilities of revolution and the nature of revolution may depend on various considerations of instinct and habit, but it is a sound historical generalization that as long as a given system functions vigorously on the economic side it will endure. The suicide of old orders, to use Keynes's phrase, is likely to be brought about by such decay or such wars as are overtaking our capitalist civilization. This conclusion involves an examination of economics as well as of psychology. By the same token the author's pessimism as to a labor party needs to be tested by objective realities carefully observed before they are accepted as infallibly derived from social psychology.

In short, one can only hope, after reading this thought-provoking book, that some day our biologists and psychologists and historians and economists will get together, pool their knowledge, fight out their battles, and give us a synthetic approach to those problems of social action which Mr. Eldridge has so courageously tackled.

NORMAN THOMAS

Little Tragedies

My Fair Lady. By Louis Hémon. Translated by William Aspenwall Bradley. The Macmillan Company. $2.

MR. HÉMON has the art of handling with a fine discrimination and feeling the small and sordid, the purposeless and unwritten tragedies of this world. But a gray veil must lie across the author's face. Gaiety and humor do not come to the assistance of the blind and limping figure of Life that haunts his path. And the reader must have relief; he must be permitted occasionally a faint glimpse of the dancing shape of Hope. May not a cross-section of actual experience be brushed by the wings of light irony as well as by those of disappointment and despair? Also, in the majority of these stories, time, not achievement, is marked. The author presents a picture in which the dramatic possibilities, never realized, lapse into interesting descriptions. This is especially true of He-Who-Sees-the-Gods and Fear.

But in My Fair Lady, The Old Woman, and Lizzie Blakeston the portrait in its finished state burns and glows before you. The first is a sketch of recollection—a delicate water-color, kept fresh and bright under the glass of romance through aging and dusty years. It has charm, if not power:

Liette, standing in the center of the ring, her little white face shaded by the great straw hat, her eyes softly shining, her young lips shaping the old words of the song like so many tender kisses . . . little by little they stopped making fun and sang, without ceasing to look at her.

"We shall go no more to the woods,
The laurels are cut,
My fair lady. . ."

The second is a sharp fragment of bitter reality, whose edges cut to the bone. A poor, battered centenarian of an old woman in the last agonies of life is forced to recite pseudo-recollections of the emperor in a charlatan's museum—she, who longs only for the repose and silence of death! It is admirably done:

The little that could be seen of her face indicated a touching age. There were deep hollows between the cheekbones and the jaws; her white eyes ran with continual tears which rolled and clung to the thousand folds of her skin; for her face was a mass of wrinkles, like deep cuts . . . a whole length of harsh and sordid life had come, year after year, to corrode and to gash that thing which had been a woman's face.

Lizzie Blakeston is the epic of a little Cockney girl's long-drawn-out misery of anticipation. For her, who worked in a rope-walk factory at eight shillings a week, the awaited miracle was confined to one Saturday night's trial exhibition at the theater and two sovereigns in a blue plush purse—with the prospect of the factory again next day. That was the end:

On the first floor of the house in Faith Street the family council was assembled. Mr. Blakeston looked at his brother-in-law's watch and said bitterly: "That's what happens when you leave these children their money. They pass their evenings out of doors and spend it like fools."

Uncle Jim interposed benevolently. "Bah," he said.

"At her age they say that, and the next day think no more of it. You must not complain, all told; everything has ended well."

Everything had indeed ended well, especially for Liz-zie, whom the ebbing tide urged gently to the ocean.

This is the book's finale. It shows the unmistakable signs of early work. It is green fruit which has not attained the delicate, symmetrical perfection of "Maria Chapdelaine." But it excels in its understanding of the human heart. Praise should be given Mr. Bradley, the translator, by whose skill the work loses nothing in the English rendering.

LAURA BENET

Books in Brief

The Dancers. By Hubert Parsons. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

The co-operative quill guided by Gerald du Maurier and Viola Tree, under the name Hubert Parsons, has traced a vivid story—undeniably theatrical, it is true, but with imaginative values above the ordinary. The narrative is admirable in pace, unfolded in a series of colorful incidents, and holds one's interest in a double-grip of plot and character development.

An Outland Piper. By Donald Davidson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.

The first volume of verse by one of a group of young and original poets who have been making their magazine, The Fugitive, of Nashville, Tennessee, famous among Americans who look sharply for good verse. The prevailing tone is satiric—a reader thinks of T. S. Eliot, Maxwell Bodenheim, and occasionally E. A. Robinson—but there is evidence of a lively lyric gift, and on every page there is proof of a nimble, fearless mind. Mr. Davidson's next volume may well be a little more unified and much less obscure.

The Complete Poetical Works of Austin Dobson. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

An admirable edition in one volume of this nineteenth-century Prior. Much of him already seems a little faint and over-gentle; but he will remain in the company of the Augustans, and of Praed, Locker-Lampson, and Calverley. Alban Dobson, his son, is the excellent editor.

Luther Nichols. By Mary S. Watts. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Mrs. Watts is not quite comfortable in this novel. She appears to have set out to write a story in the prevailing mode, with the customary large dose of sex preoccupation and modernism, and Mrs. Watts, temperamentally out of harmony with her theme, must have sighed more than once, in the words of the Bangor lumberman, "Lord, how I dread it!" At any rate, the resultant novel is by no means comparable with "Nathan Burke" or "The Rise of Jennie Cushing." Her chauffeur hero remains a little flat and unreal, despite her sincere efforts in his behalf.

The Community Playhouse. By C. J. De Gouveia. B. W. Huebsch. $2.

A Book of Entertainments and Theatricals. By Helena Smith Dayton and Louise Bascom Barratt. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.50.

One Thousand and One Plays for the Little Theatre. Compiled by Frank Shay. Stewart Kidd. $1.

The little-theater movement, after its first lusty experiments and by no means inconsiderable achievements, inevitably dropped to a feeble and desultory pace during the war. Its advocates perforce turned their activities in other directions; the acting groups were scattered, and public sentiment frowned upon all such ventures unless they were made an adjunct of encampments or in some other way related to the major business in hand.

Recently, however, there are indications of a renewal of vigor in this field. Spurred partly by the inferior brand of entertainment which road companies and second-rate stock aggregations provide, and partly by the amateur spirit which leavens all the arts, community activity in dramatics is once more well under way. A number of recent books dealing with the subject are indicative of the trend. "The Community Playhouse," by C. J. De Gouveia, is a particularly valuable work—practical, brief, and suggestive. After a short general survey of the possibilities latent in the community theater, he burrows into the actual problems to be solved, organizing his information with intelligence and presenting it in a manner which makes this volume an indispensable handbook. The attractive book written by Helena Smith Dayton and Louise Bascom Barratt is more general and more inclusive; it covers the pageant and the charity bazaar as well as strictly dramatic undertakings. It will be found of much value for the amateur, and is so well written that it will interest the lay reader who has no immediate intention of plunging into the actual management of such tasks. Mr. Shay's book is, as its title indicates, a bibliography. It covers the available sources thoroughly and puts the data concerning suitable plays in compact and accessible form. The type of drama is indicated in each instance and the number of roles which each play possesses.

Drama Pseudo-Marriage

FROM time to time Mr. Eugene O'Neill starts his career all over again. He gives the impression not so much of developing as of making a series of excursions into various provinces of the drama's domain and of returning from each of these excursions a little dissatisfied, a little disillusioned, a little hopeful that his next experiment will result in something not quite so fragmentary and unfinished from within. I repeat, from within. His works leave me with the sense of never having been permitted to ripen, of having been written when another mood, another method, another philosophy had already shadowed the field of the creative vision. One need but reflect upon a few of his plays in more or less chronological order to see quite clearly the wavering, tentative, unequal character of his productivity: "Beyond the Horizon," "The Emperor Jones," "Gold," "The First Man," "Anna Christie," "The Hairy Ape." "Welded," at the Thirty-ninth Street Theater, is a new departure still. Mr. O'Neill enters the province of Strindberg, the Strindberg of "Comrades," "Creditors," "The Link." He wants to exhaust the problem of the intricate relations between two people. His difficulty is that he has not thought out the question of these relations to their last depth, to a last clarity. That is what Strindberg always did. In that fact lies the endless fascination of those earlier plays of his. They are complete. They are, like all things utterly complete, crystalline. Only what has not been thought out and thought through is murky. And "Welded," though I strained my powers of attention to the utmost, remains murky.

The fable is, as it should be, simple. He is a playwright; she an actress. He is jealous of her past; she is resentful of the fact that her successes have been chiefly in his plays, a fact that seems to make her wholly his creature. It is a fine touch—the finest in the play—that he, conscious of creative power, wanting to emphasize his possession of her, his superiority, hurls at her but one word: "Actress!" But the artistic rivalry in which, from the nature of things, she must always, in her character of a mere interpreter, be defeated is obscured by other motives far less clarified. She does not grow cold at ultimate moments through this fruitless assertion of her ego, but through some other inhibition which is never clearly defined. At the end of a scene which is supposed to be terrible but which leaves one rather cold, each tries to kill love by throwing away body and soul. Each finds it impossible. They are reunited not in hope but in hopelessness, in acceptance of unhappiness by which they hope to be exalted.

So many things are untouched, so many gaps unbridged. Love, to begin with, is less esoteric than this; it is also more fragile. These two, furthermore, were never married. That has nothing to do with a ceremony or an official stamp. They had no tenderness for each other; one is quite sure that they had no compassion for each other's human needs, weaknesses, failures. Their union was, from the start, the contact of two voracious vanities. It was long ago described in "Comrades." It is not thoroughly grasped here at any point. Strindberg shows that his two people were not married. Mr. O'Neill wants us to believe that these two were and that their acceptance of their unhappiness constitutes union. We do not believe him. Union must have rapture; it must also have peace.

The dialogue is distressing. For once I could not blame the well-fed bourgeois all around who tittered and giggled. There is not a living word in the play, none that is torn from the depth of passionate experience. The speech is the speech that superior Greenwich Villagers would, some years ago, have imagined themselves as using on such occasions, in such a situation. The prostitute who appears in one scene is the only character who talks like a human being. Michael and Eleanor do not talk as people talk in either life or Strindberg or Portoriche or Schnitzler. They talk like people in a Greenwich Village novel by. . . Well, that is perhaps not Mr. O'Neill's fault. Perhaps we have no society in America of this particular kind homogeneous enough, cultivated enough, usual enough, to furnish him with an idiom. Whatever the causes, the fact remains.

The result is that both Mr. Ben-Ami and Miss Doris Keane seemed to be attitudinizing at every moment. It was at this that the audience laughed; it was this laughter that I could not but forgive. Mr. Stark Young, who directed "Failures" so admirably, failed here. For even this gritty dialogue with its constant flights into false and untimely eloquence might have been softened and made human by the simplest delivery, by subduing its artificial emphasis. Nothing of the kind is done. In the scene with the prostitute Mr. Ben-Ami's lines are preposterous enough in form, however good in substance. Had he used a visionary simplicity of delivery one might have suspended disbelief. He preaches. The direction is rhetorical. Mr. Ben-Ami and Miss Keane act. They never do anything at any moment but act in the crass and obvious sense. The audience laughed. For on this one point the uninstructed are at one with sound critical doctrine: they want the illusion of reality. You may produce that illusion by any means you like, from stark naturalism to ultra-expressionism. The artistic and spiritual result must be ultimately and in effect the same—to show truth, to show life, to come a little closer to nature.

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

Josef Hofmann

THE PUPIL OF RUBINSTEIN

AS SURELY as his beloved master Rubinstein was enchanted by the Steinway tone, as surely as Paderewski and Rachmaninoff became its devotees, so surely Josef Hofmann chose the Steinway as the perfect medium to voice his art. . . . Unswerving fidelity to the ideal of its creator has made Steinway the continual leader in the development of piano manufacture. Each of Henry Steinway's descendants has contributed his own particular genius and ability to the perfection of Steinway craftsmanship. The modern Steinway, played by Friedman, Levitzki and Cortot, is the finest Steinway of all time. . . . This devotion to perfection likewise has made possible the Steinway of the home. In the smaller grand or upright, suitable for the modest abode, the Steinway tone lives in all its glory and nobility. Once you have heard or played a Steinway there can be no question of your choice. It will be your piano, just as it is the piano of the masters who have named it, Steinway—Instrument of the Immortals.

There is a Steinway dealer in your community or near you through whom you may purchase a new Steinway piano upon convenient terms with the privilege of extending payment over a period of two years. Used pianos accepted in partial exchange.

Victors, Vanquished, and Neutrals

By SCOTT NEARING

ON February 14, 1919, Woodrow Wilson sailed for the United States with the peace treaty in outline form. The Allies had triumphed, had imposed their own terms on the enemy, and had thus laid the foundation for peace and world order: at least so ran the argument. But there were some people in February, 1919, who believed that Mr. Wilson and his colleagues had not found the key to peace and world order. Now, at a distance of five years, it is possible to form some judgment as to these two points of view.

Among the many angles from which this problem may be approached, none is more significant than that of the New York banking world. During each business day this world makes an estimate or "quotation" as to the value of securities, foreign money, and the like. The bankers' estimate of the value of money is called the "exchange rate."

An exchange rate is the market price of one currency expressed in terms of some other currency—as, so many francs per dollar or so many dollars per pound sterling. Fluctuations in the exchange rate occur: (1) With the shifting demand for money or commercial credit, and (2) with the varying confidence that the business men of one country have in the stability of economic conditions in other countries.

The chief countries of Europe have been roughly classed in three groups, for the purposes of this discussion: first, states that participated actively in the war; second, states that were created or greatly modified as a result of the treaty; and, third, neutral states. In each one of these groups the figures show the per cent of par value as quoted in New York on the third Tuesday of January in each year:

Exchange rates of certain European states as quoted on the New York market the third Tuesday of January from 1919 to 1924. Figures show per cent of par value in dollars.

I. Belligerent States

	Great Britain	France	Italy	Belgium	Germany	Austria
1919.....	98	95	81	91	53	32
1920.....	76	43	30	43	6	3
1921.....	77	32	18	34	6	1
1922.....	87	42	22	40	2	0+
1923.....	91	35	25	32	0+	0+
1924.....	87	23	23	21	0+	0+

II. New or "Treaty" States

	Finland	Poland	Czechoslovakia	Yugoslavia	Romania	Hungary
1920.....	21	4	8	6	12	..
1921.....	14	0+	6	4	7	1
1922.....	10	0+	8	2	4	1
1923.....	13	0+	14	2	3	0+
1924.....	13	0+	15	6	3	0+

III. Neutral States

	Holland	Sweden	Norway	Spain	Switzerland
1919.....	104	109	105	104	107
1920.....	93	76	70	97	94
1921.....	82	79	65	69	81
1922.....	93	92	54	77	100
1923.....	99	100	69	82	97
1924.....	93	98	53	66	89

An examination of these figures shows that five years after the treaty was drafted none of the belligerent states is quoted at par; that, with the exception of Great Britain, all are quoted at less than a quarter of par, and that the two "enemy states" are quoted at less than 1 per cent of par. In every instance the rate for 1924 represents a heavy loss as compared with 1919.

Among the treaty states (quotations do not, of course, go back to 1919) only two are quoted at more than 10 per cent of par, and four of the six have lost heavily since 1920. Among the six, Czecho-Slovakia alone shows a gain.

The neutral states, as a group, have also lost, but their position, as a whole, is far better than that of either of the other two groups.

In the estimate of the New York banking fraternity the states that made the treaty and the states made by the treaty have all suffered severe economic reverses during the past five years. These economic disasters have communicated themselves to the neutrals as well, and the whole state of Europe, in the estimate of the New York bankers, has grown distinctly worse since the treaty was drafted.

EXCHANGE RATES OF NEUTRALS. 1919-1924

An Historical Impromptu

THE new Prague paper, Priztomnost, recently contained an article signed T. G. M. which was recognized by its spirit and form as well as by its initials as the work of Thomas G. Masaryk, the Czecho-Slovak President. We print herewith a translation of this article:

On January 21 I noted in my diary the newspaper report of the vote in the English House of Commons which determined the advent of the MacDonald Cabinet; on January 22 I noted the report of Lenin's death. I linked these two events in my mind, and as I meditated upon the remarkable coincidence I said to myself: "Too bad that they did not coincide more perfectly." Then came later reports; Lenin passed out, in fact, on the same day on which the new Government was voted into power in London. Lenin's departure actually preceded the London vote.

The greatest empire of the world now has a Socialist government; the greatest empire of Europe (in population) has for several years been Socialist—officially Communist. If these two facts mean anything they teach that the World War was the world revolution. It was not possible for millions of European and American men to murder each other for years without meditating upon it, and through meditation to come to the conclusion that the regime out of which the World War arose was untenable. And not only the soldiers meditated upon the war and its meaning, but also their families, who stayed at home and experienced the war and its horrors much more intensively than the men in the field, who had less leisure for philosophizing—and still have.

In England the Socialists have won without a bloody revolution; in Russia they triumphed through a bloody revolution. Lenin and his supporters announced that their methods were the only right methods and that they expressed the teachings of Karl Marx. The English example demonstrates that they were not the only right methods; and that bolshevism is not the only Marxianism must be clear to anyone familiar with Marx and Engels. In the revolutionary glow of 1848 Marx was for revolution, even for bloody revolution. But later he accepted parliamentarism, revolution by the ballot, as the chief and decisive method of socialism. Engels so stated shortly before his death with a clearness which bars doubt or discussion. Marx's method then has won in England, not only in Russia; in England the maturer, socialist, more Marxist Marx has won, and non-Marxists won the victory.

England's example will strengthen the conviction of people who think politically, that bloody revolution is an outworn method. Bloodless revolution (not only parliamentary, but also literary, etc.) is the modern method. Without a revolution in heads and hearts a political and social revolution is only skin-deep.

It is not necessary to say that there must never be a bloody revolution; but it should be emphasized that it is justified only after every other attempt at reform has failed. And it needs preparation: a revolution without preliminary reform movements is unjustified, a mere act of violence, like an unjustified war. Man has no higher rule to guide him, in his entire life as in politics, than the recognition that human life and personality must be held sacred by human beings. The Russian revolution has not achieved what Lenin expected, precisely because it was not sufficiently reformist. We shall wait to see what the English revolution achieves.

Russia and England are different economically, morally, and especially culturally. Hence the difference in their revolutions. That is true even of the beginnings of the English revolution in the seventeenth century. Compare the trial and public execution of Charles I with the murder of the Czar.

There are differences too in the personality of the leaders:

A New Era Begins

The advent of the Labor party to political power in England is the culmination of the long-working of silent forces.

The influence of such a signal political revolution on the course of human destinies is not likely to be any the less because it was brought about by a peaceful ballot.

the Russian leader, who grew up and received his education under the bloody Czarist system, early became a typical Russian revolutionary: a conspirator, accustomed to the secret commerce of the professional revolutionaries, of the revolutionary aristocrats who believed in the Russian and world revolution from above—Blanqui, Bakunin, Netshaiev. That is essentially the tactics of Czarism—both groups accept the principle that peoples are led and ruled by minorities, by great men. It is an essentially undemocratic principle. Lenin, of course, had the fate of his own brother to remember—hung on the gallows in his struggle against Czarism. The typical English revolutionary grew up in a constitutional country, was trained in trade unions. At the beginning of his life he was a teacher, a religious preacher, and as a teacher he understood the quiet course of the evolution of the human soul and of human society. Out of that grew his ideals of humanity and of human tactics. And he had native models, from Sir Thomas More to Robert Owen and present-day English Socialists.

But MacDonald came to power because of the action of the Liberals and Conservatives. There is no need of inquiring whether this was tactics or part of a program; in any case the change in England is a striking lesson for the continental bourgeoisie. So, for that matter, is the Russian revolution and the entire development of Europe in and after the war. Prussian and Austro-Hungarian Czarism as well as the Russian have fallen.

P.S. In any case one remark: piu andante as a musical term does not mean "slower" but "faster"; andante = moving, progressing in movement. He who moves steadily gets farther than he who runs and then stops.

MURDER IS NOT COMMONLY regarded as a form either of decency or (except in war) of patriotism. Lynching usually goes unpunished but seldom is defended, even in the South. It remained for some valiant champion of Harry Daugherty in the news bureau of the Republican National Committee to expound the higher morality. This gentleman composed an attack upon Senator Wheeler because throughout the war, in the face of mob hysteria and threats of every sort, he dared defend the civil rights even of I. W. W. and nonpartisan-league farmers against the Montana industrial barons. In the course of this attack upon "the nonpartisan-radical outfit in Montana" this Republican stated that "finally the decent patriotic Americans of Butte took the matter in hand, hanged one of the leaders, . . . ran the others out of Butte, and then called a meeting of the Montana State Council of Defense for the purpose of trying Wheeler." Frank Little, hanged by a mob in 1917, is still unavenged. Apparently someone who sympathized with his "decent and patriotic" murderers—perhaps one of the murderers—is in the Republican Party's official press bureau today. Who is he? What does he know of the murder? There is something else to be investigated.

OUR high estimation of John W. Davis as a man is enhanced by an excellent letter he has written to a friend who urged him to abandon forthwith his law practice—he is counsel to some of the biggest Wall Street interests—in which case his unnamed correspondent felt certain that Mr. Davis could procure the Democratic nomination. To this Mr. Davis replies with delightful candor that this would mean to throw over honorable clients and "desert a group of professional colleagues, who are able, upright, and loyal." He conceives it to be the duty of a lawyer, as it is the duty of the priest or the surgeon, to serve those who call upon him . . . without the slightest thought of the effect such a service may have upon his own personal popularity or political fortunes. Any lawyer who shades his duty "by trimming his professional course to fit the gusts of popular opinion, in my judgment not only dishonors himself, but disparages the great profession to which he should be proud to belong."

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE is reported as making an encouraging fight against his attack of pneumonia, and we earnestly hope for his early and complete recovery. Probably never before has there been an opportunity for him to do a greater service for his country than that which now lies ahead. Senator Walsh of Montana is predicting that unless the Democrats nominate a progressive for President there will be an independent in the field who will carry at least six States in the Northwest and throw the election into the House of Representatives. The Nation finds it impossible to put faith in any progressive if he goes into office with the millstone of one of the two old parties about his neck; its hopes are centered upon an independent movement from without. Mr. La Follette is by all odds the best spokesman for such an opposition, whether it takes the form of a third party or merely of a bloc rallying about the Wisconsin Senator.

THE RECENT MEETING of the League of Nations Council produced some definite accomplishments for the encouragement of the world. The decision regarding Memel, made by the committee headed by Norman H. Davis, has been ratified by the Powers, and accepted by Lithuania with only slightly disguised eagerness. Poland is quite openly dissatisfied, but her protests were overruled. Memel is granted to Lithuania with certain minor reservations protecting Polish commerce on the Niemen. The Council of the League appropriated 50,000 Swiss francs for the starving population of northern and eastern Albania and issued an appeal to the world for help. The Little Entente and the Hungarian delegates reached an agreement which will permit the League to carry out a program of financial stabilization in Hungary such as has been applied to Austria. In addition Poland and Germany agreed to League arbitration in the dispute over the treatment of Germans in the Upper Silesian district. Such a record of constructive results should be added to the credit side of the League's accounting before the world. On the other side of the ledger is the decision on Corfu, which frankly, in the interests of harmony, dodges the whole issue of Italian guilt and merely lays down pious regulations for future conduct. Mr. Branting's protests in this matter did much to clear the air before he was suppressed by the "diplomacy" of Señor Guani of Uruguay. Nothing much was done in the matter of disarmament or of ending the traffic in arms, and it is presumed that the suggestion of Mr. Jouhaux that all private manufacture of arms be ended will be rejected.

POINCARÉ, LIKE THE KING of France in the old fable, marched up the hill and then—marched down again. He resigned; he said that he would under no circumstances return to office; and then he returned. He has strengthened his Cabinet by dropping some of his more unpopular ministers, notably the Minister of Finance. But he has replaced M. de Lasteyrie by M. François-Marsal, who held the post in M. Millerand's Cabinet, and this suggests an entente with that gentleman, who is working for a fascist dictatorship in France. However, there can hardly be any real change in French policy until after the coming elections. They will reveal whether the same reactionary wind as is sweeping Germany is blowing across France too.

GOVERNMENT SPY SERVICES, even when legitimately employed, are generally unnecessary and undesirable in a democracy. And they are rarely—and by their nature scarcely can be—legitimately employed. A sidelight of the Daugherty investigation is the information it has given us on the extensive spy service of the Department of Justice and the way it has been used to protect scoundrels in office rather than the integrity of the government. Gaston B. Means told how, in an effort to head off the Daugherty inquiry, Senator La Follette's private office had been rifled and how a woman detective had been employed to "get something" on Senator Caraway. Note also this colloquy between Senator Brookhart and Mr. Means:

Q. When did this terrific spy system start in the United States, by what official authority, if you know?

A. I have been investigating since I was twenty-one. It had been going on prior to that time. I never saw a candidate that loomed up, any little candidate for town marshal, that they did not go out and make an inquiry about him. One crowd makes it confidentially, and the crowd—

Q. What kind of crowds is it that make this kind of inquiries—financial crowds, big fellows?

A. I don't work for the church crowd, because they haven't got any money. The financial crowd only finance and get investigations.

Q. You mean the financial interests investigate every one who is a candidate for office to get something on him, so they can control him—is that the idea?

A. Well, yes, that would be my interpretation. They would want to find out what he is up to.

Q. And that gang, then, that is behind those investigations of that nature, is the same gang that I have denominated as the non-partisan league in Wall Street? Is that the crowd?

A. I think that President Wilson gave them the best designation, "invisible government."

READ THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is the most fascinating and untrammelled of daily newspapers. Advertising never dictates its policy, nor do cynical editors cut the copy brought in by its reporters. Senator Shipstead recently, in commenting upon the Morgan loan to the Bank of France and upon our invasion of Honduras, was led into some reflections upon dollar diplomacy and American ideals which deserve an even wider audience than read the Record.

I do not like the idea that has been so often reiterated that the "American flag follows the dollar," because that implies that the dollar controls the flag, that the owner of the dollar will then control our foreign policy. I would rather have it said that the "American flag follows American principles and American ideals," and then see to it that these principles and ideals are of such a character that an American need not be ashamed to have his flag follow them. . . . [But] our foreign policy for some time, and the American flag has followed the dollar into Haiti, Santo Domingo, Honduras, Mexico, and France. There is an ever-increasing number of people in America, however, who are beginning to realize that the American dollar represents the crystallized sweat of American labor. Therefore they are very much concerned as to where these American dollars, wrung by toil out of the bodies of the American people, are going, and for what purpose they are being used.

THE CUMMINS-VAILE BILL to legalize the dissemination of scientific facts on birth control would have one result which should please Mr. Sumner himself: it would put an end to a great part of the quackery and the dangerous information on this subject now spread illegally from person to person. The well-to-do are able to avail themselves of all that science knows about the prevention of conception. The rest of the population must content itself with rumor and the most untrustworthy sort of lay advice; in no field of knowledge are old wives' tales so heavily laden with nonsense and magic. People are going to struggle—as long as they have any vigor or intelligence—for the power to order their own lives. If they cannot have the help of science in determining the number and time of birth of their children, they will take what help they can find. To shut off the flood of bad and dangerous and deceptive information, to put a stop to this particularly noxious form of bootlegging, we should support every measure designed to put science at the service of the people.

THE AMATEUR LUSK of the New York Commercial is writing a new series "to show the movement behind the so-called oil inquiry as nothing short of an attempt by radicals inspired by the communistic propaganda." "If there is any intelligent person in the land," he challenges in accents of righteous indignation, "who doubts the statement that these attacks on Denby and Daugherty—and do not forget that they are to be followed by similar attacks on Secretaries Weeks, Mellon, and Hughes, and then the head of the Secret Service, W. J. Burns—are inspired wholly by communistic influences, then he should consider the mass of documentary evidence already available." The quotations which follow show that William Z. Foster and other radicals dislike and distrust the present Government of the United States. The logic is magnificent. Communists consider the Government corrupt; the Government appears corrupt; obviously the Communists are responsible for it. If we wished Harry M. Daugherty much greater happiness than we do, we should hope he might never read a word of the "unfounded charges against him" anywhere but in the pages of this financiers' bible.

THIRTY-EIGHT STUDENTS at Northwestern University, as we recently noted, have declared their refusal to participate in another war. Now fifty students (another report says one hundred) in the Garrett Biblical Institute affiliated with the same university have signed a similar pledge, while three times that number have passed "resolutions demanding the abolition of the army, navy, and Reserve Officers' Training Corps." This was enough to throw the university, the church that supports it, and the "cultured suburb" that is its site, into a frenzy of militant "patriotism." "Flags flapped in the blizzard, waved in the Methodist Church, and draped the walls of the Patten Gymnasium. . . . Soldiers in war make-up marched and bands played. . . . Standing under two flags, Dr. E. F. Tittle of the first Methodist Church admitted to a crowded house that a mistake was made when he allowed Allinson [a conscientious objector who had served a sentence in Leavenworth] to speak from the pulpit." The Chicago Tribune printed a front-page cartoon threatening pacifist college instructors, and editorially expressed its pity of the idealism of youth to whom "it is quite apparent that things can be changed by the effort of intelligent will." The natural result of this patriotic effervescence followed; a Russian-American veteran of the World War was kicked out of a classroom by a group of young patriots who were so prejudiced by his accent that they did not stop to discover that his views were as devoutly conventional as theirs. A little "intelligent will" might help.

BERTRAND RUSSELL'S visit to this country is not that of just "another English lecturer." Of such we have had rather a surfeit during the last few years, and the arrival of a newcomer would not call for comment here. But Bertrand Russell is not specifically English or a lecturer. He is not only one of the great philosophers of our generation; he is one of the keenest social thinkers and one of the most eminent internationalists living, and his internationalism rests upon the surest of all foundations: a steadfast record of pacifism during the World War. We are glad to have been able to present some of Bertrand Russell's writings through the columns of The Nation, and we hope that many of our readers will be able to hear him in person during his stay in the United States.

TO HONOR THE THIRTIETH anniversary of Harry C. Burleigh's connection with St. George's Episcopal Church in New York its edifice was crowded on Sunday, March 30, by hundreds who came to testify in person to their gratitude for Mr. Burleigh's services as the baritone soloist of the church. Hundreds were turned away and extra police summoned to handle the crowd. It was a well merited tribute, for Mr. Burleigh, a gentleman and a musician, and a notable composer and arranger of folk songs, has long been an inspiring and attractive figure in the music world of the metropolis. Hundreds of aspiring young men and women have looked up to him and sought to follow in his footsteps. Like many another he has conquered prejudice and hostile opinion by his modesty, his sincerity, his ability, and his worth. Others more brilliant are beginning to appear, Roland Hayes, for instance, but the fame of none of these can detract from Mr. Burleigh's pioneer work in New York. St. George's, too, is entitled to credit for living up to the doctrine that a man's a man for a' that. What makes Mr. Burleigh's case exceptional is the fact that his is a darker skin than is usually to be found in the pews of St. George's, for he is a colored man who has proved once more the extraordinary musical talent of his race.

THE NATION has been informed that the interview with Mr. Morgan in the Eclair, cabled from Nice on March 19, was false, and that we were misled by its misrepresentations into the indignant comment in our issue of April 2. This interview appeared on the first pages of at least two New York newspapers, who have not as yet retracted it. Neither has the Associated Press, which transmitted it. We hope that the information which reaches us as to its not being authentic is correct, for no more challenging interview by any financial magnate has appeared in recent years.

Roosevelt on Muscle Shoals

HENRY FORD'S attempt to annex to his already large and rich and feudal holdings the mighty resources of power sweeping over Muscle Shoals is not the first that has been made. In 1903, the year Mr. Ford organized his then little motor-car company in Detroit, a bill was passed by Congress giving Muscle Shoals to one N. F. Thompson, representing a group of Southern capitalists. The bill went to the President of the United States for his signature. The President vetoed the bill, and his message explaining the reasons for his veto should be pondered in these latter days by citizens and Senators and by the present President of the United States.

We take from the Congressional Record, Volume 36, page 3071, the following lines:

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

I return without approval House bill 14051, entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to N. F. Thompson and associations to erect a dam and construct a power station at Muscle Shoals, Alabama."

The recent development of the application of water-power to the production of electricity available for use at considerable distances has revealed an element of substantial value in streams which the government is or is liable to be called upon to improve for purposes of navigation, and this value, in my judgment, should be properly utilized to defray the cost of the improvement. Wherever the government constructs a dam and lock for the purpose of navigation there is a waterfall of great value. It does not seem right or just that this element of local value should be given away to private individuals of the vicinage and at the same time the people of the whole country should be taxed for the local improvement.

It seems clear that justice to the taxpayers of the country demands that when the government is or may be called upon to improve a stream the improvement should be made to pay for itself, so far as practicable. I am advised that at another point on the same river to which this bill refers there is an authorized project for improvement by the government at a cost of over $800,000, and that an offer has been made by a responsible citizen to do the entire work without expense to the government provided he can be authorized to use the water-power. I think it is desirable that the entire subject of granting privileges of the kind referred to in this bill should be considered in a comprehensive way and that a general policy appropriate to new conditions caused by the advance in electrical science should be adopted under which these valuable rights will not be practically given away, but will be disposed of after full competition in such a way as shall best conserve the public interests.

White House, March 3, 1903 THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Mr. Coolidge Dismisses Mr. Daugherty

THE great and mighty figure in the White House who rules over the destiny of the nation has finally acted and purged his Cabinet of another man who should never have been in it. But in the very manner and method of his dismissal of his Attorney General Mr. Coolidge has once more given proof, almost ludicrously, of his inability to measure up to the need of the hour. We suppose there are still some millions of business men who persist in their belief that an all-wise Providence brought Mr. Coolidge to the helm of the country, just as it produced Washington and Lincoln in other crises. But for those who can still read and reason it must be plain that the President's letter to Mr. Daugherty was verbose, repetitious, and weak; that there was no argument in it which Mr. Coolidge could not have used as well weeks and months ago. Moreover, no unbiased person could read the Attorney General's reply to the President without being convinced that in this exchange of verbal broadsides Mr. Daugherty scored heavily. Mr. Daugherty is unanswerable when he makes the point that if, as the President contends, he cannot remain in the Cabinet to defend himself from the charges against him, then all that it will be necessary to do to force any member of the Cabinet out is to prefer charges against him. Mr. Daugherty is correct when he says that this principle would render unsafe any man in public office and that under it "the most honorable, upright, and efficient public servant could be swept from office and stable government destroyed by clamor."

The truth is, of course, that until the scandals became public Mr. Coolidge was entirely satisfied with his Attorney General. We hardly think that Mr. Coolidge will venture to deny Mr. Daugherty's assertion that he twice offered his resignation to the President and that the President asked him to remain because of his "entire satisfaction with the splendid accomplishments of the Department of Justice under my [Daugherty's] administration." But supposing this assertion to be false, Mr. Coolidge's ineptness in handling the situation is evidenced by the phrase in his letter demanding the Attorney General's resignation: "I am not questioning your fairness or integrity." Almost everybody else in this country is questioning one or the other. Yet in the midst of the inquiry Mr. Coolidge, in the effort to sugar-coat a bitter pill, makes use of a phrase which Mr. Daugherty is quick to quote to his own advantage. But, aside from all questions of the President's technique, we must point out that when Mr. Denby was assailed our great Massachusetts statesman declared that he did not propose to "sacrifice any innocent man for my own welfare" and would not therefore accept Mr. Denby's resignation. Later on, apparently with special reference to Daugherty, the President in that speech on Lincoln's Birthday, so pleasing to most of our stand-patters, asserted: "I want no hue and cry, no mingling of innocent and guilty in unthinking condemnation, no confusion of mere questions of law with questions of fraud and corruption." Mr. Daugherty has reason to declare that the President's change of mind will add to the "unthinking condemnation" and will increase the public confusion.

In all of this, as our readers are aware, we are holding no brief for Harry Daugherty. We merely wish to point out how unworthy is the suggestion that we should deliberately hand over our government for four years more to one so obviously unequipped for the task as Calvin Coolidge—unequipped both mentally and morally. From the very beginning he has not voiced one word of burning indignation at the betrayal of the country and of the people. He has continued in office his besmirched private secretary; he has continued to have relations with McLean, self-convicted of an attempt to shield a criminal and to deceive the Congress of the United States. He continues in office a man like William J. Burns after more than enough unimpeachable evidence has been produced to make it plain that he ought not to remain a single day. He has not even stopped the shadowing of witnesses and investigators by the Secret Service nor the use of the machinery of the Department of Justice to shield that Department from a thoroughgoing probe. Senator Walsh has just declared that he does not know of anything the President has done to live up to his promise to use the power of his great office "to ferret out the facts and bring the corruptionists to justice." The Senator pointed out that two weeks after it had been proved by testimony that Collector Chase of El Paso, Texas, had endeavored to protect his father-in-law, Mr. Fall, by getting a friend to testify falsely, the President had done nothing about it. The President has been speechless as to the land frauds, the efforts to loot the government reserves in Alaska, and the shutting down of the government coal mines there.

Meanwhile the President is upheld by masses of business men who have swallowed the current propaganda against the investigation because he has favored lower surtaxes and opposed—at this time—the bonus. Apparently the attitude of the business East is that if the bonus could be defeated and the surtaxes reduced everything else would be forgotten—even the sins of Senator Fall and his corruptors overlooked and forgiven. If this attitude prevails, if, after the investigations have been brought to a close, the Government of the United States is to sink back into doing business as usual in the same old way, we shall have gained nothing at all from the exposure of Cabinet corruption. The President had an opportunity to rouse the whole country to great heights of moral indignation and then to take advantage of it to clean out the bipartisan rottenness and corruption. He has not even called upon his own party to drive out from its ranks, in sackcloth and ashes, the rascals that have disgraced it. His attitude has encouraged the propaganda of the commercialized press to the effect that the inquiries have been mere partisan fishing expeditions for the purpose of making political capital at the expense of the other side, whereas the truth is that the Oil Committee, at least, has heard less gossip and rumor and wandered afield less than most congressional investigations in the past, and Senator Wheeler deserves the country's gratitude for forcing the President finally to drop Daugherty. If there is a different public belief it is primarily because of the frantic efforts of the daily press to destroy the force of the revelations in order to "prevent unrest." It is a nauseating spectacle, but it is nothing compared to the prospect of four years more of so cheap a politician as Mr. Coolidge.

Poor Washington!

POOOR Ned McLean! The ruling passion in Washington for calling a spade a spade and a crook a crook—even if he happens to be a high government official—threatens to disrupt the social as well as the political life of the capital. For Washington is a small place, where social and political circles are much the same, and with all the investigations that are going on this spring, the capital promises to be a dreary place for some time. A cross-section of Washington's political-social life, and how the joy has been taken out of it, is nicely revealed by one of the capital's most experienced correspondents, Robert T. Small. In a dispatch which we quote from the Baltimore Evening Sun the situation is thus presented:

Washington's investigation mania probably has put an end for all time to a weekly social function which has attained the dignity of an institution during the last three years. This was the Sunday morning "breakfast" at Friendship, the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ned McLean. The breakfast has included as many as forty or fifty personages high in the exclusive social circles of the capital. Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge, when the former was Vice-President, were nearly always present at the breakfasts. Nearly all of the Harding Cabinet was included and occasionally President and Mrs. Harding themselves "dropped in" on the festivities after church.

The breakfasts began anywhere from high noon on. They were what the English call "hunt breakfasts," when they have followed a ride to the hounds. But, as Mr. Small says:

The Washington affairs were more appropriately church breakfasts, for most of the official guests arrived after the morning Sabbath services. To have an invitation to one of these breakfasts was, indeed, the hall mark of social prestige in Washington. It denoted a place close to the throne, for President Harding, the head of the nation, always was regarded as present whether he actually appeared or not, and to break bread with the President and the First Lady of the Land always has been considered the highest social honor that Washington has to offer. When the Hardings were not present the social honors centered upon Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge, who appeared to enjoy these Sunday relaxations more than any of the other social attentions they received here. The Coolidges were known in their vice-presidential days as the most-sought-after couple and the greatest "diners-out" in Washington social history.

The investigations have put something of a blight upon all of the more elaborate forms of entertainment in the capital and, because of the unsolicited prominence he attained through an effort to befriend a member of the Harding Cabinet, Mr. McLean will not attempt an early resumption of the social program, which was in full swing at his home up to the time of President Harding's death. It was stated at that time that the McLeans' social leadership in Washington was not to suffer an eclipse, because the McLeans had been quite as intimate with the Coolidges as with the Hardings during the time since the inauguration in 1921.

The McLeans were the first persons the Coolidges dined with after Mr. Coolidge had been sworn in as President. The dinner naturally was an entirely private one, occurring, as it did, during the wait in Washington for the body of the dead President to arrive.

So much of sad recollection would attach to the "hunt breakfasts," if they were renewed, that Washington fully expects them to be abandoned, at least until a new Administration begins and new faces have appeared in the higher inner circles. Secretary Fall, up to the time of his retirement from the Cabinet, and Attorney General Daugherty always were among the liveliest spirits at the Sabbath gatherings.

Alas, we learn from this correspondence, there are no indications that the McLeans will do any social entertaining in or around Washington this spring. Naturally, as Mr. Small predicts, "They will linger late in Palm Beach." And then:

The chances are that when the McLeans return from Palm Beach they will go to their Virginia stock farm, some forty miles out of Washington, at Leesburg. The farm is on an electric railroad owned by the McLeans and lies within one of the most exclusive sections of the Old Dominion.

By June it is expected the McLeans will open their newly purchased home in Cincinnati, where they will remain during the racing season at Latonia. Then comes Bar Harbor, and so Washington itself promises to be deserted by the McLeans until possibly after the election next November. By that time Washington's present state of ebullition probably will have quieted down.

Poor Washington! Poor Ned McLean!

Our Preparations for War

FIVE years after the war to end war we are still going strong in our preparations for the next war which, if it comes, will doubtless be "sold" to the American people with the same disgusting hypocrisy as the last. The annual army appropriation bill has just passed the House carrying no less than $326,000,000 for the support of the military service in 1924-25. This is $16,000,000 less than the last appropriation bill carried, and of the total $37,250,000 is for river and harbor improvement. The army is kept for another year at the figure of 125,000 men and 12,000 officers, an effort to reduce the enlisted men to 100,000 failing by a vote of 189 to 33. Boys are hereafter to be permitted to enlist at the age of eighteen in the effort to keep this body of men recruited. No less than 68,071 of the 125,000 troops passed out of the army during the fiscal year 1922-23—a most expensive turnover; of these 12,168 showed their opinion of the kind of life they were leading by deserting at the risk of long prison sentences, while 6,864 more bought their way out of the army. Thus a total of 19,032 or 15 per cent failed utterly to appreciate the army in the terms of Secretary Weeks's description of it in his annual report: "Nowhere else can a young man be taught so well what it means to be a citizen as in the army under military instructors." The new bill supplies for a National Guard of 190,000 men (where 100,000 were deemed sufficient before the World War) and it provides training for a grand total of 500,000 men—regulars, reserves, National Guard, student and civilian attendants at training camps, etc. No less than $2,646,000 must be spent for new airplanes and equipment, $12,435,000 going to the air service for its routine expenses. As at present, we are to have a reserve of 80,000 officers any one of whom may be ordered to active duty—there were seventy-six such on duty last year out of the 76,923 carried on the rolls on June 30 last.

So far as the navy is concerned, some progress has been made in that the pending appropriation bill, which passed the House on March 21, carries appropriations, direct and indirect, of $294,442,867, or $104,000,000 less than was recommended by the budget-makers and $36,000,000 less than the sum voted last year. This represents the smallest appropriation for the navy since 1916, but it is none the less $137,000,000 more than was voted in that year. It is an interesting fact that Representative French, chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, declares that the Conference for Limitation of Armaments saved the American people approximately $200,000,000, the cost of completing eleven battleships, and an annual expenditure in maintenance of from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000. The Navy Department is, however, urging the authorization of six 10,000-ton scout cruisers, four river gunboats, and an enlarged program for submarines. A bill to carry out the wishes of the Department has already been submitted to Congress, and if it is passed its cost must be added to the amount given above for the annual appropriation bill. The latter has been framed in accordance with the belief of the House Naval Committee that Congress wishes to maintain eighteen battleships in full commission, as well as 103 destroyers, and 84 submarines, together with many cruisers and auxiliary ships, all to be manned by an enlisted personnel of 86,000 men.

The best part of the bill is that, thanks to Representative Burns, a provision is attached requesting the President "to enter into negotiations with the governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan with a view to reaching an understanding or agreement relative to limiting construction of all types and sizes of subsurface and surface craft of 10,000 tons standard displacement or less, and of aircraft." That is the humane and sensible way of proceeding, but Mr. Coolidge has already let it be known that he disapproves any such proposal—he is on the side always of the big battalions. If appropriations are further to be cut public sentiment will have to bring it about, and it is high time that it expressed itself.

Still other measures looking toward the next war are pending before the House Committee on Military Affairs. These are proposals to grant to the President authority to "take the profit out of war." Mr. Bernard Baruch testifying on these measures expressed himself as favorable to anti-profiteering legislation. He would give the President power to mobilize money and industries as well as men whenever a "national emergency" arises. He believes that if the War Industries Board had been established at the outset of the war the rise in prices and the economic changes after the war would not have taken place. His proposal is essentially communistic. He would draft the entire population of both sexes, fix all prices for labor, regulate all distribution, and be absolutely despotic in his handling of the industries of the country; they would live or die or be abbreviated or expanded as the President willed. Of course, no such extraordinary power should ever be put into the hands of any man. The bills that should be passed now are entirely different ones. One should make impossible the declaring of war by the United States until a referendum of all the citizens of the country has expressed the people's mind on the issue. And the Congress should vote at once instructions to the President to move officially to bring about the outlawry of war the world over. These are matters upon which the mass of public sentiment is united; Congress would undoubtedly support the President in any such constructive steps.

Fellow-Caucasians!

WE rise in defense of the white race. It has been grossly insulted; its power and dominance have been called into question. A regrettable tendency to question Caucasian supremacy has long been manifest in this country, but it has now burst out with dangerous virulence in the once honorable State of Virginia.

The facts are these. The State of Virginia has long held it illegal for white persons and colored persons to marry. Recently this law has been enlarged and expanded. At the present moment, in the interests of something called "racial integrity," it is unlawful in that State for any white person to marry any save a white person, or a person with no other admixture of blood than white and American Indian. For the purpose of this act, the term "white person" shall apply only to the person who has no trace whatsoever of any blood other than Caucasian; but persons who have one-sixteenth or less of the blood of the American Indian and have no other non-Caucasic blood shall be deemed to be white persons.

In order to carry out this law a State-wide system of registration has been established under the Virginia Bureau of Vital Statistics. Every man and woman and child is urged to fill out a blank giving his name and the "color" of his parents and the signature of a physician willing to witness to the truth of his statements. A misstatement is made a felony. A person need not register, but he may not obtain a marriage license unless all those facts are made known. "Japanese, Chinese, and other Mongolian and Malay races" are under the ban as well as Asiatic Indians and persons one-eighth or more American Indian.

Caucasian blood boils in our veins as we read these lines. What they mean is this: If John Aloysius Jones, free, white, and American, marries a person with the smallest imaginable fraction of any non-white racial strain—one-eighth or one-sixteenth or the square of any of these fractions all the way to infinity—his offspring will be Chinese or Negro or Hindu or Melanesian, and all the fractions of white blood put together cannot prevent it. Before the darker races the white blood surrenders. A single Chinese ancestor eight generations back in a family of Virginia merchants is more potent, more determining, than all his descendants and the persons they marry. His youngest great-great-great-great-great-great-grandchild will not be allowed to marry any Virginia grandchild of solid white ancestry.

Well, fellow-Caucasians, how about it? Are you willing to admit that all the blood of your race cannot absorb and dissolve and obliterate a single drop from another racial stock? Are you willing to believe on the contrary that that single drop will absorb, dissolve, and obliterate all the white blood that flows in your veins? Is Caucasian blood no thicker than water? Indignantly we turn to the legislators of the State of Virginia to inquire: Is one Negro or Chinese or Melanesian more potent than 16 or 32 or 64 or 4,096 white men? Is one pure white man not equal to the smallest imaginable fraction of any other kind of man?

We should be tempted, were we not law-abiding even under severe provocation, to organize a society for inter-racial marriage, to test the capacity of the white race to meet the hazards of existence on a planet like ours.

“Fixing Things Up” in Washington

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

SCANDALS abound in Washington. The worst thing about them is that they are real. There is a thoroughly discouraging abundance of thoroughly documented evidence of corruption and misuse of official influence to “fix things up” for politically influential crooks. It reaches into almost every department of the government, and it is not a matter of a few individuals—it is the atmosphere of an Administration. Daugherty, Fall, and Denby are out—but their subordinates remain, and their spirit marches on.

Take the neglected land frauds. Thousands of American farmers have been swindled out of their lifetime's savings by a group of fraudulent land companies which commanded sufficient political influence to call off investigators and stop trials. The story is coming out in a series of hearings under the chairmanship of Senator George H. Moses.

These companies elaborately advertised their desert lands in Hidalgo County, Texas, worth perhaps $12 an acre, as an irrigated Eden in the “magic valley of the Lower Rio Grande,” yielding amazing crops of broom corn, strawberries, cantaloupes, and figs, accessible to markets, and served by regular ice, grocery, and meat deliveries. So rich, they reported, was this country that farmers might expect in a single year to harvest crops which would repay the entire purchase price of $200 to $800 per acre. Interested farmers were brought by salesmen to Kansas City, Missouri, loaded into personally conducted excursion trains, guarded from contact with cynical natives, and led to one or two show farms that were irrigated. There men claiming to be farmers unconnected with the land companies sang the praises of the marvelous valley; and the victims were induced to part with initial payments and to purchase land. Again and again gullible farmers sold all they had and moved their families to Texas, only to discover that they had been sold desert sand.

One of the group of Texas land companies was the Alamo Land and Sugar Company, a second was C. H. Swallow and Company, a third the Stewart Land Company. Of the first of these R. B. Creager, Republican National Committeeman for Texas, was president; in the second Creager was a partner; of the third he became receiver.

The swindled farmers naturally sought redress. In 1920 and 1921 complaints poured into the Post Office Department that the mails had been used to defraud. J. M. Donaldson, post-office inspector at Kansas City, Missouri, undertook an investigation. Thereupon, in April, 1921, Mr. Creager, together with several of his partners in the land companies, made a trip to Washington, and, in the language of the resolution which led to the present senatorial inquiry, “called on the Honorable William H. Hays, the then Postmaster General, and Honorable Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, for the purpose of preventing such investigations.”

Hays and Daugherty were apparently all that Committeeman Creager wished them to be; the defrauded farmers, however, were bitter and indignant. Hearing of Creager's success they drew up a petition reciting the fraudulent character of the land deals. This petition 656 farmers, each asserting himself a victim of the companies, signed. Many of these were men living in abject distress and poverty on the arid lands of the “magic valley.” Creager's influence, however, was not confined to cabinet members in Washington. The land companies induced Hood Boone, judge of the District Court of Hidalgo County, Texas, to issue an injunction restraining the farmers from mailing their petition to the Postmaster General. Fortunately the petition was already in the mails when the injunction was issued.

The petition of the 656 farmers naturally alarmed Creager and his friends. Accordingly they made a second trip to Washington and apparently arranged with Daugherty and Hays to call off Donaldson and substitute the more complaisant Williamson as post-office investigator of the land cases. This arranged, Creager returned cheerfully to Lincoln, Nebraska. There was, however, some hitch. On October 24, 1921, Creager sent the following illuminating telegram to Rush D. Simmons, Will Hays's assistant in the Post Office Department:

Am informed inspector Kansas City continuing injurious activity. It was understood Williamson was to be there by this time. Inspector Williamson should go there immediately and that plan suggested should be followed, which was have entire records sent you for your personal examination and judgment meanwhile, or proceedings stopped.

Simmons was complaisant. He replied forthwith:

No investigation will be resumed at Kansas City or elsewhere before Williamson examines your Lincoln records to suit you.

Williamson was instructed to arrange to meet Creager, and after an exchange of telegrams met him, not in Kansas City, where the investigation had been conducted, but at a bank in Lincoln, Nebraska. Donaldson was recalled to Washington, but there was still difficulty at Kansas City. D. S. Shook, substituting for Simmons in the Post Office Department in Washington, sent the following clear if repetitive telegram to the chief post-office inspector at Kansas City on November 9:

Take no steps to present any evidence to the grand jury in the case of Alamo Land and Sugar Company or in any case in which R. B. Creager is interested or involving R. B. Creager in any way pending complete investigation by Inspector Williamson, who is covering all these companies including Creager, and we want no action taken at this time. So far as Stewart Land Company is concerned you are at liberty to act provided it does not involve Creager or Creager's companies and if it does do not act because no action in these matters must be taken until after Inspector Williamson completes his investigation and has submitted his report.

This might seem to have left Stewart out in the cold. He was indicted, but his friend Creager was, on January 7, 1922, appointed receiver for the Stewart companies in Texas. "Before his trial and conviction," again to quote the Senate resolution, "the major portion of his holdings, amounting to more than $5,000,000, which he was convicted of obtaining through fraud and misrepresentation, was by him transferred without consideration to relatives and friends." The case dragged through 1922; early in 1923 trial seemed imminent. In January, 1923, Stewart, together with his attorney, David M. Proctor, a Kansas State Senator, and the district attorney who was supposed to prosecute him, came to Washington to see Attorney General Daugherty. Upon his return to Kansas City Stewart boasted so loudly that he had "fixed" things up that the Kansas City Star heard of the boasts and printed them. District Attorney Madison thereupon wrote to Daugherty, on January 11, reporting the Star's exposure and the difficulty of the situation. The judge, it seems, had, in view of the publicity, refused, in his own delectable language, to "be made the goat of," and unless the Department of Justice would give him explicit instructions he would not grant a continuance. Senator Proctor communicated with his friend Senator Bursum in Washington and Bursum apparently consulted Daugherty. At any rate Proctor wired Bursum, on January 16, 1923, as follows:

Wires received. Court advises us that district attorney's office has not called to his attention communications from Department of Justice that a continuance in this case by reason of my membership in the State Senate would be agreeable. Court intimated that communication on direct [sic] from the Department of Justice to the court indicating their attitude would be welcome. Please get in touch with Mr. Martin and suggest this action if possible. I am the sole counsel for one of the defendants. Trial of case before March 15 will embarrass me beyond measure and will be hurtful to the interest of my client.

Senator Bursum characteristically sent the telegram, with a request to "fix this matter up," to W. F. Martin, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, the only other person present in the Daugherty apartment the night that Jesse Smith shot himself there four months later. Martin replied in a long letter, the essential passages of which follow:

We received information from Kansas City that Mr. Stewart upon his return to Kansas City boastfully circulated the report that through influences he had succeeded in securing a continuance in this case, and wide publicity was given to the same. . . .

You can understand and appreciate that the Department could not interfere in the presentation and prosecution of cases when they are in the status as this case is. . . .

We would be very glad indeed to accommodate Mr. Proctor in this matter, but we are sure you will appreciate that we have done as much as is within our power.

The Star having thus made it impossible to "fix this matter up," Stewart was tried and convicted. Creager, however, went scot-free. He is still so free that, just before the introduction of the Senate resolution, it was expected that President Coolidge would appoint him Ambassador to Mexico. The thousands of fleeced farmers have no redress; the frauds continue.

Hays and Daugherty are out of office, but their subordinates remain. The system of "fixing things up" continues. We are still in normalcy.

Farmer-Labor's Rise: A New Phase

By M. H. HEDGES

FARMER-LABOR Party politics has entered a new phase. In a national conference bringing delegates from eight States to St. Paul on March 10 and 11, party tactics and not controversial conceptions and objectives occupied the fifty delegates. In the three important Minnesota State conventions held in Minneapolis and St. Cloud immediately following—one a constitutional convention—tactics and strategy again held the center of the stage. To liberals everywhere this fact is too significant for comment. What appears to be in prospect is a coalition labor party including the liberal and radical groups of the country.

Here is what the conventions did: Set June 17 instead of May 30 as the date of the Farmer-Labor national convention in St. Paul, this out of deference to Senator R. M. La Follette; started a boom for Senator La Follette for President; adopted a call without debate and a platform without debate that virtually embodies the doctrines of all liberals and radicals current since the war; voted by a small minority after an acrimonious attack on the Communists to include the Workers Party in the June 17 conference; adopted a constitution and by-laws for the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Federation that is counted a working model for the national party now in the process of formation.

The national platform provides for public ownership of railroads, governmental banking, government control of natural resources, restoration of all civil liberties, and abolition of the injunction in labor disputes. The shadow of the Teapot Dome scandals, the "injunction of the infamous Daugherty against the railroad shop workers," the bankruptcy of Western farmers, and the impending breakup of two old parties fell across every session.

Who remembers the first national conference of third-party liberals and radicals held in St. Louis at the Hotel Statler in 1919? Here were gathered every brand of "ism" incarnate. Emotions, indignations, enthusiasms, and ardors marked every session. Just fresh from an injunction suit brought by the American Legion to prevent the holding of the convention, the victorious members were more interested in principles than in strategy; utopianism prevailed. Two incidents reveal the temper of that gathering. A red velvet chair looking more like a throne than a piece of furniture stood in the corridor adjacent to the convention room. It bore an inscription: "The King of Belgium sat in this chair during a banquet held at the Hotel Statler" on such and such a date. It was not long before this inscription was superseded by another: "A Nonpartisan Leaguer from North Dakota sat in this chair at the national conference of the Committee of 48." During the course of the sessions it was discovered that no American flag was hung behind the chairman's desk. One was sent for, and a workman in blue overalls appeared with flag, hammer, and tacks, in the midst of a solemn debate. Some one shouted: "Let the convention salute the true upholder of the flag, the American workingman," and instantly pandemonium broke loose. No business was transacted for almost an hour.

At the St. Paul conference no person who had attended the 1919 conference at St. Louis was present. Instead of in a palatial hotel the delegates met in the bare assembly hall of the St. Paul Trades and Labor assembly. Instead of philosophic liberals, hard-headed trade-union statesmen and business-like farmers participated, as they said, in order to protect their economic interest. William Mahoney, gray-haired, bespectacled, slight, and dominantly intellectual, St. Paul labor leader, survivor of thirty years of trade-union battles, presided. John Manly, structural ironworker, Celtic in spirit and strategy, but obdurately hard in debate and battle; R. F. Buck, Chicago trade unionist, gentle and subtle in controversy; Dad Walker, North Dakota, one of the emballoted farmers, and others like them. "We are here," Manly said, "not to unite on a basic philosophy but on our common economic grievances." His words were echoed throughout the session.

John F. Sinclair, returned from Washington, presented Senator La Follette's name to the convention. It was received with spirited but intelligent applause. There was no evangelical emotion, nor effort to stampede the delegates. Mr. Manly, representing the extreme left, then arose and acknowledged allegiance to Mr. La Follette. He said that the left recognized the value of La Follette's record in Congress, and the tremendous hold that he had upon the American masses, and that he considered him the best available candidate. When it came therefore to the question of the change of date of the proposed national conference from May 30 to a time just following the Republican convention and just before the Democratic, it was necessary for the members of the Workers Party, which Manly represented, to modify their stand. They had previously stood by the May 30 date on the ground that it was more essential to preserve party integrity than to follow after the old party meetings or to build the movement round any one candidate.

It should be set down that the most inflexible and extreme opinion represented at the convention was not by members of the Workers Party but by the farmers present. They opposed the change of date from May 30 to June 17 on the ground that the rank and file in the Western States would lose confidence in a party with a vacillating policy, and they held out for a policy placing party above candidate. They were won over by the younger and more flexible left.

The real battle of the conference raged round the question of representation at the coming national conference. Before the smoke cleared away it was evident that the issue was whether the Workers Party should be admitted to the conference as a party at all. W. E. Rodriguez, Chicago attorney, led the fight against the Communists. He read from the Daily Worker, organ of the Workers Party, excerpts seeking to show that the Communists held Senators La Follette, Shipstead, and Magnus Johnson in contempt as representatives of the small business man and the landed farmer; that the real aim of the Workers Party was to destroy democratic parliamentarism and to set up the soviet form of government; that the Workers Party espoused force rather than law and order; and that inclusion of this element in the convention would frighten away conservative votes.

Delegates J. L. Green, Nebraska farmer, Alice Lorraine Daly, South Dakota school-teacher, and William Bouck, Washington farmer, opposed this view. They declared that it was not fair play or good strategy to exclude any group of workers who would accept the party's platform and candidate. When the vote was taken two-thirds of the delegates cast their vote for inclusion rather than exclusion.

Adoption of this policy provided for sending the party call not only to the Workers Party but to the National Socialist Party, the Committee of 48, the Farmer-Labor Party of the United States, and the Federated Farmer-Labor Party. Mr. Rodriguez refused thereafter to sign the call, as did representatives of the Equity Committee of the District of Columbia and the Farmer-Labor Party of the United States.

Other than on this point, there was no strife in the convention. What concerned party leaders more was the welding of the various fighting units of the movement into an actual party. It must be remembered that the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota is in the anomalous position of being a legal entity before it is a fighting unity. By reason of its senatorial victories in the State it has been recognized in law as a party, but in fact it is only a coalition formed of various organizations of varying hues of political faith. Leaders have begun the task of making it a party in actuality.

When five hundred trade unionists met in Richmond Hall, Minneapolis, and indorsed the constitution creating the Farmer-Labor Federation; and later when the Non-partisan League in convention adopted the same plan with certain modifications, a new party was born. The plan of organization is designed to be a model for a national party. It makes economic groups the real basis for political organization. Trade unions, farmers' economic organizations and cooperative societies, associations of men and women, professional and otherwise, are to become the locals forming the political party. For it must be remembered that the workers have seen other third-party movements rise and be absorbed into thin air or into old parties and they do not propose, they say, to lose this one the same way. The fighting heart of the political movement is to be militant economic groups.

A Boy's Tent

By MALLEVILLE HALLER

Slowly and steadily, yellow, red, brown,
In the clear autumn sunlight, the leaves clicked down,
Circled and drifted, yellow, brown, red,
And clicked against the canvas that had sheltered his bed.

Day followed day and autumn drifted past.
In the early winter storms the tent held fast.
Snow swirled over and snow silted in
Across the board floor where his bare feet had been.

Bleached by the sun and rotted by the rain,
Fifty times frozen and thawed again.
Taut in the rain and slackened in the sun,
The guy ropes parted, one after one.

One wild winter night, with a great roaring rent,
The wind burst the roof. The whole thing went Over in the snow. Would you know it for a tent,
This wreck of rope and canvas that the spring sun lifts
From the soiled shrinking snow of rotten March drifts?

Could you believe that this gray heap had Given safe summer shelter to a little bronzed lad?

Set the Children Free

By HENRY F. PRINGLE

THE well-fed gentleman in the smoking compartment of the Chicago Pullman borrowed a match and lit his perfecto. And then, expanding with satisfaction at the thought of the excellent meal that he had just consumed in the diner, he grew friendly. Was I traveling on business? Had I been west of the Mississippi before? What was my line? Groceries? Hardware?

"Child labor?" he asked with a puzzled frown after I had explained my mission. "Why, there isn't any child labor in the United States any more. Not to speak of, anyway. Why, we've gone to the other extreme. It's a good thing for kids to know how to work. The trouble with the younger generation today is that they've never had to work at all. My boy ain't worth his salt. And my daughter? Why, all she thinks of is jazz and new clothes!"

My friend of the Pullman, as I later learned, was a fairly typical American citizen. Perhaps that is why Congress has been so slow in taking the first step which will bring about federal control of child labor. A resolution to amend the Constitution so that Congress may pass remedial legislation has just been reported to the House after lying locked in committee for months. No one of influence has cared seriously about the matter; no one, that is, except the industries in all parts of the country which benefit from the labor of boys and girls of almost every age.

For despite my well-fed friend there is a great deal of child labor in the United States. Statistics are dull affairs, but the census of 1920 set forth that 1,060,858 children between the ages of ten and fifteen were employed in "gainful occupations." Which means that they work to the exclusion of the schooling and the recreation supposed to be the birthright of the boys and girls of America.

The total number of child workers is not known. The census of 1920 took no account of those under ten. Thousands of eight- and nine-year-olds—not listed by the census—work in the beet fields of the West, in the canneries of the South, and in the tenements of New York and other large cities. The census was taken at a time when many forms of commercialized agriculture, now using children, were not functioning. It was taken, moreover, when the second federal child-labor law, later declared unconstitutional, was acting as a bar to the exploitation of children. But even the census figures show an appalling problem. A million children between ten and fifteen means that one child out of every twelve in this age group has become a wage-earning unit.

America often boasts of her idealism. But the United States today is far behind most of the other nations as far as child labor is concerned. Somewhat to the surprise of a group of social workers who had gone to Washington to attend a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee in January, 1923, this was brought out by Albert Thomas, director of the Bureau of International Labor, established at Geneva by the Treaty of Versailles. M. Thomas, polite and anxious to avoid offending his American friends, told of efforts to obtain ratification of a treaty which would bar night work for persons under eighteen and put into effect a minimum-labor age of fourteen. He said that many

But we have another category of countries, those countries which now are hesitating before ratification. And many countries in such shape, I may confess, emulate the example of the United States and say: "The greatest country of the world, the greatest industrial nation, has not yet joined in the protection of children."

On two occasions the United States, as a nation, did join in the protection of her boys and girls. Two federal laws were passed, one in 1916 and the other three years later, which gave Congress power to enforce certain standards. But the Supreme Court found that both laws were unconstitutional. Now only eighteen out of forty-eight States have local measures which meet these standards. In the rest of the States the fight against child labor is a losing one. The boys and girls are more and more going back to work or are laboring for longer hours.

Even a superficial study of child labor in the United States today brings out very clearly just how widespread is the evil. Dull statistics? This army of more than 1,000,000 ten- to fifteen-year-olds and the countless thousands under ten, has a far-flung battle line. Children are at work, for instance, in the shadow of the snow-capped Rocky Mountains. They labor down where balmy breezes are supposed to blow in from the Gulf of Mexico. In the cotton mills of Dixie and in the cotton mills of the North. Thousands of them work in the tenements of the big cities and not a few in the coal breakers of Pennsylvania. And then, of course, there are offices and stores and factories of every description from coast to coast where many a thin pay envelope is handed to youngsters who must stand on their tip-toes to reach the window of the cashier.

Take the beet-sugar industry, for instance. The cultivation of sugar beets is peculiarly suited to the exploitation of children because the children of the beet fields work in the open air it is more than difficult for those who have investigated the matter to arouse much interest in the problem. It is one of the worst forms of industrialized agriculture, however. Boys and girls as young as six work for thirteen and fourteen hours a day lifting hundreds of pounds of beets. The work is closely supervised by "field bosses" employed by the sugar companies which buy the beets from the farmers and convert them into sugar. Scottsbluff, Nebraska, and its vicinity is an excellent place to observe children at work in these "factories without roofs."

Although Scottsbluff has been heard of but rarely in the East, it is a prosperous and booming town, none the less. Its prosperity is due to the cultivation of sugar beets and not a little to the work of the children who are employed in the industry. Two companies, the Great Western Sugar Company and the American Sugar Company, virtually control the fertile valley of the Platte River which runs east, through the State of Nebraska for a distance of 350 miles from the boundary of Wyoming. It is in this valley, through irrigation, that beets are grown.

A dozen different roads radiate from Scottsbluff. It is along these roads, in the early dawn and even while it is still quite dark, that the children of the beet fields go forth for their day's work. I saw them in November when the frost lay thick on the prairies and when the harvest was at its height. But the work had been going on since April, steadily and monotonously.

The harvest is probably the most bitter time of all. It is then that the children must pull the heavy beets from the ground, stooping until their backs ache and pulling until their wrists are weary. After the beets have been pulled the tops are sliced off with a sharp knife. Then the beets are piled into carts and hauled to a nearby factory. Sugar beets are heavy. A child of eleven or twelve years often lifts a total of several tons a day!

Scottsbluff is merely typical of many other places. The northeastern part of Colorado has conditions which are virtually the same. Michigan grows vast quantities of beets in the fertile Thumb Valley in the northern part of the State. In each case it is an industry organized upon the theory that the hand labor is cheap labor. The head of the family must call upon his wife and his children in order to make a living wage. Schools and recreation are virtually unknown. Thousands of these boys and girls are physically defective. But Colorado and Nebraska and Michigan are but little concerned. Their lawmakers do nothing at all. Are not these people merely "beet hunkies"?

And then there is the South. Many of the Southern States, on the basis of present conditions, have been unjustly condemned. One has to search for exploitation as fearful as in the beet fields of the West. But it is bad enough. Mississippi, for instance, with 25.5 per cent of her children from ten to fifteen years old at work, has 9.3 per cent of the same age group unable to read or write. And Mississippi has but a single labor inspector with an appropriation of $5,500 a year although she spends ten times that amount on her cattle. It is because of this that small children stand on boxes at Biloxi, Mississippi, in order to reach the tables where shrimp and oysters are being canned. Biloxi boasts of an excellent climate but it is not warm and mild in the open cannery sheds with the wind sweeping in from the gulf and the rain leaking through the chinks in the roofs. The State law forbids the work of children but the single factory inspector admits that his task is hopeless.

Children of eight and nine no longer work in the textile mills of the South. The manufacturers, for the most part, will assure you that they "think child labor wrong." Some of them will admit that infant labor did not pay. It was driven out, never to return, by the first federal law and even by State laws which were passed before the federal statute. And yet the South is bitterly opposed to the passage of an amendment to the Constitution controlling child labor. "State rights" is still effective as a war cry. But now and then one again finds a frank manufacturer who says that child labor is still very valuable in the South.

First of all the army of child laborers forms a club to be used against labor agitators. There is ever a surplus supply which can be called upon when needed. State laws, in the cases where the work of very young children is prohibited, can easily be amended in time of need. And probably of even greater importance is the necessity of training children in the work of the mills while they are still young and before they have had a chance to learn that other trades and other means of livelihood lie beyond the horizon.

"Get them in the mills while they're young or you don't get them at all. Sixteen is pretty old to begin training mill workers." So one mill owner told me. Preserve this labor supply and the South has a great advantage. At the present time a father in the mills assumes that his daughter and his son will follow in his footsteps. The daughter will marry a millhand and will produce another generation of Anglo-Saxon workers who, in their turn, will watch the spindles which roar and hum throughout the night.

Georgia's law permits girls of fourteen to work all night. Mississippi sanctions work for boys of twelve. More than 15,000 boys and girls of fourteen to sixteen are working from ten to eleven hours a day except in Alabama where an eight-hour law is in effect. In North Carolina the labor of convicts in the State prisons are limited to nine. But boys and girls may and do work in the mills for ten and eleven hours.

At Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, a small boy was lounging near one of the many coal breakers that dot the hillsides of this anthracite district. His face was very dirty, with the grime of coal dust and he appeared to be about twelve years old. But when he was questioned as to his age he lit a cigarette with all the airs of complete maturity and insisted that he was sixteen.

"Sixteen hell!" remarked a coal miner who happened to be passing. "That kid's twelve. Don't let him kid you. These boys lie like the devil to get into the breakers because the company won't take 'em unless they've got proof that they're sixteen."

But "proof," in the State of Pennsylvania, is easy to get. Dr. Royal Meeker, secretary of the Department of Labor and Industry at Harrisburg, explained that with all of the duties that had been heaped upon his department it was virtually impossible to enforce the law effectively. Almost any old proof is enough as far as the boys of the breakers are concerned. A thousand different school officials may issue certificates. Baptismal records are accepted and even the affidavits of the parents of the boys. The sixteen-year-old breaker boys of the Pennsylvania mines are strangely dwarfed. But none of them worked when the federal law was in force!

Then there is tenement home work. New York City is by far the worst example with thousands of boys and girls, some of them as young as two and three years old, making artificial flowers, sewing on garments, making cheap toys, and doing a number of other tedious and menial jobs. The State, in a sense, sanctions this work because it licenses tenements for home employment and does not employ sufficient inspectors to see that the child-labor laws are obeyed.

Will the passage of the federal amendment cure these evils? Not entirely. Child labor must be controlled locally, to a certain extent. After work has been forbidden the community must furnish schools and recreation. Otherwise the argument that children are better off at work than running idle in the streets is a very valid one. But federal control will do one thing. It will remove the unfair advantage now held by the States whose child-labor standards are low. It will act, as it has done in the past, as a stimulus to awakened interest in the problems of the children.

The provisions of the two laws upset by the Supreme Court were simple. They provided a basic minimum age of fourteen in canneries and factories, sixteen in mines, and prohibited night work or a longer day than one of eight hours. In the event that the resolution back of the amendment is passed and sufficient States ratify the measure, it is probable that the first law will be almost identical with those of 1916 and 1919. Surely it is little enough to ask.

Progressivism and the Third Party

ON the 4th of July the Conference for Progressive Political Action will bring together at Cleveland, Ohio, a large and highly important gathering of "progressives" representing officially virtually all of the railroad trade unions and numerous other trade unions also. This gathering will further include a representation—again official—from the Socialist Party and from certain strong organizations of farmers. It will be the largest and strongest effort so far made in the United States to initiate a movement corresponding—in American circumstances and with American differences—to the British Labor Party.

The Conference for Progressive Political Action, as befits a national political organization, has a national committee. From certain members of this committee answers have been received to William Hard's prize-contest question: "What is 'Progressivism'?" These answers The Nation herewith presents to the consideration of its readers.

From the Farmers' Union of Oklahoma:

SIR: Progressivism requires that industry shall be run for service to the many rather than for profit to the few and that the natural resources of the country shall be held for the use and benefit of all of the people rather than for exploitation by individuals. A progressive is not a socialist, who believes that these ends shall be reached through governmental function entirely. He is a co-operator who would solve most of the ills of society through business cooperatives. He nevertheless would probably advocate government ownership and operation of some of the essential industries.

J. B. LAUGHLIN, Bokchito, Oklahoma

From the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor:

DEAR MR. HARD: In the business world men like Ford are progressive as business men while men like Atterbury of the Pennsylvania Railroad are not. Ford's enterprises emerged from a rattling tin can, while on the other hand the Pennsylvania Railroad is degenerating into a tin can. To be a progressive in public life one must be free from entanglements. One must be a graduate from the school of experience. One must serve the interests of the great wealth-producing majority instead of those of the exploiting minority. One must have, above all, the courage of one's convictions. If a man fulfils all these requirements, he may be branded as a dangerous radical, but nevertheless he would be only a progressive.

JAMES H. MAURER, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania

From the Nonpartisan League of South Dakota:

DEAR MR. HARD: Progressivism is that rare attitude of mind which compels the individual possessed of it to the service of truth. Progressivism ignores conventions; laughs at the ridiculous conformity of the unthinking; despises subsidized newspapers, schools, clubs, churches, and officials; hates shams of all kinds. The progressive individual, as a consequence of his revulsion toward existing conditions and accepted standards, makes life's journey alone, misunderstood by the masses and despised by those who reap the richest harvest from the established order. The blood from the wounds of the "progressive" has marked the trail on which mankind has climbed to what it is today.

ALICE LORRAINE DALY, Mitchell, South Dakota

From Labor, the official paper of the American Railroad Trade Unions:

MY DEAR HARD: A progressive is a man who approaches every industrial and political issue from the point of view of the public interest and with a sincere desire to ease the burdens of the men and women who toil. To my mind La Follette is the finest example of progressive statesmanship that we have been privileged to observe in our day. You and I know that in nine cases out of ten we can forecast the position of the great Wisconsin Senator on any issue without taking the trouble to consult him. That is because you and I know that he will seek the people's side of the issue and that his experience and intelligence will enable him to hit the bull's-eye in 90 per cent of the cases.

EDWARD KEATING,
Manager of Labor, Washington, D. C.

From the first Nonpartisan Leaguer elected to Congress:

DEAR MR. HARD: No better definition of progressivism could be found than that made by the new Premier of Great Britain, Ramsay MacDonald, in his victory speech in Albert Hall on January 8, 1924. He said: "One step at a time, but every step leading to the next."

JOHN M. BAER, Washington, D. C.

From the Farmers' National Council:

DEAR MR. HARD: Progressivism is the attitude of mind which leads people to consider all subjects with an open mind, proving all things and holding fast that which is good, whether it be in the economic, political, religious, or philosophical field. Progressivism is usually an acquired instead of an innate characteristic. It is useful as a balance wheel, but it is not a dynamo, for it is not usually based upon overwhelming conviction on any subject. It is merely an attitude of mind. When you ask me—if you ever do—to define what my idea is of what America must do to be saved, I will do it; but I believe the first essential is progressivism, which means the ability to put yourself into the other fellow's shoes.

BENJAMIN MARSH, Washington, D. C.

From the Nonpartisan League of Montana:

DEAR MR. HARD: A progressive is one who recognizes the fact that the past does not fit the present and that the present will not fit the future. He is one who advocates such changes in our social and economic structure as will best serve the interests of a majority of the people now and present the least resistance to ready adjustments to meet coming needs in the future. He is one who is always ready to take one constructive step forward, even if he cannot go the whole distance. He is one who stands on the past that he may reach farther into the future, but does not try to take the past with him.

D. C. DORMAN, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Hard forwards these letters to The Nation with the remark:

It seems fairly clear that the members of the Conference for Progressive Political Action, who will perhaps start a new independent political movement this summer, resemble the managers of our old parties in at least one respect. Confronted with political responsibility, they reserve to themselves in their preliminary communications and observations a complete liberty of choice as to the specific propositions which they will put into their platform. This is perhaps, from the standpoint of the practical success of their new movement, a happy omen.

America in Polynesia*

By PADRAIC COLUM

III. Polynesian Romance

IN the Hawaiian Islands conditions are lamentably like those in certain European countries where separate and interesting cultures are being pushed aside by a culture that is politically and commercially important. In Hawaii there is a great breach in the native tradition, although not nearly as great a breach as there is in present-day Ireland in the Gaelic tradition. I have been in houses where the grandfather or grandmother knew traditional Hawaiian poems (mele) and could chant them in the traditional way, while a son or daughter would be able to translate them, but not able to chant them, and a grandchild would be able neither to chant the poems nor translate them. Once in such a house I went over to see what a little girl, the granddaughter of a lady who had chanted mele to me for about an hour, was studying. This child had not allowed herself to be interrupted either by the chanting of her grandmother or by the translating that her father did for me; she was bent on mastering a lesson in a book that she kept before her—an American school geography. "Stockholm is the capital of Sweden, Vienna is the capital of Austria," was one of the items that kept her absorbed.

I heard many native stories told, some by men, some by women. One of the best story-tellers I came across was a young man whom I met on the island of Molokai. His father was Chinese and he had learned the stories from his grandmother. He told me several. One of them was a story that the Rev. Mr. Ellis notes as having heard on his tour of the islands just a hundred years ago—the story of the rescue of Hina by her son Kana. I discovered that of the stories I knew already from the excellent Fornander Collection of Hawaiian Antiquities and Folk-lore, few lived in the memory of the generation at present in the islands. On the island of Maui I met a distinguished lady who had been at the court of King Kalakaua and who, in her youth, had been a trained story-teller. She tried to give me some of the stories that belonged to her repertoire. But no sooner had she begun than she declared she was no longer familiar with the language in which the stories were told—the stories she had been trained to tell were in the idiom of the Alii, or the chiefs, an idiom that she had not used since her days at court.

What impressed me most in these recitals was the gesture of the story-teller. Every feature, every finger of the man or woman becomes alive, becomes dramatic, as the recital is begun. The gesture of the Hawaiian makes the telling of his story a dramatic entertainment. Scholars have written of the long and monotonous stories told in the old days in Hawaii. The stories were long, but the gesture of the story-teller must have saved them from monotony. I was made to recall again and again that description in Melville's "Typee" of how a genial Marquesan youth entertained the mariner merely by the pantomime he made of getting cocoanuts from a tree. It is a description that gives the spirit in which the unspoiled Polynesian dramatizes his moods and his reactions. Imagine such spontaneous gesture applied to the telling of a story, every incident of which gives rise to gesture. But the gesture in the story recital was not merely spontaneous; it was trained, as was the gesture of the hula or Polynesian ballet. This unconstrained, dramatic movement is now being lost. There is no longer a school for gesture in the hula. And the Hawaiian is checking his impulse toward gesture. It used to be said "Tie an Hawaiian's hands and he can't talk." The older men and women still have that wonderful command of their features and hands—a command that made them the greatest ballet-performers that the world, I believe, has ever had—but the younger generation feel that to use gesture is to be rustic—to be "Kanaka."

There is still among the Hawaiians who live in the old Polynesian way, in villages along the beaches, with the taro-patches near, a great treasury of poetry and native lore. But the newspaper and the victrola are taking up the time and the interest that used to be devoted to poetry, traditional games, riddles, and the like. I have been in cottages where the people still sit and lie on their mats on the floor, ignoring tables, chairs, and beds, and where they eat with their fingers, lifting the poi out of the common bowl. In such houses I have found real scholarship, a delight in poetry, and a possession of such a quantity of it as would shame a cultivated American, Englishman, or Frenchman. But even in such houses I was aware that the tradition was passing. Sitting on the floor around a petroleum lamp, also on the floor, I have spelled out news items in an Hawaiian newspaper that told of the French in the Ruhr and preparations for elections in Ireland.

The world surges in on the Hawaiian Islands. And the Hawaiian can no longer give himself solely to the tradition that bound him to the valleys and mountains, and that knit him to Wakea and Papa, who begat and brought forth the islands and the men and women upon them. That separate tradition which for thousands of years he lived by is being broken up as the surge breaks up the lava on his coast.

The Fornander Collection of Hawaiian Antiquities and Folk-lore forms volumes four, five, and six of the Memoirs of the Bernice Pauahi Bishop Museum of Honolulu. The scholar whose name the collection takes was Abraham Fornander, the author of "The Polynesian Race." He lived on the islands for over forty years. He edited a journal called the Polynesian, and he was superintendent of public instruction on the islands in 1863-1866. He had married an Hawaiian woman, and he was a strong partisan for the native race. At that time there was considerable native scholarship. S. N. Haleole, who made an attempt to found a native literature with his romance "Laielkawai," was writing and publishing. The Mission School in Lahaina-luna on the island of Maui had become a sort of Hawaiian university. Abraham Fornander had the good sense to appeal to native scholars, and he was able to get the best of them to interest themselves in his project for collecting all the native lore that could throw a light on the migrations of the Polynesian people. The Hawaiian monarchy was then in undisputed existence; native institutions were still vigorous; everywhere there were men and women whose memories were stocked with the historical traditions and the romances of Hawaii.

With the help of a corps of native scholars a great deal of the surviving tradition of Hawaii was collected by Fornander. Some of it was published in the Hawaiian newspapers of the time, but no extensive publication was given to it. The manuscripts were kept together; then, on the death of Abraham Fornander in 1867, the collection was acquired by Charles R. Bishop, the husband of Bernice Pauahi, a member of the Hawaiian royalty, whose estate went to the foundation of the Museum of Polynesian Ethnology in Honolulu. Forty years after it had been got together the publication of the material was begun by the Bernice Pauahi Bishop Museum. Although the stories are described in the Museum publications as folk-lore I doubted from the time of my first reading of them that they were folk-lore in the strict sense of the word, that is, I doubted their coming out of an unlearned and popular tradition. The greater number of them seemed to me to be deliberate compositions intended for a rather select audience. And then I found a great master of Hawaiian tradition, Mr. William Hyde Rice, advancing exactly this opinion:

There were bards and story-tellers, either itinerant or attached to the courts of the chiefs, similar to the minstrels and tale-tellers of medieval Europe. These men formed a distinct class, and lived only at the courts of the high chiefs. Accordingly, their stories were heard by none except those people attached to the service of the chiefs.

This traditional literature is based on material common to the whole Polynesian area. "We find," says Miss Martha Warren Beckwith, in her valuable introduction to "The Romance of Lailikawai," "the same story told in New Zealand and Hawaii, scarcely changed, even in name."

The Polynesians, so like us physically, have in their romances none of the familiar veins that one can discover in, let us say, the folk-tales of the darker peoples in the lands around India. You will not find in their romance that widespread story of the young man who comes seeking a king's or an enchanter's daughter and who has to perform a certain number of tasks to win her. You will not find the story of the child who is hidden away and who comes back a triumphant hero to the land that his father had ruled over. In Polynesia we find no romance based on formulae familiar to us. Only occasionally does a helping creature appear. There are practically no animal stories, for the sufficient reason that the Polynesian did not have opportunities for forming a wide animal acquaintanceship; he brought the pig and the dog to the islands with him, and the shark and the turtle, the owl and the plover were the only creatures that he had even a curiosity about. Even the way of counting things is changed when we get into Polynesian romance: instead of three, seven, and nine, we have four, eight, and sixteen for the cabalistic numbers.

And yet, as all human desire is the same and as human mentality compels a certain likeness of incident, and since there seem to be patterns in incident that all human beings find it delightful to work out, the Polynesian stories have the elements and the combination of elements that make fine narrative. Often the Polynesian story-teller rediscovered a formula that we have used to make a memorable tale. Thus one story in the Fornander Collection will recall the Cinderella story and another will recall the stories of men who have traveled far and have returned to their own land—Odysseus or Oisín or Rip Van Winkle. In the folk-romance and in the mythological stories of Europe there are places that may not be entered, and there are women whom a man must not approach. There is Blue Beard's chamber, there is Danaë, and there is the Eithlinn of Celtic mythology. Polynesian romance also has places that may not be entered and women who must not be approached by men. And it has them in almost every story. Indeed, without the guarded maiden and the forbidden place a Polynesian story-teller would find it difficult to carry on. And when he was dealing with one or the other we know he was dealing with the life that was around him: the place was tapu, the maiden was tapu. And the place or the maiden was tapu simply because a king or a chief with the privilege of declaring tapu had so declared it.*

When we read certain of the Polynesian stories we can easily see how, as the simplicity of tapu was forgotten, the maiden would be given a fantastic security like Danaë in her brazen tower or like Eithlinn in her inaccessible island, and we can see how a motive would be manufactured for keeping the maiden apart: Danaë's son and Eithlinn's son are destined to slay their grandfathers. Every race has had tapu. But the Polynesians held to it and made it their single discipline. In their stories we are at the very beginning of a romance that for Europeans has grown to be fraught with magic and mystery.

The bulk of Hawaiian romance consists of stories about the demi-gods—the kupua—beings descended from the gods or adopted or endowed by them. But these legendary tales reflect actual Polynesian conditions. Says Miss Beckwith:

Gods and men are, in fact, to the Polynesian mind, one family under different forms, the gods having superior control over certain phenomena, a control which they can impart to their offspring on earth. . . . The supernatural blends with the natural in exactly the same way as to the Polynesian mind gods relate themselves to men, facts about one being regarded as, even though removed to the heavens, quite as objective as those which belong to the other, and being employed to explain social customs and physical appearances in actual experience.

In Hawaiian romance there is a feeling that is rare in any body of popular European romance—a feeling for the beauty of nature, for flowers and trees, the aspect of the clouds, the look of the sea, the sight of mountains, a feeling for the beauty of the rainbow and the waterfall. And there are special words in Hawaiian—in the literary language—for aspects of nature that are hardly perceptible to us. To be true in any measure to the originals the retelling of Hawaiian stories should have in them the rainbow and the waterfall, the volcano, the forest, the surf as it foams over the reefs of coral. In the hula and in the poetry that is related to the hula, there is always an idyllic feeling. This feeling pervades Hawaiian romance also. The scene of many of the stories, when not laid in lands that are frankly mythical, is laid in an Hawaiian Arcadia. These lands of Hawaiian story are indeed memorable—Kuai-he-lani, the Country that Supports the Heavens, and Paliuli, the easeful land that the gods have since hidden.

* Written "kapu" in Hawaiian and "taboo" by the mariners who came first among the Polynesians. Tapu is the preferred form. Its meaning is not merely "forbidden"; the word means "sacred," "inviolable," "belonging to the gods."

Who would not roam through them with those who first told of them and those who first heard of them—the gracious and vivid children of Wakea and Papa?

The most famous of Hawaiian stories is the one that recounts the adventures of Aukele. Like most of the heroes of Polynesian romance Aukele is really a demi-god. His father rules over Ku-ai-he-lani, and he is the youngest of his family.

His brothers are jealous of Aukele and they plot against him. There is a lizard-grandmother who lives at the bottom of a cave; they throw Aukele down to her in the belief that she will destroy the stranger. But she recognizes him as her grandson and she gives him her magical possessions—a god (man makes his gods in Polynesia), a leaf that will allay hunger and thirst, an ax and a knife, her own tail, which has the strength of her body; her feather skirt, and a standard the shaking of which will reduce his enemies to ashes. With these possessions Aukele joins his brothers on one of those voyages which for the Hawaiian story-teller must be a reminiscence of the great voyages which led to the dispersal of the Polynesian people and the discovery of the far-flung islands. The food gives out, but Aukele keeps his brothers alive with the magical leaf. They come to a land that is ruled over by an enchantress-queen, and the recklessness of the brothers causes the destruction of themselves with their ship. Aukele, warned by his god, escapes; prompted by the god he is able to tell the queen's attendants and the queen's brothers their names, and this overwhelms them with fear and confusion. Ultimately he marries the queen, who has the moon for her grandfather and the thunder-and-lightning bolt for her uncle. She teaches Aukele all her magical science.

After that the hero starts on the quest that is distinctively Polynesian, the quest for the Water of Life Everlasting, the Water of Kane, for he wants to bring his brothers back to life. On his first journey he falls into space and he has to cling to the moon for support. He starts off again and this time he reaches the deep pit at the bottom of which is the Water of Life Everlasting. He secures some of it, but is pursued by the guardian of the water; for a year and six months he is pursued, but at last he wins back to his wife's country, and with the water he restores his brothers to life.

Then Aukele gives up to his brothers not only his possessions but his wife and he lives as a humble fisherman. He meets Pele and her sister and there is a love affair between the man and the two women. The queen discovers it and drives Aukele from her country. He is longing now to see his own country again and he goes back to Ku-ai-he-lani. There is no trace of his father there nor of the places he knew. He descends into the cave to speak with his lizard-grandmother. She is there, but she is partly overgrown with coral. Time has destroyed all and has left the returned hero alone. There is a solemnity in the end of this famous story that is rare in Polynesian romance. It makes one think of that chant that Melville heard the aged Tahitians give "in a low, sad tone":

A harree ta fow,
A toro ta farraro,
A now ta tararta.
The palm-tree shall grow,
The coral shall spread,
But man shall cease.

The One Immediate Reform

By WILLIAM HARD

THE Senate is criticized for investigating too much and legislating too little. This criticism, if the present writer may express his view, is based on a superficial appreciation of the situation. In present circumstances the Senate, if it wishes to do its full duty as a part of the legislative branch of the government, must investigate exorbitantly. It must inform itself before it can legislate. In present circumstances its only method of informing itself regarding the operations of the executive branch is through formal and protracted inquiries submitted to the executive branch through resolutions or through investigating committees.

Both of these methods—the resolution asking for information and the investigating committee probing for information—are tedious. They consume an enormous amount of time. Also, they yield imperfect results. They nevertheless in present circumstances are the only established methods by which the legislative branch can and does gain from the executive branch the information which for its legislative purposes it needs from the executive branch.

The situation is that the national legislature, in order to do its legislative duty, must know the performances and the policies of the executive departments. The situation further is that the only established methods of gaining that knowledge are the method of inquiry by resolution and the method of inquiry by committee. The situation finally is that the method of inquiry by resolution yields results which are narrow and unenlightening and the method of inquiry by committee yields results which are deplorably time-consuming.

Moreover, these present methods of eliciting information from the executive departments put them at once on the defensive. They put them at once into a posture of hostility to the national legislature. The outcome is that the executive departments thereupon tend to give to the national legislature the minimum of information that can be corkscrewed or thumbscrewed out of them.

Finally, since every present inquiry by the legislature, whether through resolution or through committee, is regarded as an attack upon the executive, it follows that the department concerned is at once thrown into a panic and at once tends to give up its customary administrative work in order to devote itself to the work of self-defense and of personal and departmental exoneration.

Such are the detailed technical evils of the existing state of things. A profound general evil—governmentally devastating in its character—is yet to be mentioned.

The tenuous and difficult channels of communication between the executive and the legislative bring it about that the executive falls into errors which the legislative corrects only too tardily, while the legislative, on the other hand, often fails through ignorance to give support to the executive in measures which may be of the highest value to the republic.

During many months, for instance, the Interior Department under Mr. Fall continued to pursue policies which the legislative branch of the government suspected of being erroneous, but which through imperfect information it could not know to be erroneous and could not and did not check.

Similarly, for months, and even for years, the legislative branch of the government has failed to give support to certain excellent ideas of Secretary of State Hughes regarding the settlement of Europe for the simple reason that the legislative branch does not know those ideas and, not knowing them, cannot give them the support and the victorious backing of the elected representatives of the American people.

With evils so numerous and so patent in the existing arrangement of affairs, it would seem that the Senate would devote itself to finding a continuous means of correcting them or at any rate of mitigating them. The true criticism of the Senate is not to be expressed by saying that it investigates too much and legislates too little. The true criticism of it is rather to be expressed by saying that while its passion for getting information is admirable it fails to adopt the one clear simple reform which would enable it to get that information while still attending steadily to its daily legislative duties.

This reform was in principle partially prognosticated when in the very first year of the history of the Republic the Congress provided that "the Secretary of the Treasury shall give information to either branch of the legislature in person or in writing as may be required."

The essential words were the words "in person."

The Secretary of the Treasury at that time was Alexander Hamilton. Fearing his power of argument, the Congress did not act upon its own law and refused to permit him to appear before it "in person." The fear of the formidable argumentative eloquence of Alexander Hamilton wrenched the purpose of Congress from its original intention and perverted the whole subsequent course of the relations between the legislative and the executive in the United States.

Since that time there have been two great historic outbreaks of effort to bring the legislative and the executive into closer relations in the United States through placing members of the Cabinet on the floor of Congress to answer interrogatories personally and immediately.

The first of these is associated with the name of a statesman then extremely famous and now almost forgotten—George H. Pendleton of Ohio, commonly called "Gentleman George," who in 1864 was a member of the House of Representatives and in 1879 was a member of the Senate.

In both years he introduced bills which provided that on certain named days of the week the heads of executive departments would have to appear in the House of Representatives and in the Senate "to give information in reply to questions." His bills led to reports, first by a committee of the House and then by a committee of the Senate, which were signed by some of the most distinguished political personages of those days and which favored Mr. Pendleton's proposition in arguments which have never been excelled and which have never been refuted.

The second outbreak of effort in this direction began under the administration of William Howard Taft and has continued to the present time with bills introduced into Congress by Representative Montague of Virginia, Representative Kelly of Pennsylvania, Representative Mooney of Ohio, Senator McLean of Connecticut, and (in this present session of Congress) Senator Couzens of Michigan.

All these bills provide in essence precisely what was provided by the bills originally introduced by Mr. Pendleton. The history of the matter has been put into a luminous statement by Mr. James Brown Scott, secretary of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

The fight in this matter in this session of Congress will center around the bill by Senator Couzens. The saddening feature of the situation is that to call it a fight is to do it too much honor. People do not fight the idea which through Senator Couzens is now again brought forward. They do not fight it. They simply do nothing at all about it.

Year after year and decade after decade and generation after generation the members of the American Congress go into time-consuming and legislation-delaying investigations, which for the most part merely shut the barn-door after the horse is stolen, when by making the members of the Cabinet appear personally before them on stated days to inform them immediately and continuously regarding executive policies and performances they could ride the horse into instant, effective action.

This is the true basis for proper criticism of the Senate in its present passion for belated inquiry and in its present lack of passion for getting the inquiry done beforehand when it would genuinely do the most good.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has completed the one-hundred-and-eighty-seventh canto of his income-tax epic and finished his Inferno. He hated to separate himself from his hard-earned shekels. But it is a consolation to think that $8.43 of honest money will go toward paying the salary and the "expense account" of the Honorable Burns, whose address is care of Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

* * * * *

THE Drifter does not always approve of Poincaré's overtures to Germany and he can not invariably follow the French people in everything they do in the Ruhr and in the Palatinate, but he does have a profound admiration for the subtleties of the Gallic mind and sincerely admires the delicate propaganda of the Parisian authorities. Look at the decision of M. Poincaré to bestow a golden medal upon the charming and accomplished young actress who plays the part of Joan of Arc in a New York City theater. It must please the martyred saint. Undoubtedly it has caused great joy to the deserving recipient of so high an honor, which she shares with the Pope and with Marshal Foch. And it has strengthened the ties which bind our own republic to the glories of Gaul.

AND all this has been accomplished at an outlay of ten or twenty francs for colored ribbon and a bit of engraved metal. But why, the Drifter has asked himself, must it always be France ("elle, elle, toujours elle!") which happens to think of such polite but agreeable trivialities? What are the other countries doing? Take the case of Denmark. There, oh, my friends, was a chance for the Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glücksburgers to do something for international amity and to show that the Dannebrog still flies from Helsingör's battlements. Is there a more fitting reward for a successful Hamlet than the Order of the Elephant? Why not divide it into four classes so that both the Hackett and the Ham may receive their just rewards? What has Holland been doing all these years? Who ever heard of a successful Rip disporting the multi-colored ribbon of the very tame Dutch Lion? What Macbeth ever was made a Knight of the Thistle? Were the Hohenzollerns asleep when Weber and Fields were alive, and would not a Black and a Red Eagle have been a most suitable reward for these humble workers in Teutschum's neglected vineyard? Would not Turkey's Order of Chastity (even a second class) have made the Caliph some very fast friends among the actresses called upon to portray the soulful heroine of A. Dumas fils' great drama? Have we no Congressional Medal of Honor for the man who first dares to translate "Abie's Irish Rose" into French? It is a sad subject of neglected opportunities.

* * * * *

AND even now the Drifter feels that he has been rash. Suppose that this article should be read by the Minister of Bulgaria. He might advise his Government to bestow the Order of Saint Methodius upon that citizen of our great republic who has actually managed to work his way through an income-tax blank.

America and World Reconstruction

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have received the following letter from E. D. Morel, Labor M. P., editor of British Foreign Affairs, and founder and secretary of the Union of Democratic Control, in answer to my question What is the best way America can help in world reconstruction:

America can best help to save the world from further catastrophe by initiating, or cooperating with Great Britain in suggesting, a world conference for the purpose of:

1. Enabling the German people to resume a national life free from external interference, and to recover financially and economically.

2. Securing a wide measure of disarmament among all the nations in every branch of war organization.

3. Abolishing the private manufacture of armaments.

4. Establishing a scientific rationing of the world's raw materials in order to prevent imperialist economies, especially in particularly weak or uncivilized communities.

5. Creating, either through the existing League of Nations strengthened and reformed, or through some other medium, an international mechanism designed to be a substitution for the institution of war, and to examine with impartiality the economic, political, and racial problem of all states with a view to providing for their respective needs without their being driven to war in the attempt to secure them.

6. Recognizing Russia.

7. Insuring the neutralization, on some such plans as that laid down in "Africa and the Peace of Europe" and in "The Black Man's Burden," of the greater part of Africa, including also the tropical regions; and abolishing the militarization of Africa.

America can convince herself, if she chooses, that the British Government now in power is not an imperialist government; but is sincerely and deeply anxious to start a new chapter in the history of international relationships. Its capacity to do so depends in large measure upon American action, or inaction. The best in America and the best in Britain associated officially and unofficially in the unselfish task of preparing a new and better future for humanity can change the face of the world.

A Plea for Skepticism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am one of a few thousand students graduating this month from high schools in this city. In my own school I find myself one of few who have any interests on earth other than their all-absorbing unidealistic lives. It is doubtless natural that at this age our own existence should be the center of our thoughts and plans. But the deplorable fact seems to be that most of us are as devoid of any vision or idea of wider social responsibility as are the majority of our parents.

Youth, it is said, is the time of illusions and optimism. I have frequently been led to discuss some event of international moment, some ethical code, with various of my fellow-students. For the most part I have been dismally rebuffed. Some just dismissed my thoughts with a word—radical or impractical. Others have listened. They agreed not only to the need of metaphysics in our lives, but to the need of original thought and action as well. They acknowledged that many of our hoary institutions need revising for modern life and its concepts. But, alas, no sooner had we discussed some specific ill and meditated on reform than my friends suddenly realized what it meant, and hoarsely whispered "But that's communism." And there their idealism ended.

I should like to know what the editors and others think about the matter. Are most young people as narrow as I have found? Can we work through the high schools themselves, trying to inculcate at least some skepticism? Later we seem no better off. Some are lost in the vortex of the business world with its single canon. College seems no better. And even if higher education attempted to stimulate thought, would it not even then be rather late?

To me the high school seems the proper place to begin, but with our hide-bound educational mold—how?

The Price of English Books

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On inquiring at Brentano's the other day for the 1924 edition of the English "Who's Who," I was told that its retail price here was $15. In England it is being sold at 42 shillings, which, according to the rate of exchange at the time I made my inquiry, amounts to rather less than $9. What is the explanation of the $6 discrepancy? Is it tariff, or carriage, or what?

HERBERT W. HORWILL

A Hint from Moscow

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Brothers Hughes and Coolidge have every reason to feel no end of regret that the recent oil unpleasantness in America didn't come to light before their recent long-distance interchange of ideas with Mr. Chicherin. It would certainly have added many cubits to the height of the moral platform from which they like to admonish the Soviet sinners.

When the gifted Mr. Harry F. Sinclair came to Russia last summer he encountered a standard of official morality which must have impressed him by its painful contrast with that to which he was accustomed at home. His proposal for a concession for exploiting the oil resources of Baku and Grozny was met not with a whispered suggestion that he split up a million or two among influential Commissars but with a demand for a preliminary loan of $250,000,000, to be expended for the benefit of the Russian people. Hereupon Mr. Sinclair seems to have unobtrusively faded from the picture. I suggest that this incident offers a good text for Brother Hughes's next sermon on comparative national morality.

Barataria Way

By BASIL THOMPSON

The lights along the bayou dart so and glitter,
And the ghosts about the bayou flitter, flitter;
There is little glamor to a great wide stream
But the glamor of a bayou sets a man to dream.

The ghosts about the bayou are the shades of buccaneers
Visiting their old haunts and musing on the years
When a pirate was a gentleman, a captain, and a king,
And not a mere pale ghost gone visiting.

Silent dark Cajan men along Barataria
Warn you of swamps and mosquitoes and malaria;
Cajan men tell you, if they chance to know,
That Lafitte kept an island-hold here long ago;

Cajan men tell you that a treasure-trove
Lies beneath a cypress near this cove—
You smile knowing treasures are not found
By digging, digging like gnomes underground.

For him with the eye or the temper, as you will,
There are treasure-troves here to his fancy's fill:
The weird lights' gold and the silver-heavy dew
And the stars' cold diamonds in the still bayou—

And the ghosts, and the ghosts of the buccaneers
Visiting their old haunts and dreaming of the years
When a pirate was a gentleman, a captain, and a king,
And not a skinny pale ghost gone haunting.

American Imperialism

Hispanic-American Relations with the United States. By William Spence Robertson. Oxford University Press. $4.

Economic Imperialism and International Relations During the Last Fifty Years. By Achille Viallate. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Die Ausbreitungspolitik der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika. Von Emil Kimpen. Stuttgart-Berlin: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt.

A N American, a Frenchman, and a German put on their historical spectacles and look at American imperialism; what do they see?

Mr. Robertson's knowledge of his field is encyclopedic; his industriousness is overwhelming. He has pored over the contemporary files of newspapers of a score of South American cities and discovered how little interest the proclamation of the Monroe Doctrine excited in that continent; he knows that the United States showed singularly little sympathy with the South American struggle for freedom until it was completed, and that we were not the first to recognize the independence of the new republics; he has trailed an extraordinary variety of faint North American influences through the South American archives, and he writes intimately of recent developments in commercial intercourse and industrial exploitation. He is perfectly well aware of the Latin-American attitude toward our recent policy, but, as becomes a professor whose work is published by the Carnegie Endowment, he puts it with appropriate caution:

During the present century [he says] the United States has developed a special interest in Nicaragua, Panama, Cuba, and the republics upon the island of Santo Domingo, an interest which has induced careful students to declare that she exercises a protectorate over those nations. That relation has been viewed with increasing concern by some statesmen of Hispanic America.

And there the chapter on The Monroe Doctrine and Intervention ends. Discretion could hardly go further. From his invaluable material Mr. Robertson seems afraid to draw conclusions. He writes about imperialism but he avoids the word.

Achille Viallate, professor at the Ecole des Sciences Politiques in Paris, lectured at Williamstown in the summer of 1921, and his lectures are here tardily assembled. He has the historian's analytic imagination. He points out that the industrialization of Western Europe made the old slogan, trade follows the flag, an anachronism; today trade follows capital, and the flag is likely to follow trade. Commerce has yielded the king-role to finance. We in America are entering the same stage. Our recent commercial expansion in Latin America and the Far East is to him akin to the commercial development that divided Africa among the Great Powers and created the pre-war rivalries. He dwells upon the intimate relation between foreign financing and the foreign policy of European nations, and hints, as a courteous guest might, that the insistence of our Department of State that it be informed, "in view of the possible national interests involved," before foreign bonds are floated in American markets, is part and parcel of the old system. After a brilliant analysis of the pre-war period, M. Viallate sinks into a halting mixture of politics and history in his remarks on the war, and concludes pathetically that we must hope for economic internationalism, but—not too much.

Emil Kimpen's book is four hundred pages of documented evidence showing that the North Americans have ever been ruthlessly expansive, territory-grabbing people. His is throughout an economic interpretation. Mr. Hirshfield and other ancestor-worshippers would not like it, but this book ought to be translated and made required reading for all senators, congressmen, and secretaries of state. He calls the Louisiana Purchase a forced sale, and the annexation of Florida the work of filibusterers and freebooters, accompanied by atrocious Indian wars; the Monroe Doctrine, he points out, was in large part a product of fear of Russian expansion in northwest North America; Jefferson and John Quincy Adams planned the annexation of Cuba; the Indian wars were pure imperialism, the annexation of Texas barefaced robbery; only British opposition kept us from expanding in the Caribbean in the succeeding half-century; the Spanish-American War was a thinly veiled war of annexation, and dollar diplomacy has guided us ever since. The picture is often overdrawn, but it is bountifully equipped with detail and evidence. Its German author naturally comments on the fact that the Haitian treaty of 1915-16 was negotiated "at a time when Americans were denouncing Germany's seizure of Belgium." His is a picture of America as others are coming to see us.

We, with 6 per cent of the population and 7 per cent of the land of the world, produce 20 per cent of its gold, 25 per cent of its wheat, 40 per cent of its iron and steel, 52 per cent of its coal, 60 per cent of its copper and of its cotton, and 66 per cent of its oil; but we are not satisfied. We are buying up the undeveloped wealth of other countries—an old, old story. We, who before the war exported but a few score millions of dollars a year, are now investing in Latin America alone at the rate of a quarter of a billion dollars a year. It is very well for the Robertsons to preach friendly and respectful relations with Latin Americans; we might even ignore a Kimpen's sneer; but Professor Viallate's analysis indicates that this unnoticed quarter-billion a year is molding without our knowing it the destiny of the coming generation of Americans. While our eyes are fixed on Europe's fate, our own fate is being fixed for us.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

The Importance of Being Critical

An Introduction to Reflective Thinking. By Columbia Associates in Philosophy: Laurence Buermeyer, William Forbes Cooley, John J. Coss, Horace L. Friess, James Gutmann, Thomas Munro, Houston Peterson, John H. Randall, Jr., Herbert W. Schneider. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THIS set of studies inaugurates a venture of significance and promise. It presents a course in logic by way of a free discussion of examples of reflective thinking. These are drawn from the history of the sciences—astronomy, mathematics, physics, biology—and followed by applications to modern problems in law and ethics, in Biblical criticism, in social and political policies. The project is further available for the reflective portion of the public as an enforcement of the importance of being critical—a lesson of peculiar timeliness in these reconstructive days.

The technique of thinking is of paramount human concern, the more so as it is exercised upon two orders of control upon which depend all the issues of civilization. The first is the solution of problems leading to invention and the control of physical forces; the second the far more difficult art of applying the same order of knowledge, the same animus of inquiry, to the social forces conditioning the values of human living. In the first reference a few epoch-making "intellectual events"—high-water records of reflective thinking—are surveyed and the benefits in control thus resulting convincingly demonstrated. Lesson one concerns diagnosis and sets forth not only how but why a patient presenting certain symptoms would be differently examined and differently treated in ancient Egypt and modern Massachusetts. Lesson two states lucidly as a matter of logic why Copernicus replaced Ptolemy, and though planetary orbits seem remote to the issues of modern life, the proper solution of both depends upon the same ability to choose wisely between rival hypotheses. Lesson three contrasts the strange and barren explanations of life as "spontaneous generation" with the severely critical and fruitful researches of Pasteur, again attaining the truth because his logical method focused rightly. Lesson four analyzes why the method of Pythagoras, proving his theorem, surpasses that of the "rope stretchers" (surveyors) of the Nile, who were able to lay out a right angle by means of a rope sectioned in the relations of three, four, and five. Lesson five distinguishes by various enforcements the difference between real and verbal, genuine and fictitious explanations. Lesson six contrasts "special creation" with "evolution" as a working hypothesis and shows why the one works better than the other, enriching the world of belief and control in increasing waves of insight.

The lessons continue; but the emphasis shifts with the transfer to the social field and the increasing play of the concept of value. The backwardness of the social sciences is inherent in the encounter of reflective thinking with such disturbing forces as tradition, prejudice, interest, and the more subtle intellectual resistances which make progress a line of uncertain direction, and the tracing "of any pattern in the warp and woof of man's social experience" a task of insight and conjecture. Yet for the central purpose of enforcing the importance of being critical, this vaguer and more controversial field is as richly illustrative of the quality of sound thinking as is the better triangulated domain of the physical sciences. Ethics, law, political and economic policy, social control in general, offer the preferred field of controversy; the case of individualism versus collectivism is well utilized to enforce the same lesson that clarification of the issues and an appreciation of the underlying data constitute the first step in every objective inquiry. Though decisions shade into opinions and measurements into estimates, the spirit of inquiry is the same; and qualities of thinking, though more closely affiliated to qualities of character, retain their rating in the critical and the value scale. There is quoted with approval the optimistic prediction of Mr. Wells that "the new and higher quality of attitude and gesture, a veracity, a self-detachment, and self-abnegating vigor of criticism" characteristic of the best in science "must ultimately spread out to every other human affair."

The purpose of the book, which is "to add another dimension to our consciousness of science, namely, an understanding of its processes," is ably accomplished. The incidental opportunities provided by the byways rather than the highways of reflective thinking are by no means neglected, though they are not so well exploited as is desirable in a project with so practical an intent to teach the young idea how to shoot. How not to shoot is also a dramatic story. The history of error and fallacy is replete with pointed morals, no less apposite in days when schoolboys know vastly more than Aristotles of other times. Superstitions may be feeble in vitality, and pseudo-sciences flourish mainly in waste places, though easily found without a flashlight in every metropolis; but loose thinking and a hospitable inclination to beliefs that play havoc with rationality are the rule and not the exception. The lowest level is doubtless reached in the political arena where oratory and an emotional appeal conveniently mask the poverty of grasp and provincial limitations of insight. But politics is not unique in making strange thought-fellows. Ignorance is more readily relieved than folly, and folly is less destructive to intellectual values than the prejudiced and time-serving shrewdness that prevents a fair way of meeting the living issues from becoming a far fairer way. Standards of thinking require elevation even more urgently than standards of living.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Metaphors and Men

Poetic Imagery Illustrated from Elizabethan Literature. By Henry W. Wells. Columbia University Press. $1.75.

THIS is one of the rare books about poetry which are worth reading by poets, for it tells them many things about their art which they did not suppose could be put into prose, and these things gain both in clarity and importance by the telling. Mr. Wells begins with the very modest, practical desire to explain what happens when a poet breaks into imagery. "A poem may be considered as a manuscript sprinkled with phrases rapidly written in shorthand. These phrases represent the metaphors, which are moments in which the poet's imagination is working with the utmost speed." The approach, in other words, is not rhetorical but imaginative. Mr. Wells nowhere assumes that figures of speech are tricks which the calculating artist plays upon his reader; they are the spontaneous result of his most active and happy mind. It is with the mind that Mr. Wells both starts and finishes.

This brings him at once into contact with the spirit of the age whose poetry he has for purposes of convenience settled upon for study. "Poetic imagery has been discussed as though it were a distinctly literary matter, like a point in dramatic technique, and not an element in the very air we breathe." For Mr. Wells metaphors are explicable only in the light of "religion, philosophy, idealism, and humor." "When it is difficult to form a judgment from a mass of evidence, a mannerism may give the desired clue. So narrow and precise a rule as metaphorical study affords may still be of assistance in measuring the minds and hearts of men." Mr. Wells has confined his researches to Elizabethan writers because they were by instinct highly figurative, frequently perpetrated bad images as well as good ones, dominated a large intellectual scene, and culminated in Shakespeare. And he fulfils his bold initial promise by analyzing the temperaments of eight men through an analysis of the figures which they preferred. But it is clear that his reading extends as far as poetry has been written, and indeed he rather furtively expresses a hope that poets in the twentieth century will learn something of effectiveness from his pages.

Mr. Wells's classification of images begins where that of the classical rhetoricians left off. He sweeps aside the whole system of Greek and Latin nomenclature which never meant anything anyway and proceeds to describe the imagery which he finds in terms of its imaginative value, digging back when possible to the springs in the mind whence it came, but at any rate taking pains to define its exact effect upon the reader. His terminology is simple, picturesque, and new, and there is no reason why it should not become standard—except, of course, that it is so subtle as to require a fine set of faculties for its application. Mr. Wells, to be brief, differentiates eight kinds of image. The Decorative Image, illustrated best by Sidney, is cool, ingenious, extravagant, pretty, and comparatively impotent. The Sunken Image of Daniel has metaphorical meaning but only hints at a picture; it "invigorates, elevates, and ennobles" without exciting the eye. The Violent Image, or the Figure of Fustian, found most clearly in Kyd, is "the melodrama of metaphor, where less is meant than meets the ear." The Radical Image of Donne—and incidentally of many a modern poet—stabs beauty into the commonplace, sending for a moment "the breath of poetry over charred wood and frozen loam." The Intensive Image of Spenser "is associated with ritual and the pictorial arts, and is characterized by dignity, conventionality, beauty, and clarity." The Expansive Image of Bacon "may be compared to the flying buttresses of a Gothic cathedral which are a support as well as an adornment"; it opens a wide range of suggestion and is superior to space or time. The Exuberant Image of Marlowe is energetic, impressionistic, intoxicating, and vague. The Image of Wit and Humor, represented by Nash, varies all the way from the "incisive, critical metaphor of wit" to the "image of Gothic humor, sensuous, grotesque, pregnant, and unlicked"—the latter sometimes hiding under its uncouth cloak a troupe of fanciful "fairies playing on a homely hearth." Shakespeare excels in all these eight, but he is supreme in the Sunken Image and the Expansive Image.

Enough has been quoted from Mr. Wells to prove that he has every right to be treading where he does; he writes like a poet himself. Condensed and careful as he invariably is, he often steals into metaphor because there is no other way to advance his thought. He is sensitive, witty, and sound—a friend to poets and a vindicator of university scholarship.

MARK VAN DOREN

Romance

Blindness of Heart. By Violet Colquhoun Bell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Nor All Thy Tears. By C. Nina Boyle. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

THESE two romantic novels, so unlike each other, so wholly without any discoverable common denominator, tempt one to a revaluation of the ambiguous term romance, or rather a recapitulation of the successive meanings that have attached themselves to it. For romantic is a chameleon adjective which may mean "something partaking of the heroic, marvelous, imaginative, chimerical, fanciful, extravagantly enthusiastic," although the imaginative is not necessarily the heroic or the chimerical, which may mean a dreamy habit of mind, or a disposition to ignore facts. Yet romantic writers have often been distinguished by their efforts to get back to real things. Imagination, the romantics seemed to say, is not necessarily an ignoring of what is real. It may instead lead to the rediscovery of the real under its deceptive coverings. And so a romantic novel may be a wonder tale for grown-up children, it may be a confection put together to make us forget for the moment life as it is, it may, like most of our popular novels, be a species of wish-fulfilment, or it may conceivably lead us out of the naturalistic Sahara in which we are now supposed to be sojourning to the perception of new verities.

Miss Bell evidently sees her book in the last role, though she has loaded her airy craft with the oddest freight. With hate, for instance. Hatred of all the ideas that pass muster as new, of the new woman, and specifically of her two women villains who are far from new, and whom she hates so realistically that she has found it necessary to add a note to the first page stating that all names and characters in the book are purely imaginary. The style in which she conducts her romantic junket is a cross between the blarneying of a jaunty side-show barker and a sophistication so complete and superior as to leave one gasping, while the somewhat halting and disjointed journey proceeds to the accompaniment of reflections and asseverations that might almost be supposed to scare romance into the most remote of his native glens. The book has the requisite objects of hero-worship—a doll-like woman and Man in the abstract.

... one reflects that in general a man pursues a woman for the purpose of giving, but a woman almost invariably pursues a man for the purpose of taking. . . . The struggle between the sexes is curious and most interesting. I am convinced that it has this complexity, that although the influence of men on women is to make them worse, the influence of women upon men is to make them better.

Poor romance! And it fares even more hardly at Miss Boyle's hands, although her book has about it a refreshing genuineness of emotion, and not a little perception of the complexities and beauty of life. But the exigencies of her plot demanded that romance should be linked with intrigue and scandal, and one feels one ought to feel that the melancholy solitude to which the eminently sociable heroine condemns herself is a just retribution upon her for having been gay and light-hearted and kind to everyone in her youth, and for having been the daughter of a woman who never had a wedding certificate. Just which was her sin we are not sure, but we are sure that retribution is on the boards, and our flesh creeps as we look at Fate and Destiny and listen to the churning of the dark tides.

In fact, the book is almost as good fun as a movie, after a particularly heavy meal. But as to romance, the romance of Spenser and Novalis and Rousseau and Coleridge and Shelley—it is pedantic, of course, to mention it or to speculate as I have on the meaning of a conveniently catholic term.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Living Art for Americans

Living Art. Twenty Facsimile Reproductions After Paintings, Drawings, and Engravings and Ten Photographs After Sculpture by Contemporary Artists. The Dial Publishing Company. $60.

MR. SCOFIELD THAYER has undertaken a responsibility that American museum directors, practically without exception, have shirked. He has endeavored to make available for people who are interested examples of vital contemporary work in painting, draftsmanship, and sculpture. The fruit of his endeavors and of two years of international collaboration is a large portfolio of handsome facsimiles, twenty in color and line, and ten photogravures from sculpture. Credit for this enterprise should be shared by Germany and America. Only in Germany and on German presses could such color work have been achieved; and it is the American work reproduced in the portfolio which is preeminent.

Had there been no other reproduction than that of John Marin's 1921 water color, "Lower Manhattan," the enterprise would have been fully justified. This late, characteristic, and powerful example, by a man increasingly spoken and written about, is now made available for the public, who have had no opportunity to see his work except for a few weeks each year during his exhibition; and museum directors are enabled to repair their neglect by acquiring an excellent reproduction.

It is too bad that Marin is represented by one example only, and that one a city water color, to the neglect of the poet of nature, of trees and rocks, and the coast of Maine. Picasso is honored by having four of his pieces reproduced. Three of the Picassos are early, the latest dating from 1906, and one of them, in tempera, neither strengthens the portfolio nor adds to the impression of the artist. Only a line drawing represents the Picasso of the years since 1906. But why four Picassos, when the major American water colorist and Demuth are represented only once and when such a distinguished painter as Marsden Hartley is not included at all?

Though this portfolio is an American undertaking, and offers an opportunity similar to the Dial prize for distinguishing fine American work, yet the hardihood necessary to affirm the preeminence of Americans in the arts seems to have been lacking. Among the women there is an even greater disparity than among the men. The American, Georgia O'Keeffe, is not represented, although there is a reproduction from a colored drawing of Marie Laurencin, a Frenchwoman, of by no means the American's power and range, as evidenced by the work of both women shown in New York within the year.

These are omissions subject to a criticism which must disregard the personal preference of the editor of the portfolio. For he states his purpose to have been "... to bring together examples of the best and most characteristic work of the leading artists of our time: thus to facilitate comparison of their individual virtues and appraisal of the virtue of this contemporary movement as a whole ..." In the light of this admirable intention American painting hardly seems to have received opportunity for fair comparison.

On the merits of the work itself there could be no imperative necessity for reproducing an unimportant drawing of Wyndham Lewis and an unimportant water color of Duncan Grant, both Englishmen. Even the two Frenchmen, Bonnard and Matisse—for whom Mr. Thayer made an exception to his rule of not attempting to reproduce oil paintings—might have been omitted from the portfolio without damage. Bonnard does not belong in the portfolio in the sense of his representing the active spirit of today. The Matisse reproduced is not important. Bracque, Picasso's coworker, who is omitted, might well have been included in place of either or both of these.

In the sculpture section one is glad to see the two photographs, front and back view, of Gaston Lachaise's monumental recumbent woman, "La Montagne." But here again it is the American work which interests, more than the sensitive but static "St. Francis" of Alfeo Faggi, more than the two pieces of Maillol, who seems to be enjoying a brief vogue; more than the "Kneeling Girl" of Lehmbruck, whose attenuated grace seems to have caught Mr. Thayer's fancy. The Brancusi is interestingly presented, but it is hardly one of his most characteristic pieces.

Innumerable criticisms in detail might be made of this portfolio: such as that the wit and ironist, Pascin, is represented by work of less merit than that shown two years ago at Brummer's; that neither the Segonzac pen drawing nor the Boardman Robinson cartoon is related to the "contemporary movement" in the sense of affirming Today; that the Dérain water color scarcely represents that painter adequately; and that there is a vastly better print of the Picasso etching than the inferior one from which the facsimile was made. Also, to omit Kandinsky and include a woodcut by Edvard Munch seems, at the very least, strange.

But these and other objections are subordinate to the major demonstration that has been achieved. It is a demonstration that ought to encourage collectors of American work. It points toward a portfolio, perhaps a second in this series, which would represent adequately not only the two water colorists now included, but Hartley, Marcel Duchamp, Macdonald Wright, Oscar Bluemner, Pascin, Alfred H. Maurer, and Georgia O'Keeffe. Such a second portfolio might do what this one only hints at. We do not need to defer any longer to French painting. Furthermore, there is one field in which America has long been supreme. That is photography. Why not include in such a portfolio photography in its own right rather than merely as a record of sculpture—especially since it was in the course of a critical examination of what photography is that modern art, European and American, was introduced to New York and to America?

As it is, Mr. Thayer and his associates have made a promising first step. It is a beginning rather than a complete demonstration, and there is enormous opportunity for continuing the impulse to recognize fine American achievement. For it is an impulse which, since publication of Camera Work was interrupted in 1917, has had no record in America.

HERBERT J. SELIGMANN

Revolutionary Germany

The German Revolution and After: Its Disasters and Its Hopes.

By Heinrich Ströbel. Translated by H. J. Stenning. Thomas Seltzer. $4.

THIS book covers the four and a half years of German history from the military collapse in the autumn of 1918 to the beginning of 1923. It deals, therefore, with the German Revolution and the fortunes of the young German Republic. As this is a period in which event has followed event with bewildering rapidity, it is assuredly one which requires the illumination of a strong focusing light and a good perspective. The hopes and conjectures expressed by the author in the last chapter have indeed been rendered somewhat nugatory by the French occupation of the Ruhr; but the book as a whole offers just the sort of perspicuous survey which most of us need for our orderly information.

The author writes as an advanced radical—a Social Democrat of the left wing. His point of view is virtually that of Haase, Bernstein, and Kautsky. But there is not even an echo of the old controversy between Marxian dogma and "revisionism." The issues for him are concrete and practical: how Germany can be made a true democracy, and how she can regain her political and economic standing in the comity of nations.

Like most German liberals Ströbel is willing to acknowledge Germany's partial war-guilt. He is even willing to go further and, in view of what he calls "the terribly incriminating German and Austrian secret documents," put the final responsibility for the outbreak of the war at her door. It is here that he diverges sharply from the Majority Social Democrats of the right wing, who had combined enthusiasm for war and eagerness for victory with dreams of world reconstruction on a German basis. It is they, in his opinion, who are responsible for the legend of the defensive war, the assertion that Germany had been maliciously attacked by the Entente, and for the absurd fable that the German armies had not been beaten but were the victims of a "stab in the back." It is Ströbel's conviction that the peace which was forced both by army and country saved Ludendorff from the most colossal defeat in world history and Germany from a still more fearful catastrophe. It was owing to the reluctance of these same Majority Socialists to acknowledge guilt and to bring a realization of it to the widest circles of the people (as, for example, the ill-fated Kurt Eisner did in Bavaria) that more tolerable conditions of peace were not obtained.

If the German Revolution has been a partial failure it is because the proletariat and its leaders have shown themselves inadequate to the task. German political immaturity has proved fatal. Instead of opposing a solid front to the common enemy, militarism and capitalism, the various sections of German Socialism, full of mistrust and hatred, fell to attacking each other. The Right Socialists had neither the insight nor the courage to reduce militarism to impotence at once. Instead, they sought and obtained an alliance with the Center. This was a fundamental mistake and has proved a lasting misfortune for the revolution.

But Ströbel is not a Communist nor a partisan of Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, whom he blames for blind resentment and exaggerated radicalism. He admits freely that socialism can only be a gradual and systematically progressive process. He holds that the constitution of the German Republic, though not, as it has been vaunted, "the most free and democratic in the world," is by no means a hopeless document embodying, as the ultra-radicals have asserted, the old familiar juridical structure of the class-state. Whatever the defects of the constitution may be, the means of reshaping and improving it lie at the disposal of the proletariat.

It should not be inferred, however, that Ströbel's book is wholly argumentative and tendentious. The bulk of it is devoted to an objective narration of events. From the naval mutiny of October, 1918, to the murder of Rathenau, one may follow the vicissitudes of German public life clearly and with absorbing interest. On this score alone the book may be unhesitatingly recommended for the enlightenment of the American people, regardless of one's individual political sympathies. The sober translation does substantial justice to the original, even though a German idiom or sentence rhythm may occasionally appear.

W. K. STEWART

Books in Brief

The Pitiful Wife. By Storm Jameson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Marital infidelity is so familiar a theme in the workshop of the novelist that practically all the changes have been rung upon it. The outlines of the story are as old as the outlines of the hills; no mere repetition of it will arrest attention. And yet Storm Jameson has wrought a narrative of more than passing interest out of exactly this basic idea, and has succeeded in breathing fresh vitality into the relationships of her characters. She has done this, not by dwelling upon the externals, but by conceiving a plot in which the psychological value of her theme is brought into vivid focus. One's interest is not centered upon what happens, but rather upon the devastating readjustment which ensues between the two central characters. This phase of the theme is worked out with a swift and intuitive intelligence by the author, in a scene which for emotional depth and sustained beauty is rare in recent fiction. In calling her novel "The Pitiful Wife," the author has been unwise; the title suggests a plaintive note which is absent from the text.

The Poet Assassinated. By Guillaume Apollinaire. Translated from the French with a Biographical Notice and Notes by Matthew Josephson. The Broom Publishing Company. $5.

This Rabelaisian extravaganza in prose by one of the most important of modern French poets begins better than it ends. The procreation, gestation, birth, and education of the hero Croniamantal are narrated with superb spirit, but his later quarrels with relatively insignificant Parisian poets do not make very exciting reading this many miles away from the Seine. On the whole, however, an amusing and reckless book by a diabolically gifted writer.

Japanese Poetry. An Historical Essay with Two Hundred and Thirty Translations. By Curtis Hidden Page. With Illustrations from Japanese Paintings and Color-Prints. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

An informing and agreeable essay, though somewhat diffuse, upon a great poetry with which the author has been long familiar. The translations unfortunately do not add very much, since their rhymes and inversions destroy any illusion they might otherwise have created that they were Japanese. It is too bad that Mr. Page did not avail himself of the extremely simple and honest technique in translation of Lafcadio Hearn and Arthur Waley.

Wanda Landowska

By PITTS SANBORN

WE Americans, when we have thought of the harpsichord at all, have usually thought of it as the chattering instrument of a pedantic preciousness. A musical fossil, often of incontestable beauty as to the wood, the inlays, the modeling, the finish of its case, it would be viewed with pleasure in a museum or a royal palace, as long as its twanging keys were rigorously dumb. But as an actual participant in performances of music today—well, it might be admissible as an accompaniment for the "dry" recitatives in operas by Mozart and earlier masters, or in archaeological reconstructions of conditions as they existed in the days of Bach and Handel. To take the harpsichord seriously, however, as a means of music-making in a normal concert, that were a gray horse of a gruesome grayness bordering funereally on black! Witness the attempts of a Mahler or a Mengelberg to perform an orchestral suite of Bach with the aid of a harpsichordized piano. The tone of that contrivance (generally it is an ordinary piano with paper spread in among the strings) has been likened aptly to the racket made by a mowing machine in full career.

Now there comes to us a supple and undulating lady out of Poland, by way of Berlin and of Paris, and lo! in a trice all our preconceived notions and prejudices vanish in thin air! The sorcery of her mind and spirit, the prestidigitation of her fluttering, skimming hands—but hands of steely strength and temper—in their infallible response, and what is the magical result? The quaint and pretty fossil for antiquarian collections lives again.

This is not the place in which to dwell on the enormous erudition of Mme Landowska, on her unique and eviscerating study of the music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, or even on the taste, the wit, the sharpness of perception, the buoyant and finely ironic spirit, the deep and reverent enthusiasm that melt and mingle and combine to make of the femme savante a fascinating and irresistible artist. She wears her mighty learning like a gay and gallant plume. There is something almost jaunty in the ease and blitheness of her profound, triumphant art. "La gaieté c'est la force" would be absolutely true of her were it not for the touch of Polish morbidessa, a caressing softness that bears no taint of morbidity as we Anglo-Saxons know it. So it happens that she herself is the most eloquent possible advocate for her adored, her royal harpsichord.

Mme Landowska has had her instrument rebuilt in strict accordance with the theories and beliefs that are the fruit of her unremitting research among the predecessors of the pianoforte. Of the peculiar genius of the harpsichord, of its special possibilities, let Mme Landowska herself speak:

It has, like the organ, two keyboards and a great number of registers, imitating the flute, the violin, the oboe, and the bag-pipe, which vivify the compositions with the glowing colors of old stained glass. Its deep registers make us feel the dark profoundness of certain preludes and fugues of Bach. The joyous brilliance of its two keyboards which, in their struggle one with the other, flash and sparkle into flame, impart to the sonatas of Scarlatti just the note of diabolical Neapolitan verve. The miracles of jocund grace and of melancholy tenderness of Couperin and Rameau find again their authentic poetry in that diaphanous and silvery sonority. They recall the fluid landscapes of Watteau, the noble portraits of Largillière, proud in their refined and aristocratic charm.

This is praise indeed! But listen to a Landowska program. Suppose that you know "The Harmonious Blacksmith" of Handel, the "Italian Concerto" of Bach, Daquin's "Le Coucou," Rameau's "La Poule," and that most relishingly named of all, "Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise" by François Couperin le Grand, only as they ordinarily sound beneath the smiting hammers of a piano; then listen to them plucked from the quilled strings of the harpsichord by the expert fingers of Wanda Landowska. You will hear for yourself "the humming, the warbling, the fluting, the flashing, the sweep of arpeggios dripping gold, the resounding jubilation" which are the lordly boast of the puissant scholar of the rediscovered harpsichord.

From all this insistence on the special and revealing value of the harpsichord one would be wrong to infer that Mme Landowska is not also a pianist. She is, and one of the finest of pianists. To hear her play a Mozart concerto for the pianoforte is to hear a veritable evocation of the marvelous boy of Salzburg. The perfect continence of her playing, her extraordinary musicianship and finesse, the justness of her accents, her chiseled phrasing, the variety and delicacy of her shading, the soft and iridescent coloring of her tone unite in a magic that really transports the listener to a higher and purer region of sound.

Here, summoned by Wanda Landowska, is the essential and unsullied bel canto of Mozart, which in its bright chastity, in its airy evasion of clumsy mortal grasp, is something distinctly other than the bel canto of the nineteenth century, charged with that maladie du siècle of the early romantics, for which neither time nor many wars nor a wilful refuge-seeking in the treacherous port of irony could quite contrive the cure. The sensuousness in her playing of a cantilena by Mozart is a sensuousness of angels. It was Oscar Bie who said of her: "She plays Mozart as if Beethoven had never lived."

Drama Confession

YES, our theater has made strides. Oliver M. Sayler in his invaluable book, "Our American Theater," has proved it, has given chapter and verse. No one who knew the stage ten short years ago can doubt it. Nor has the American drama been unfruitful. If I cannot quite share the enthusiasm of the inner circle of Mr. Eugene O'Neill's admirers, I am not therefore blind to his talent, and I have even been accused of being too generous to the authors of "Ambush," "A Square Peg," "Roger Bloomer," "The Adding Machine," "Tarnish," "Beggar on Horseback." But I will not admit any such thing and I am also ready to repeat my praise of such folk-plays as "Sun Up" and "Hell-bent fer Heaven" in the popularity of which I rejoice. And yet—and yet—

The current season, too, has been full of more good things than I can chronicle at this moment. Unlike many reviewers I liked Jane Cowl's "Pelléas and Mélisande"; I liked that suggestive little play "Outward Bound" with its true and lovely and touching close; I liked "Failures" and "Fata Morgana" enormously for their truth and edge and civilized vision of mortal things; far back in the early season I was amused by both "The Camel's Back" and "Spring Cleaning"; I enjoyed the clever experimental productions of "The Spook Sonata" and "Fashion"; I saluted the gorgeousness and teatro-technical splendor of "The Miracle." And I had two great moments in the theater—the two occasions when, first at the Garrick, then at the Empire, I witnessed the last act of "Saint Joan." Just two great moments.

They say that the musical critics have a hard time. But if the symphony orchestras played nothing, nothing but Berlioz and Saint-Saëns and the contemporary experimentalists, the critics of music would have to get hold of an orchestra of their own to play them Bach and Beethoven and Brahms. And if the Metropolitan gave nothing but "Anima Allegra" and "Pagliacci" and the song recitalists sang nothing but Cadman and Sidney Homer—then the critics of music would have to resign or they would go mad.

"Mediocribus esse poetis. . . !" The very gods, Horace remarked, could not endure mediocre creative work. You wander from play to play. "Good; suggestive; agreeable; rather charming." And so on and so on. It is most tolerable, as Dogberry remarked, and not to be endured. And no one seems to know it and no one seems to see it. The theater is under the domination of clever, alert, witty, refined, sagacious minds; many of the critics have abilities and gifts that I shall always be the first to salute. But do they live with Euripides, and Goethe, and the Molière who wrote "Tartufe" and "Le Misanthrope," and the dramatic essays of John Dryden, and Hebbel's "Mein Wort über das Drama," and Ibsen and Hauptmann and Shaw, not Shaw the ultra-clever man but Shaw the Euripides of an industrial age? Do they live with these men and works and thoughts? And do they live with them not as a matter of duty or self-approbation but because they cannot help it, because that region is the natural habitat of their minds?

Maybe they do. Then why do they not beg or nag or thunder for a few great things each season? Let no one answer me: "You get Shakespeare!" Shakespeare is a ritual, not an experience. And let no one answer: "How about 'Cyrano'?" Because to imagine that from "Cyrano" you can get the exaltation of great art—that is the ultimate proof of my apparently ill-natured contention.

In reality I am not ill-natured at all. I yield to no one in my admiration of many contemporary American and foreign plays. But no year and no decade produces enough great things to satisfy a rational mind. No year or decade ever has. If, to return to the best analogy, no public performances of the great musical classics were given, the whole of musical culture would collapse. And similarly, if the theater does not play a reasonable number of times each season the authentic classics, ancient and modern, the theater will often seem almost insupportable to an adult mind.

It was for this reason that I was so grateful to Frau Triesch and her associates for their afternoon performances of "A Doll's House" and "Rosmersholm" and "Hedda Gabler." I omit the consideration that Frau Triesch is an actress of the very first order—an intellect and a talent matchless on our native stage; I omit the fact that several of her associates gave admirable performances. I was grateful for Ibsen, for three successive Thursday afternoons with a great master, for three performances in which I came closer than ever before to his mind and method and was instructed and exalted and deepened my vision of both art and life. In brief, the dramatic critic becomes a mechanic if his job consists in telling good, plain people: "This is interesting; this is not so interesting; this is pretty; this is dull." The poor fellow must have something on which to feed his own mind if he is to go on functioning decently. If his own mind is left hungry he will soon have little nourishment to give others. And then of what use is he?

The Story of Haya de la Torre

WE print herewith an article written by a youth, now in exile from his country, who is becoming known as a leader of the liberal and labor forces of South America. Haya de la Torre is a young radical whose influence has spread far beyond his own country, Peru. He became president of the Students' Federation of Peru and after graduating from college devoted himself to the organization of workers' universities in five centers. He became rector of all of these and taught five nights every week. In addition he held a position as teacher in a boys' school at Lima run by the Scotch Presbyterian Mission and continued his own studies for his doctor's degree. These activities covered the years 1921, 1922, and part of 1923. The workers' universities accomplished miracles of regeneration in some of the towns where they were established and the influence and popularity of their founder spread widely. But Haya de la Torre dared to be unpopular. In spite of the enmity between Peru and Chile and the fact that no diplomatic relations existed between the two countries, he opposed the spirit of nationalism, traveled through Chile, visiting the students in Santiago, and arranged for the entertainment by the students at Lima of the famous Chilean poetess, Gabriella Mistral.

As the result of this activity and of his part in an anti-clerical demonstration in Lima in May, 1923, Haya de la Torre was exiled. An account of the events which preceded his banishment is given in the Monthly Record of the Free Church of Scotland from a correspondent in Lima. This article reads in part:

Last week was one of the most remarkable in the history of the Peruvian people, both for the dramatic events which marked the culmination of a campaign energetically directed against the Roman Catholic Church acting in concert with the Government, and for the bringing to light of an attitude and spirit which, if genuine and permanent, may have far-reaching effects on the future history of the country. The said campaign was . . . actually brought to head by the intention on the part of the Archbishop of Lima (and Peru) to consummate one of the most idolatrous acts of modern times. I cannot do better than quote the actual words of the Archbishop contained in his pastoral letter which has been translated from Spanish. It was said that he wished to be made a cardinal by currying favor with Rome.

We announce a great event which will be a source of much joy to all our people. The Republic of Peru, Catholic by conviction, by tradition, and by the constitution, will be officially consecrated to the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus next month and the image of this most sacred heart will be enthroned in the principal plaza of the capital. Who knows but that for many people the Sacred Heart of Jesus is even the Unknown God. . . . Thus we shall say with Saint Paul, "That God whom you ignorantly worship Him declare we unto you."

In these words and more the Archbishop decreed that the time was ripe for this act, which would take place with due pomp and ceremony on May 31. The President was to unveil the effigy on that date, and it was promptly prepared. Being 2½ meters in height and made of bronze it weighed one ton and cost, I think, £3,000.

The consecration of the country to an image would have meant utter abandonment to the power and sway of the church which for three centuries has practically dictated to the state. Peru is one of the most backward countries in South America because it has been so fettered by the power of clericalism and the church. . . . Sane, thinking men, especially the students of the University of Lima, have long since ceased to have anything to do with the church. . . .

The leading spirit in the whole campaign was Señor Haya de la Torre, a youth of about twenty-six years, who comes from the north of Peru, from the very town which is the native place of the Archbishop, who curiously enough was Haya's teacher in earlier days. Señor Haya is one of the best Peruvian teachers we have in our school. All his teaching is tinged with the Christian appeal to manhood, and being a profound and convincing speaker he has a great influence over the boys. He teaches subjects like history, psychology, education, and civics, etc. In the student life of the University of Lima he has played a leading part and was the first president of the Students' Federation, taking the lead in the university two or three years ago. When first coming to Lima a number of years ago he was in very straitened circumstances and felt the pinch of poverty, although too proud to solicit help from any of his friends. It was then that he resolved to devote his life to the uplifting of the poorer classes and to the bettering of social conditions among the workingmen. Later, as president of the Students' Federation, he founded the Universidad Popular, which aims at giving education to workingmen. Señor Haya has given a lot of his time to this work and has organized the workers in different centers up and down the country. There are very strong organizations in Trujillo, his native place; Arequipa in the south, Vitarte up the Oroya line and in Lima itself, places which he is continually visiting and where he gives lectures and addresses. His gifts of leadership, his captivating personality, his resolution and determination, his idealism have all combined to make him almost worshiped by the workmen, while his gifts of oratory and convincing speech have tended to mold public opinion in a way that was hitherto unheard of in Peru.

When the Archbishop sent out his decree there was very little comment in the press or among the people, as nobody ever thought of opposing anything proposed by the Pope's representative. Meanwhile Señor Haya was organizing his forces, getting leaflets printed (at some press whose existence is unknown to the Government) by the thousand, and holding meetings. The value of his work is shown by the very significant fact that for the first time in the history of the country the workmen and the students have combined in one common cause and formed a solid body of resolute public opinion. On May 21 he announced a great meeting to be held in the university on May 23 at 5 p. m., and the next morning some of the papers printed the call sent out to all the students and the workmen to attend in order to pass resolutions of protest to the Government in view of its intention to consecrate the nation to an image without its consent. Haya was informed that a warrant for his arrest had been signed and that the Government had the intention of deporting him, as it has done to all the opposition and all liberal-minded men. But this only gave him fresh enthusiasm in the campaign; at the same time elaborate precautions were taken for action in the event of his being taken. Lima was deluged with pamphlets, and feeling began to run high in the capital when the time drew near for the meeting.

Everybody going into the university was searched for arms, even the president of the university himself. Within the university wall were met together in the companionship of a great movement workmen of all types and students to listen to the words of their leaders. The Government had sent spies to upset the whole proceeding, but these were suppressed, and in spite of the difficulties of the situation Señor Haya uttered a moving speech and the resolutions of protest were passed as well as the decision to put into force a general strike on the night before the consecration ceremony. The meeting, apart from the attempted disturbance, was very orderly, for of all people Haya is absolutely opposed to violence of any kind. The members were leaving the university and going up to the Plaza de Armas, the principal plaza of Lima, when suddenly from up above shots were fired. It has been thought that priests were in the church tower overlooking the street and commenced firing. At any rate mounted troops, of whom there was a large number in readiness, charged the crowd of students and workmen, some of them being driven into a passage without exit and the order to fire was given by the chief of police. In this most brutal attack on unarmed people a student, a workman, and a policeman were killed (the policeman was killed by the mounted troops as was proved afterwards by the kind of bullet) and about a dozen wounded. In the midst of all this, with the police after him, Señor Haya pushed on and reached the plaza, and spoke there as well as at several places in the main street of the town. He actually spoke from the steps of the cathedral.

This dastardly attempt on the part of the Government to put down a movement by force served to stir up the whole population, and during the few days that followed it was only the presence of Haya which held the people in from acts of violence and probably from burning churches and the palace and from breaking loose altogether. Haya's life was in danger and he was being sought for high and low, but in vain. He took all precautions possible, and the following day, to the surprise of people and Government, Haya appeared in different places and spoke to the crowd as well as in the university on May 24. During that day it was announced that the Government intended to bury the bodies of the workman and the student (by this time in the mortuary) secretly, to avoid any more public demonstration. The same night the students, led by Haya, went to the mortuary and demanded the bodies for burial next day. At first the troops there guarding refused, but seeing their determination and not wishing to repeat the bloody affair of the preceding day, let them have their wish. Inside, two spies who tried to prevent their entrance were put out of action, and the students seized the bodies, one in an open coffin and the other on the lid, and as the troops were going to make them go straight to the cemetery and bury them, went out through another door. The troops seeing this prepared to charge them, but the men formed a compact mass and the horses shying at the dead bodies, they succeeded in getting through to the university. The minister of Government sent word that the troops were to take the bodies by force at midnight, so the students set out to put the building in a state of defense. They had not eaten for several hours, and so a certain number left the building while the remainder, about one hundred and twenty, knew that once outside they would never get through the guard of soldiers. They were guarding the bodies all night and were without food until late next day. Word was sent in by the troops that the building would be stormed if the bodies were not delivered up. Messages were sent by Señor Haya on the telephone to the press offices and to the Minister of Government that if any attempt were made to enter the university they would set fire to the place and perish with it rather than see it violated. Haya then proceeded to identify all the people inside, every one having to show something to prove who he was. He explained how absolutely necessary this precaution was, and so it turned out to be, for he had to shut up twenty spies in a room on penalty of death if they attempted escape. Explosives and acids by the gallon were obtained from the chemical laboratory and men placed at strategic points round the building to use them if an attack were made by the troops. The latter evidently thought better of it and morning saw the situation the same.

I omitted to state that immediately after the shooting on the night of the 23d a general strike was proclaimed, first, as a protest against the action of the Government, and, secondly, to be prolonged until such time as the Government suspended the consecration ceremony. On Friday, the 25th, the burial of the workman and the student was to take place. It happened to be a fiesta or public holiday. South American people, especially Peruvians, retain the Latin characteristic of being easily and passionately roused and becoming tremendously excited. There was public indignation at what had been done by the Government and the whole population was roused. Bodies of troops were guarding all the streets leading to the university plaza and patrolling the town. Crowds gathered at many corners, and orators from among the crowd . . . would hold forth on "liberty of thought" and utter burning denunciations of clericalism, the church, and the Government. The soldiers or rather mounted troops broke up the crowd, and all during the day there were local troubles and skirmishes through the town. Meanwhile the students and workmen, formed into an orderly procession, were unmolested by the troops, and a most extraordinary ceremony took place. Thousands of workmen and students (the papers said twenty thousand), all bareheaded, followed the two coffins in silence to the cemetery right through the town. From a big monument in the grounds Señor Haya gave a wonderful and impressive speech to this huge mass of men. . . . The workers and the students pledged their mutual allegiance, and it was felt that death in a mysterious way had united more closely than ever before these two great bodies of men. After the meeting Haya, who knew that the Government spies would be everywhere seeking to take him, left the crowd. He was immediately pursued by several men, but they were threatened at a gateway by a Negro and Haya succeeded in making his escape. With difficulty he swam across the river and entered Lima from the other side. For a few nights he was in the cellar of a friend's house, but owing to the tremendous physical strain of the previous days and getting wet and cold he took the grippe. . . .

Things move with extraordinary rapidity in this country, and within three days the object was achieved and victory was won. On the night of the 25th the Archbishop issued a decree to the effect that, as the intended consecration ceremony had stirred up trouble against the Government, and as the church had a mission of peace and fraternity, and that as the Government, although invited to consent to the solemnization act had not yet decided, the act would be suspended. From that night the strike was at an end. It was a glorious triumph for the ideals of liberty and justice, and marks the dawn of a new era in Peru.

This demonstration was in May; the final arrest of Haya de la Torre took place in October when he was taken to a prison on an island in the harbor and then transported bodily after a seven days' hunger strike to a steamer outbound. Every cent of money was taken from him and all the clothes except those he wore. His ticket was bought to Germany, but with the financial help of friends he went ashore at Colon. There he found a cablegram from the students of Cuba inviting him to come to Havana and one from Vasconcelas, Mexican Minister of Education, asking him to come to Mexico. He went to Cuba and was made honorary president of the Students' Federation of the University of Havana. During the ten days he was there he organized a peoples' university. He is now in Mexico, working with Vasconcelas, although the disorganization and financial stringency incidental to the recent revolution has seriously interfered with educational work. It is probable that Haya de la Torre will come to the United States within the next few months and that later he will go to London to continue his studies.

Haya de la Torre has opposed with equal vigor the oppression of the Government, the industrialists, and the church, as well as the whole spirit of nationalism. His views on the relations between the United States and the Latin American countries are expressed in an article, which we reprint on pages 408 and 410.

Is the United States Feared in South America?

IN the columns of several journals and reviews in North America—journals and reviews of a free spirit—it has already been said that it is not possible for the official or bourgeois newspapers of South America to discuss this subject except from a point of view which they consider judicious or diplomatic. I believe—since we know this to be true—that the voice of those who speak in the service of the governments should not be taken into consideration and that it will be of greater value if the question is raised to a plane where there is breadth of view and frankness.

If there is any desire to establish a disinterested and solid relation between the United States of the North and the countries of Latin America a method which is clandestine and deals in falsehoods should not be employed. It is more efficacious to know exactly the thought which has no shackles, and then to face the facts without fear.

To the question, Is the United States feared in South America? the governments, the diplomats, the merchants, the bankers, and the press (which serves all this union of political and economic interests) will reply in the negative, affirming that there exists full confidence and absolute cordiality in the relations between the two. But men of free spirit will answer without mincing words that the existence of this fear is absolutely certain and that there are many and persistent reasons why it should persist and be rooted in the consciousness of Hispanic America.

WHAT MOTIVES KEEP GOVERNMENTS, THE CAPITALISTS, AND THE PRESS FROM TELLING THE TRUTH?

It is not difficult to find the answer to this question. The South American governments, and very especially those which impose on the people systems of oppression and absolute autocracy, maintain very strong business connections and chains of interest with the most powerful capitalistic enterprises of North America. I can cite a few cases only: Venezuela, which is suffering under a cruel tyranny, holds almost all its sources of natural riches mortgaged to a company of United States exploiters. Peru, which is also governed by a dictatorship, has put its customs duties into the hands of a North American "technical commission," and also its public instruction and the sanitation of its cities—with very bad results for the country. Bolivia, without any authorization except that of President Saavedra personally, has just mortgaged a million hectares of its territory to powerful Yankee companies, accepting the control of its finances by three commissioners of the United States who will watch over the paying out of the $24,000,000 which has been loaned to the Bolivian Government.

To these cases we could add many others (Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, and Brazil), where the peoples, through concessions of their governments, have been tied up by tremendous economic obligations to the trusts of North America.

Among the economic motives which keep the governments, the capitalists, and the press from telling the truth one might be called "reasons of international politics." Diplomacy in America, in imitation of that in Europe, lives by constant maneuvering and insincerity. Its eternal game consists in always hiding the truth in subservience to the apparent conservation of a conventional friendship. The State Department at Washington has also taken upon itself the solution of many questions fundamental to the relations between the Spanish American people: the Peruvian-Chilean dispute, for example. In some countries the United States maintains a definite internal control, as in Panama, Central America, and the Antilles. All of these circumstances impose on the Latin-American governments a forced reverence toward the Government of the United States. The press, which defends and sustains these interests and this political economy, is generally their voice.

MR. MORTON'S historical Arabian Night is not only capital reading, but a shrewdly persuasive case for a new factor in the Napoleonic legend. These word pictures and anecdotes are remarkably fascinating in themselves, whilst the clever colour studies of Mauritian types and places by Christina Morton greatly help the tropic spell. It is, however, the story of Aimée Dubuc de Rivery to which the larger part of the book is devoted, who—captured at sea by Barbary corsairs, and sent as a gift to the Sultan at Constantinople—became the mother of Mahmoud the Great, the man whose implacable disdain of Napoleon after Joséphine's divorce was as remarkable as his previous friendship in spite of the Egyptian campaign. Why Turkey failed to grasp the magnificent opportunity of recovering from her ancient enemy, Russia, her former possessions and more, when Napoleon made it clear that it would be safe and easy to do so, has never been explained; so Mr. Morton's story of Aimée's influence upon her son's character and actions, by the light of her Creole traditions and convent education, seems to supply the tiny factor which overturned a meteoric career, and his documentation and research do much to support this theory. At the very least, an unexpectedly interesting new light upon the épopée is discreetly and with all modesty submitted in this most interesting book.

WHAT MOTIVE HAVE MEN OF FREE SPIRIT FOR TELLING THE TRUTH?

Those who are tied neither to the governments nor to the enterprises, who hold free their consciences that they may publish their opinions and maintain them with valor, constitute the immense majority of the Latin Americans. They are those who with just cause fear the United States and do not trust its politics; although much of the time most of them remain quiet, not counting it possible to make this sentiment really known. The reason for their lack of confidence in the United States is found principally in the progressive, although slow and clever, interpenetration of the United States into the life of the Latin-American nations. Cuba, Santo Domingo, Porto Rico, Nicaragua, Honduras, and Panama constitute a living menace for all the people of the Latin continent. While there continues in those countries the political and military rule of North America, the lack of confidence will be continued and all friendship between North and South America will be limited to simple formulas of diplomacy, and there will exist at bottom an inquietude which is at the same time fear and hate.

Friendship is very difficult between a powerful man and a poor man when the powerful man is seen with arms in his hands with which to threaten and money with which to suborn. Although the lips smile the hearts are distrustful. And this is the case of the two Americas. With each day that goes by it is becoming clearer that interests are dominating and force is being imposed. The Monroe Doctrine, in spite of the hymns which the official press sing to it, is seen by the people of Spanish America to be the justification for all that is occurring in the Antilles and in Central America and of all that may happen later to Mexico and to the other countries of the Southern continent.

CAN ANYTHING BE DONE TO DESTROY THE DANGER OF RACIAL HATE?

In my opinion it is only by the union of the men who are free in spirit and who are disinterested in North and South America that anything can be done in this matter. I believe that it is very urgent that the generous spirits of the United States should aid us to face the menace of conquering imperialism. The example of belligerent nationalism which has brought Europe to the point of committing suicide ought to be regarded by the young men of America as a terrible historical lesson and a warning. Millions of lives were lost in the fields of battle in the name of liberty and democracy, but we all know, and each day with less uncertainty, that the true motives of the European war had their roots in the interests of great economic enterprises. By means of their competition they dragged the world to a massacre which the law of Moses designated as a crime. They can repeat the terrible tragedy in the New World also if in order to accumulate much gold they forget that hate is accumulating at the same time.

The men and women of the United States whose spirits have not become intoxicated with interested selfishness ought now, while there is time, to raise the word of union and faith, not under the diplomatic form of so-called Pan-Americanism, which is official and which puts a white glove over the claws, but by creating strong currents of frank and honorable communion.

South America distrusts—and with sufficient cause. The free and disinterested men and women of the United States of the North, in order to destroy this distrust, ought to unite themselves with their brothers of the South, because the South is weak and is struggling against those who for avarice or for ambition are sowing hatreds which some day will bring forth flowers of blood.

The Government is being overthrown not by Bolsheviks but by crooked politicians and trusted officials who know what is going on and have not the courage to fight or expose the conditions. So far as the Department of Justice is concerned, it no longer functions except in the capacity of first aid to crooks.

THESE words, written two years ago in a report to Attorney General Daugherty by S. L. Scaife, then a special agent in the Bureau of Investigation, are an accurate and not too alarming description of the situation in Washington. And yet we find a supposedly reputable business man, head of a company whose directors would probably dislike the imputation that it was corrupt, writing to Frank A. Vanderlip to request his resignation from the directorate. The president of the Freeport Texas Company and other of its directors are "not in sympathy" with Mr. Vanderlip's "attitude in public matters." In sending his resignation, as requested, Mr. Vanderlip cuts right through the contemptible cowardice of these men who are "not in sympathy" with efforts to restore reasonable decency and honesty to our federal Government. Mr. Vanderlip says:

If you were to look at the situation not from the plane of good citizenship but merely from the lower plane of what is good for business, you would still be mistaken in deploring my activities. . . . If there is not full exposure of the corruption that has honeycombed some of the departments and several of the bureaus of the federal Government, business, at the mercy of corrupt courts, corrupt prosecuting attorneys, and law-breaking officials, will ultimately suffer far more than it can through the exposure of these things.

When business men and the business-owned press attempt to belittle and hamper the investigations going on in Washington they are simply confessing that they want a government which, like the Department of Justice, is nothing but a "first aid to crooks."

SENATOR BORAH is not among those who believe that the searchlight in Washington should be switched off, nor does he accuse the Democrats of undue partisanship in exposing corruption even though a Republican administration is involved. Mr. Borah looks for a continuation of existing evils so long as parties are supported as at present:

These stupendous sums contributed to a political party do not simply measure the individual's patriotic interest in his party. Such large sums are asked for or given because of a desire to go beyond the ordinary interests of the individual in his party. You can buy influence with a political party quite as effectively as you can an individual. In the latter instance it is still denounced, in the former instance it has become an accepted practice. . . . Both parties accept the system and pursue the practice. So long as they do this, these specific instances of exposure may help to put one party in and the other party out, but the cause of clean government, of disinterested and wise legislation and uncontrolled administration will not be greatly served.

Senator Borah is right in his analysis of the source of corruption in the two old parties, but he fails to add that both Republican and Democratic organizations would die of anemia if they lost the support of favored special interests and would be murdered on a lonely road if they failed to deliver the swag as ordered. The remedy is through a new party or parties, based on the broad interests of productive labor in the cities and on the farms, instead of on the greatest good for the smallest number of the privileged.

HIS VICTORY in the Wisconsin Democratic primary is widely heralded by Governor Smith's friends as giving him fresh hope. It is a vain one. A Catholic can hardly be nominated for the Presidency in this year of Ku Klux Klan grace. Were this not the case Senator Walsh of Montana would surely be an even more formidable candidate. The Smith vote in Wisconsin, however, is undoubtedly a damper to the reviving McAdoo candidacy. On the other side of the fence the President's supporters are discouraged by his showing in Wisconsin, where he won less than half as many votes as Senator La Follette. This, following his defeat by Hiram Johnson in South Dakota, must be cold comfort. La Follette's easy victory in Wisconsin illustrates anew his hold on the Republican situation. If his health is spared, Mr. La Follette may be able to save his countrymen from the misfortune of Calvin Coolidge. Meanwhile, the fright of the Republicans is amusingly illustrated by Senator Pepper's keynote speech, in which he shrieks that in exposing Republican rottenness the Democrats have "hit America" and have brought forward the possibility of an "irresponsible and highly dangerous third party"! If America is hit when corruption is exposed it certainly needs a third party.

OPEN COVENANTS OPENLY ARRIVED AT—this is hereafter to be not a mere phrase in England but a reality. Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, on behalf of the MacDonald Ministry, has announced that the present Government will hereafter submit to the House of Commons all agreements, commitments, and understandings which might bind the nation to any specific action. Every treaty with a foreign nation contemplated by the Government will lie on the table before Parliament, accessible to members, for a period of twenty-one days, at the end of which time the document may be ratified and published. In the case of important treaties, the Government pledges that it will bring them up for formal discussion in the House of Commons within the twenty-one-day period. This is one of the most significant reforms ever undertaken. In England it is nothing less than revolutionary. Had such a policy been in vogue in the years before the World War, the British public would not have been deceived and tricked into that war by the false statements made by Sir Edward Grey and his co-conspirators within the Cabinet, to the effect that there were no binding agreements as to Belgium, when there were such. This is one of the substantial triumphs of the MacDonald Government about which the American public reads little, whereas its defeats on minor measures are widely heralded as foreshadowing its demise. So far the Government has had luck and shown skill and ability. Already it has justified itself by two acts alone: its abandonment of the Singapore naval base and its decision to practice open diplomacy.

OSWALD MOSELY'S decision to join the Independent Labor Party brings to that organization one of the ablest and most promising young men in England, whom some are already describing as a future Prime Minister. The son-in-law of Marquis Curzon, Mr. Mosely has not hesitated to poke fun at the Government in which his father-in-law was so distinguished a figure, just as Stanley Baldwin's son opposed his father on the stump. To both of these young radicals—Mr. Mosely is only 27—the Conservative Government was somnolent and stuffy. Mr. Mosely correctly characterized one of Lord Curzon's notes as "pompous" and added that "all the ministers went to bed for a month, so arduous was the exertion of maintaining their dignity." Quite aside from personalities, however, the accession to Labor ranks of men of this type gives the greatest hope for that party's future. It helps to sound the knell of the Liberal Party; bolters from the Conservative ranks used to find their refuge in the party of Gladstone and Campbell-Bannerman.

HARLAN F. STONE, the new Attorney General, is a kind of conservative more frequently met with in England than in this country. He wants fair play for those with whom he disagrees. When Mitchell Palmer was stirring the country with his brutal and illegal "Red Raids" Harlan Stone, then dean of the Columbia University Law School, challenged the justice of his course in a vigorous letter which was the more convincing because of Dean Stone's known lack of sympathy with those whose rights he defended. But more than one honest conservative is needed to restore the people's confidence in an Administration which has so long tolerated the corrupt crew which has been misgoverning the nation.

ONE OF THE FIRST THINGS for Attorney General Stone to do is to act in the case of a poor Lithuanian who suffers under the name of Joseph Baltrusaitis. Baltrusaitis has just been sent to jail for a technical offense committed in November, 1920, under a statute which has been suspended. A Department of Justice detective, dressed as a laborer, obtained from him copies of certain Communist pamphlets in English, which Baltrusaitis could neither read nor write (a Russian friend had left them with him), and the Lithuanian was thereupon tried and convicted on a charge of discouraging the recruiting and enlisting of soldiers—although no soldiers were then being recruited. He appealed, but the conviction was affirmed, and on March 12, five and a half years after the armistice, Baltrusaitis was sent to Leavenworth Prison to serve his two-year term. He should be pardoned, as should the twelve Cincinnati Socialists indicted in 1917 for opposing the draft act, whose case is now on appeal.

HAIL, COLUMBIA! A few Southern students at the New York university recently awakened to the fact that a Negro student was living in the same dormitory with them. These students very likely had been nursed by a colored mammy, shaved by colored barbers, waited upon by colored servants—but when they discovered that a colored man was living quietly in the same building with them they agreed that his proximity was unbearable. They protested, and a few days later a flaming cross, the ironic emblem of the Ku Klux Klan, burned outside the hall. But the university authorities stood firm, and the other students rallied to the cause of human decency. Dean Hawkes announced that the university would not discriminate in any way against a member of the colored race, and the majority of the white students of Furnald Hall signed a memorial to the authorities defending the colored student's right to exist and disassociating themselves from the protest of the few Southerners.

THE LEGISLATORS OF MISSISSIPPI recently listened to a statement from a group of Negro leaders which described the conditions of servitude and injustice existing in the State. The statement was fairly reported in the press and commented upon with respect. The Governor had previously declared for a "square deal" for the Negro and for the "fullest cooperation between the white man and the black." The exodus of colored labor from Mississippi had made the question of inter-racial relations more than a matter of sentiment; Mississippi must treat the Negroes like human beings or they will simply walk out. This combination of facts led The Nation to suggest in its issue of April 2 that there was a ray of hope for Mississippi. We were evidently premature and overoptimistic. The legislators listened to the memorial of the Negroes and then adopted a resolution condemning it. If there is hope for Mississippi it will have to rest with a liberal Governor and a few Negro citizens of intelligence.

"MECHANICAL TROUBLE" in the broadcasting apparatus seems to be a disease with symptoms curiously similar to those of censorship. Three times recently radio speeches have been cut short. Each time the victim has thought that the trouble was censorship, and the radio company has explained that it was "mechanical trouble." Once Hudson Maxim was left talking to himself about prohibition, the radio fans being cut off as soon as Mr. Maxim began expressing his disapproval of the Volstead Act; once Olga Petrova was cut off when she launched into a defense of woman's right to her own name, her own children, and her own job—outside the home; and finally the circuit was broken when James K. Hackett attacked the New York critics who belittle Shakespeare and prefer Shaw. If the radio companies do not get over the habit of discovering "mechanical trouble" whenever a speaker makes remarks they do not like the radio fans will begin discussing government control in a manner which they will find still more objectionable.

THE REMOVAL OF THE INDEPENDENT to Boston, under the joint ownership of Richard E. Danielson and Christian A. Herter, 3d, brings forward the possibility that this historic journal, now in its seventy-fifth year, may be rescued for future usefulness. It was nearly extinguished, after its sale by Hamilton Holt, by the same management which founded and ended the Weekly Review. If, as its new owners announce, the Independent is really to be a nonpartisan liberal and constructive journal, no one will rejoice more than The Nation. If true to itself any really liberal journal will find it hard sledding today, as the fate of the brilliant Freeman proves. But we are more than hopeful that the many signs and portents of a liberal reawakening from the present intolerable political, economic, and social backwardness will inure to the benefit of all the weeklies which believe that America has another future than that of being politically the most static of countries. The growing failure of the daily press as an adequate interpreter of our times makes hourly more important the function of the weekly and monthly recorder of events. Another new publication which comes to our desk, Humanity, under the editorship of Dr. William J. Robinson, is fresh proof of the unquenchable desire to bring modern thought to the discussion of diverse problems, while the growth of Public Affairs and the Forum encourages the hope that thoughtful Americans are at last turning to a study of the political problems they have too long neglected.

"THE SALACIOUS 'SOPHIE'" and "the filthy 'Failures'": so the Mayor of Boston has stigmatized the last two dramatic productions of the Boston Stage Guild. The presence in Philip Moeller's "Sophie" of a worldly eighteenth-century French abbé seems first to have aroused the suspicions of the city censor, who subsequently demanded the elimination of all the "gods" and "damns." As usual this censorship served only to swell the audience at later performances. The president of the Harvard Dramatic Club, R. S. Aldrich, took up the cudgels: "The play was produced for cultured and sophisticated audiences—not for men like Curley, Quinn, and Casey." These words drew the fire of the good mayor of Boston, who came back with a swinging shillelah, reminding the Harvard senior that "Messrs. Curley, Quinn, and Casey belong to a race—Celtic—that had a literature and art, a drama and poetry, and a clean virile civilization thousands of years before the ancestors of Aldrich, '24—Eldrich and Teutonic—emerged from the gloom and savagery of the Baltic jungles." Finally Mayor Curley let fire a magnificent broadside of alliteration against "those who mistake dirt for daring and decadence for drama," against those "breeders of bawdiness who have gone back to the beasts and the bones" and against the whole "sophistication of the social sewer." This new Catholic Puritanism of Boston in its thunderings against the theater is hardly more broad-minded, but at least it uses merrier verbiage than its Protestant prototype.

BERNARD SHAW has the rare quality of being irritated cheerfully. His latest irritation is at the French. They do not like his version of the story of "Saint Joan." So he comments: "The real woman in Joan is still as unpopular as she was when the Burgundians sold her to the English and the latter delivered her to the French church and to the Inquisition to be burned." An explanation of his "Arms and the Man" in a program of the Odéon in Paris annoyed him still more, and provoked him to this:

Appreciation of my plays has become a kind of test of civilization. . . . I have educated London, I have educated New York, Berlin, and Vienna. Moscow and Stockholm are at my feet. But I am too old to educate Paris. It lags too far behind, and I am too far ahead. I am afraid I shall never be on good terms with the Parisians. You see, I know France much better than they know her, and I like her so much better. . . . The Parisians don't appreciate her. They should all be expelled from France and replaced by Englishmen, the English who really appreciate her.

RISEN OVER NIGHT from a mere profession like law and medicine, the new religion of advertising has inspired a worshiper at the University of Oregon to a "Copy Writer's Prayer":

O God of the Printed Page!
Incline this day thine ear to me,
Who, perforce, must join in one
The poet and the peddler,
The singer and the salesman—
A minstrel of the market-place
Whose craft it is to find
The hidden heart of things for sale,
And make that spirit vocal,
So that multitudes may hear—and buy.

And when my flaccid fingers can no longer fumble
The keys of the typewriter,
And my copy is flat, stale, and unprofitable,
Then may I, O God of the Printed Page!
Be not unworthy of the epitaph:

"HERE LIES THE COPY WRITER—INTER-PRETER OF TRADE—PROPHET OF COMMERCE—REVELATOR OF BUSINESS!"

What vistas of aspiration this opens! What idealistic youth will ever be content to learn dentistry or mining or the saxophone now, when he may become the Prophet of Pebeco or the Revelator of the Rolls-Royce? When at the very least he may help spread the Gospel of Glostora?

General Dawes and the Politicians

IF the Dawes report had been made five years ago in peace-conference days, or four years ago in Spa-conference days, or three years ago in London-conference days, or even a year ago when the occupation of the Ruhr was new, it might have come as a fresh wind bringing relief to weary Europe. Today . . .

It begins right. The method of approach is right. The committee began, for the first time in history, to set the reparations question on its feet instead of on its head. Hitherto the Allies have begun with the question: How much do we need, or want? The answer was always more than the Germans could pay, and when the Germans said so the usual Allied answer was "Sign, and shut up." That pretty process occurred at Paris, at Spa, and at London, and every time economic facts gave the answer which the Germans had not been permitted to make. In the course of years it dawned upon the Allies that the right way was to begin with the question: How much can Germany pay? The Dawes committee set out with that right principle in mind. But it began in Paris, where the ultimatum has become a governmental habit, and bit by bit the experts have compromised with the politicians. The report, apparently, is not a summary of what the distinguished business men and economists who wrote it thought Germany could and should (for economic reasons) be made to pay, but a compromise between that and what Poincaré, with his eye on the elections in May, was willing to accept.

Elections! There is the poison that has crept into what was to have been an economic report. Politics—partisan campaigns, reviving the moods and mistakes of these miserable post-war years—have done their dirty work, and will do it increasingly in the coming four weeks. It is so pitifully easy to inflame a people with preelection jingoism! A worse time could hardly have been chosen for the publication of the experts' report. The German elections are due on May 4; the French elections on May 11. The failure of the Ruhr invasion will be forgotten. Hasty and ill-digested excerpts from the report, hotly nationalistic pleas for its acceptance or rejection will sway the campaigns both in France and in Germany, and the result is as little likely to represent the sober second judgment of the electors as did Lloyd George's khaki election in 1918 or the bloc-national election of 1919 in France.

Unfortunately the Dawes report, if the preliminary summaries which have "leaked" into the press are to be trusted, gives all too much scope to the wild men in both countries. Mr. Arno Dosch-Fleuret, one of the most reliable and experienced European correspondents, reports to the New York World that the plan is for a five-year partial moratorium, in which Germany must meet the treaty charges (including the cost of the occupation) and make certain deliveries in kind, gradually adding cash payments until in 1929 (which the experts expect to be a "normal year") she will be asked to pay 2½ billion gold marks as reparations; this to continue thereafter and to be added to if an "index of prosperity" indicates the possibility of increase. To enable bankrupt Germany to meet the immediate payments a foreign loan of $200,000,000 is envisaged. A commissioner general, somewhat similar to the international dictator of Austria, is provided for, and associated with him are four chief commissioners who will also be foreigners. Subject to their general supervision is the gold bank, which is to have a monopoly of the issue of currency; one-quarter of its capital will go to the Reichsbank and three-quarters be put on the market, and its directorate will be one-half German and one-half foreign. A Bank Transfer Committee, of six foreigners, will supervise the purchase of foreign currency and the reparations payments. The railroads are to be transferred from the Government to a private holding corporation with nine German and nine foreign directors and be bonded for 11 billion gold marks. A transport tax involving another three-billion gold-mark bond issue (equivalent to 7½ per cent of the gross earnings of the railroads) is to provide another share of the reparation payments, and an industrial bond issue of 5 billion gold marks, which is considered roughly equivalent to the profit made by the industrialists during the period of currency depreciation, is to yield another share of the burden.

This involves a total of 5 billion dollars' worth of bonds sooner or later to be floated on the international market, apart from the $75,000,000 in capital stock of the gold bank and the immediate foreign loan of $200,000,000. These are figures almost as fantastic and incredible to the banker as to the layman. The interminable delays in the preparation of the Dawes report plainly indicate that the experts have not been agreed upon them, and the British Government has already given hints that it does not regard them as feasible. Yet already the jingoes are crying "Germany must be made to pay." In the idiotic words of the New York Herald-Tribune: "The Allied governments . . . have the means to compel German submission. If they stand together loyally to enforce the settlement Germany will surrender, as she did in May, 1921." What good did that surrender do? What good can any surrender do? Europe's need is not for surrenders, ultimatums, defiances, but for agreement; and no settlement or report can bring relief until it comes as an agreed basis for payment in proportion to an agreed capacity to pay. Germany will never pay until there is within Germany a substantial body of public sentiment which believes it worth while trying to pay; and no loan at all, much less the enormous loans here contemplated, can be floated in the international market without assurance of such a guaranty in German public opinion.

Apparently the Dawes report has been revised in consultation with French politicians of the ruling clique. It may well give the nationalist bloc a new lease of life, for it gives them a new golden hope to replace the Ruhr policy, once so radiant with easy money, now so discredited. The report might better have been revised in consultation with the liberal groups in both countries. Unless the summaries of it are misleading it is less likely to promote in Germany a willingness to pay than to foster the reactionary current which recently gave so tragic a self-revelation in the verdict of the Ludendorff-Hitler trial in Munich. Ludendorff, avowed commander-in-chief of the army of rebellion, was acquitted; Hitler, chief rebel, sentenced to five years in prison. Less than six years ago Ludendorff, clad in mufti, fled from revolutionary Germany to Denmark. Today he is again a national hero. That is the result of five years of ultimatums. Will the politicians ever let us have peace?

Mr. Weeks Should Go

MR. DENBY is out of the Cabinet; so is Mr. Daugherty. Should John W. Weeks, Secretary of War, be the next to go? A year and a half ago The Nation said Mr. Weeks was falling down on his job. In an editorial on November 8, 1922, we noted that he was failing to uncover the vast frauds believed to exist in his department or to bring to justice the known offenders. We cited some facts also leading to the belief that he was purposely sitting on the lid: his failure to reinstate Major W. O. Watts and his shielding of Colonel L. E. Hanson.

Since that writing the policy of inaction and obstruction has gone on until at last some testimony in the Daugherty investigation has disclosed the administration of Mr. Weeks as another public scandal. Reliable witnesses have put Mr. Weeks in a most compromising position in regard to two of the notorious war frauds—the Bosch Magneto and the Standard Aircraft Corporation—while one of these witnesses, himself a lawyer, stated unequivocally that the Secretary of War could be and ought to be indicted for conspiracy to defraud the United States because of his course in the proceedings against the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation. In spite of soft pedaling by big business and the commercialized press, Congress ought next to investigate Mr. Weeks and the War Department, where there is all too much evidence already of the same web of thievery, jobbery, and espionage that has been found in the office of the Attorney General. In a panic-stricken effort to cover this up Thomas F. Lane, legal adviser to the Chief of the Army Air Service, was lately dismissed because of his effort to assist the Daugherty investigating committee, and in true Department-of-Justice style his brief-case was rifled and its contents put in the personal custody of Mr. Weeks. There has also been a mad scramble in the War Department to hurry over to the Department of Justice cases that have been slumbering quietly since Mr. Weeks took office three years ago. Captain William F. Volandt, Assistant Chief of the Finance Division of the Air Service, inadvertently let this cat out of the bag when he testified to the recent need of Mr. Lane's services in connection with the Standard Aircraft case. "We wanted to rush it over and get it into the Department of Justice," said Captain Volandt thoughtlessly. Then ensued the following dialogue between Senator Wheeler and the wriggling, squirming, but helpless witness:

Q. You wanted to rush it over to get it into the Department of Justice while this hearing was on? A. Absolutely not.

Q. You had had it four or five years and never made any rush before this. A. We have been rushing it all the time, and the records of the air service will indicate that.

Q. And you have been five years rushing it without getting it any place? A. No; not five years.

Q. How long? A. About three years.

Q. And you very conveniently rushed it over since this hearing started and since you knew we had started to have some testimony taken upon this particular case? A. No, sir.

Q. Has it gone over now? A. Yes, sir; it is in the Department of Justice.

Q. When did it go over there? A. As near as my recollection goes, four or five days ago.

But let us return to the specific charges against Mr. Weeks made in the Daugherty inquiry. Captain S. L. Scaife, formerly a special agent in the Department of Justice, testified that the law firm of Hornblower and Weeks had acted in 1918 in what later proved to be the illegal sale of the Bosch Magneto Company, receiving a donation of 7,000 shares, valued at $420,000. Mr. Weeks was not then Secretary of War, but in 1922, after he had become such, the head of the Bosch Magneto Company suggested, in an effort to head off disagreeable proceedings, that all the interests "take John W. Weeks to Daugherty and put a quietus on this thing."

Mr. Lane told at the inquiry of favors to Mitsui and Company, backers of the Standard Aircraft Corporation, in the recent audit of the latter's affairs by the War Department. These favors, presumably known to if not obtained from Mr. Weeks, extended to the point of allowing a representative of Mitsui and Company to "sit in" at the audit and thus learn what cards were in the Government's hand.

But the most serious and specific charge against Mr. Weeks is that of Captain Scaife in connection with the Government's claim of an overpayment of more than $5,000,000 to the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation. This claim, according to Captain Scaife, has been scandalously delayed both in the War Department and the Attorney General's office, and warrants criminal action against Mr. Weeks for conspiracy to defraud the United States. In 1921, in a letter addressed to "My Dear John," Charles Hayden of the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation wrote to Secretary Weeks complaining of the treatment the company was receiving at the hands of the Air Service and suggesting that "everything that can be done by cooperation between bankers and the Government to inspire confidence in a legitimate way should be done." Secretary Weeks thereupon assured "My Dear Hayden" that the decision of the Air Service was "not conclusive"; that there was appeal to a "higher officer" and, still further, "to myself." The case, however, was forwarded to the Department of Justice by the Assistant Secretary of War, J. M. Wainwright, and Robert M. Lovett, Assistant Attorney General, sent it on November 15, 1921, to William Hayward, United States Attorney, New York City, for trial. Then, on November 23, 1921, after the case had passed out of the jurisdiction of the War Department, Mr. Weeks wrote to Mr. Hayden, apparently in response to a new appeal for "cooperation":

I will see Mr. Hoyt [an officer of the Wright-Martin company] if he will call my secretary and make an appointment. In the meantime I have requested that no further immediate action be taken by the Department of Justice until I have had a talk with Mr. Hoyt.

The case was stopped. There was another "hearing" by the Department of Justice, and action has so far been prevented by taking the case from Mr. Hayward and giving it to a second and finally a third attorney.

The Nation concluded its editorial of November 8, 1922, by saying of Mr. Weeks: "An aroused public ought to compel him to get busy or walk the plank." We would amend that now to read: "An aroused public ought to compel him to get busy and walk the plank."

The Books That Bloom in the Spring

THE plaint of the preacher is one which, as we have said before, we cannot wholly indorse. It is a pity that there is no end of the making of bad books, but a world without new books would lack a stir, a vividness, a cultivation of the consciousness, a high and pleasurable and, in the last analysis, philosophical awareness of life which we cannot afford to lose. Thus each recurring publishing season is a season of interest, of pleasure, and of expectation. Such a season may not bring a masterpiece; if it did we might not recognize it for what it was. But each season is bound to bring an increase in vital and thoughtful communication among men, some freshness of vision, some new cadence of verse, some story not quite an old story, some tale of reality that enlarges the vision and enriches the life within.

Recent years have brought about enormous changes in the publishing scene and the life of the mind in America. Our history is more searching, our biography more critical, our fiction more veracious, and our verse more alive. Biographers and historians, men as utterly different in outlook and stature as Henry and James Truslow Adams, Thomas Beer, Gamaliel Bradford, Thomas Craven, have tried to illuminate their own as well as the national past. What has happened in consequence is something that has happened in other countries—a reappraisal and almost a re-creation of the national past for the uses of the present in terms of new vision and new values. Closely allied with this effort has been the extraordinary birth of criticism among us. This criticism is not always serene, not always notably well-balanced. But it has been remarkable and heartening by virtue of the fact that it is no longer narrowly literary and formal in the older sense but sweeps through the whole field of articulate civilization with a fresh and courageous stroke. In this season alone we have Carl Van Doren's "Many Minds," Percy H. Boynton's "Some Contemporary Americans," Floyd Dell's "Looking at Life," Paul Rosenfeld's "Port of New York," Gilbert Seldes's "The Seven Lively Arts."

These books, like the newer biographies and histories, are all books that deal with values in terms of facts, writings, men. They do not embroider upon a static condition nor, in the manner of the works of the schoolmen, illustrate the fixed and dead by an appeal to rules and statutes. They are out on an expedition of research. They are the books of truth-seekers, if not always of truth-finders. They are turning upon our civilization such a stream of fresh ideas as Matthew Arnold was always praying for. And the stir in the world of thought and perception originated by biographers, historians, critics, has been carried far and can occasionally be seen in the pages of popular fiction and popular magazines. In brief, thinking has become almost good form in our contemporary literature although a few years ago no one could honestly say that it was regarded as anything but a dangerous pastime.

Significant of the change that has come over the entire field of American letters and American thought is the relation toward foreign literatures that is being established. This relation is not new. It is established, as Gourmont pointed out long ago, in all periods in which a given national literature attains freshness and fruitfulness and thus reaches out, as though by a natural instinct, for fertilizing pollen from other fields. We no longer import the trashy, the mild, the innocuous. Gone are the days when a Mrs. Whitney could translate volume after volume of Marlitt and flood the land with the false sugari-ness of that estimable lady. Anatole France and Jacob Wassermann have become powers among us, men who, exquisitely suave in the one case, somber and impassioned in the other, dig to the roots of life, stir the very foundations, call upon the hidden deeps. Knut Hamsun and Thomas Mann are making their way with American readers. These readers, although they do not know it (and perhaps it is just as well that they do not know it) are no longer mere seekers after entertainment in the hours when the true business of life is quieted, but have begun to seek in books that which shall help them to conduct the true business of both their outer and their inner lives. The number of such readers is relatively not very great. It is sufficient to have changed the aspect of American letters fundamentally, and it is this change that each succeeding publishing season accelerates and confirms.

Blessed Are the Peacemakers

"Not a 'Whatever, Whenever, Wherever' card has been signed; no religious editor has tabulated 'conversions,' but judged by Christ's own evidences of discipleship—reviling, persecution, and hatred—the greatest revival in the history of American colleges has broken out at Northwestern University."—Bulletin of the Methodist Federation for Social Service.

THIRTY-EIGHT students at Northwestern University, some of them ex-service men, are taking Christianity seriously. They dared, as The Nation has recorded, to stand up and dedicate their lives to peace. They said that they would never take part in war again. As a result Northwestern has been stirred to the depths; Evanston has seen soldiers marching once more through its streets, Chicago's newspapers have used headlines big enough and black enough for a first-class murder or divorce. The Christian pacifists have been reviled, persecuted, threatened with expulsion and bodily violence; one student, victim of mistaken identity, has been kicked out of a classroom; the cowardice of mob hysteria has blared forth as if it were war-time—and hundreds of thousands of people have been set to thinking about pacifism.

The most ludicrous product of the profession of faith of the thirty-eight was a community mass meeting held, with the cooperation of the American Legion, in Padden Gymnasium at the university. This was to reinstil "patriotism" in the student body and to reinstate the university with the moneyed militarists. Part of the Chicago Tribune's account of this expression of a free American city, at an institution of "learning," under the aegis of a church dedicated to the Prince of Peace, follows:

[It] was a rousing affair, reminiscent of the patriotic fervor of World War days. The "thirty-eight pale, anemic pinks," pledged never to fight for their country, were there, but silent and under enforced respectfulness. They heard themselves excoriated, ridiculed, and held up to public scorn, but only one had the temerity to ask permission to speak. He didn't get it. . . . Brigadier General Nathan William MacChesney . . . drew thunderous applause in his characterization of the thirty-eight as "spineless, pusillanimous pacifists" and his classification of Brent Dow Allinson [a war-time conscientious objector] with Benedict Arnold and Judas Iscariot. . . . "Though we believe in keeping open the doors of the university to all classes of students" [he said] "we want no one guilty of treason to his country." . . . Another speaker discussed throwing the pacifists "into the sewer with the other refuse." . . . Col. O. C. Smith, State commander of the Spanish-American War Veterans of Illinois, however, said the Padden gym meeting was too much of a whitewash for the university and not enough was done to purge the school of taint by pruning rotten branches. David Wollins, a pacifist who was expelled from Northwestern last Friday, came to the platform and introduced himself to Brigadier General MacChesney, saying he disagreed with the speaker. . . .

The Tribune added to its streamer-head on the front page, to its story, cartoon, editorial, and back-page pictures, a revelation of "How Dead Hand of Lenin Guides Youth of U. S. A.; Astounding Propaganda in Churches, Schools," and a persecution directory of all the pacifists they could locate at the school.

President Walter Dill Scott hastened to issue a careful statement of his and Northwestern's attitude. He claimed for both himself and the university a proud record of military service. He deprecated, however, handling the problem of the conscientious objector with "impulsive" methods. He reminded his audience that "it is an old problem and one that has presented difficulties in every land in which there are large numbers of Christians" (sic!). He did not recommend slicing off the heads of all these Christians as Diocletian's officer beheaded Maximilianus, although he recalled the case; he urged "converting" them by persuasion, as Alvin York was "converted"—he who came to shoot "an unbelievable number of Germans, and at one time took 132 of them prisoners in the Argonne Forest," 132 Germans for each of his fingers.

Perhaps the thirty-eight Christians and their sympathizers might not have brought about such a rain of modern savagery had they not happened to launch their views in the midst of a great campaign to raise an endowment fund for the university. Its publicity was more difficult to ignore than the resolution unanimously adopted more than a year ago by the [Methodist] Puget Sound Conference.

Resolved, that we commend the attitude of the Pacific Christian Advocate in its adverse criticism of the action of the trustees of Northwestern University in signally honoring the head of the United States Steel Corporation, than which no great organization in American industry has shown greater disregard for the Christian ideals repeatedly expressed in the social pronouncements of all of our churches. While we fully appreciate the personal and local elements involved, we feel that such action by one of our great schools tends to neutralize the positive Christian ideals to which we adhere.

The sensitiveness of such groups in the Methodist church affects the trustees at Northwestern, Methodist though it be, but little. They have managed to remain superbly oblivious of the memorial unanimously adopted on March 24 by 300 ministers of the New York East Conference asking the Methodist Church "to declare for an unalterable opposition on the part of our church to the entire war system, economic exploitation, and militarism. . . ." Will the Methodist church finally accept the sixth commandment which has been in their creed these 2,000 years? The "thirty-eight" have set an example.

Spring Realism

WHAT is real? No philosopher has ever told us; none has been able to prove the actuality of a single thing outside of our consciousness. Things are real that are real to us; nothing else exists. The daily newspapers slip into our offices, flatten out before us, and attempt to lure us into a belief in the existence of themselves and of certain crimes and market conditions and national crises; and there are, it seems, politicians in a town called Washington whose behavior is a scandal. They steal our money and barter our land and break their own laws. The odor of their grimy linen, poked into official closets and corners, has spread like a vapor over the country. We, too, should smell it.

But we don't smell it. The odor that reaches our nostrils is of sun on tarred pavement, of damp earth from the churchyard below us, and, faintly, on the southeast breeze, of the sea. The newspaper and its stories are infinitely more remote, far less real, than the shimmering outline of some equatorial island. Following the wisdom of our noses we go out into the street and down to the docks and aboard a ferry-boat. We ride out into a harbor of lively, believable activity—of barges and lighters and tugs, and, in its slip, a vessel flying the "Blue Peter," with steam up for Panama and the islands of the South. Reality is aboard that vessel and half a dozen others, all leaving for somewhere with an air of practicality and a matter-of-fact assurance. And everything that is real in us reaches toward the ships and the islands out beyond that quiver under a hotter sun and breathe a richer air—real islands, you know, solid as a hard-boiled egg, real as oatmeal and bread-and-butter. The ships and the men aboard them have sense and proportion. They are a part of a world where it is not held fantastic or romantic to come to know the alluring features of the earth's face. Distant countries, islands, harbors, oceans, people—these are facts that can be felt and tested, that can be taken for granted and made a part of life by all but romantic fools who believe that economic theories and political struggles are real and that China is not.

It seems a pity that, apart from sailors and their ships and a few other sensible folk, the far parts of the earth are visited so largely by unbelievers, by people who do not seek reality but who want to get away from it. Nervous wrecks and bank robbers and disappointed lovers from time immemorial have left their jobs and their newspapers and their civic-improvement societies and all the things that they believe in, and have made off over the face of the earth. Their motto is to "get away from everything." They become cowboys or sailors or wanderers in strange lands because cowboys and sailors are people in a book and strange lands are unreal and romantic. Such life-dodgers should be kept at home. The world should lie open to its natural friends who can smell it and taste it and accept it without a struggle. Every man to the things that are real to him. . . .

The ferry grinds into its slip; rude throngs propel us ashore. Equally insistent and equally rude internal forces shove us up the street to an office and a desk and a waiting, hopeful morning newspaper. Still protesting, still disbelieving, we plunge headlong into the untrue, the unreal, the non-existent.

The Scandals of the Seventies

By ARTHUR WARNER

Who shall doubt the secret hid
Under Cheops' pyramid
Is that the contractor did
Cheops out of several million?
Or that Joseph's sudden rise
To Controller of Supplies
Was a fraud of monstrous size
On King Pharaoh's swart Civilian?

SPEAKING in Congress toward the close of the Grant Administration of the frauds and scandals that had been coming to light one after another since the Civil War, George F. Hoar of Massachusetts said:

A great war; the time which follows a great war; great public debts; currency and values inflated; the exertion of new and extraordinary powers for the safety of the state; the sudden call of millions of slaves to a share in the government—any one of these things would be expected to create great disturbance, and give rise to great temptations and great corruptions. Our term of office has seen them all combined. And yet I do not scruple to affirm that not only has there been less dishonesty and maladministration in the sixteen years of Republican rule proportionally to the number and wealth of the people than in the first sixteen years after the inauguration of Washington, but there has been less absolutely of those things.

In the same way we may look back from the official debauchery in the wake of the World War and, comparing it with that directly after the Civil War, derive as much hope as did Mr. Hoar when he turned from the sorry spectacle of his day to the sins of the founding fathers. If it is any consolation to know that one's forebears were worse than oneself, there is balm for this generation in the almost continuous story of national degradation that was given to the public during the Presidency of General Grant, continuing in lesser degree into the terms of Hayes and Garfield.

The opening chapter was the uncovering of the Credit Mobilier with its trail of bribery and jobbery in the building of our first transcontinental railway. This great project, begun in 1863, languished for lack of capital until four years later, when the contract for construction was taken over by the Credit Mobilier of America, a Pennsylvania corporation with wide financial powers. The continent was finally spanned in 1869, the year when Grant became President, by connecting the Union Pacific with the Central Pacific, the one built westward from the Missouri River, the other laid eastward from the Pacific coast. Congress paid the builders a subsidy of $16,000 a mile across the prairie country and from $32,000 to $48,000 through the mountains. Nor did it stop there. The American people were as prodigal and careless of land then as they are of water-power, oil, and timber now, and they threw in 25,000,000 acres of the public domain as well.

Oakes Ames, a Representative from Massachusetts, potent in the Credit Mobilier, undertook to spread its stock among public officials not so much with a view to getting further favors as with the hope of preventing hostile action when the public came to realize the value of the gifts already made. Apparently Ames did not give away any stock, but he sold it at $100 par when its market value was twice that, and he carried his customers along without pressing them if they didn't find it convenient to pay cash.

In the presidential campaign of 1872, when the Republicans were running Grant for a second term, the Democrats charged that the Vice-President (Schuyler Colfax), the Republican nominee for that office in the forthcoming election, the Speaker of the House, and a number of members of Congress had received stock in the Credit Mobilier in return for services. Both branches of Congress began investigations (even as you and I), and—what came of it? Why (in the most modern way imaginable) all the accusations and near-accusations and counter-accusations simmered down to a report from a House committee the next year that Ames and one other Representative had acted with "intent to influence the votes of members" and should be expelled. But they were not. The House compromised on a vote of censure, and the scandal passed into history.

No doubt the original charges—made as campaign ammunition—were exaggerated, but even with all allowances the outcome was farcical. In writing the story later Woodrow Wilson said:

But many a detail came to light which showed that members carried very easy-going consciences in such matters, accepted favors without looking too curiously into their motive or significance, thought more often of their personal interests than of the public honor, and felt very slightly the responsibility of their posts of trust. It was open to any one who chose to believe that less had been told than had been covered up; that, with but a little more probing, it might have been possible to unearth many an unsavory intrigue.

Soon after a series of appalling irregularities in the national finances came to the surface. It was discovered, for instance, that the acting Secretary of the Treasury, William A. Richardson, had made a contract with a certain John D. Sanborn to collect internal revenue taxes "share and share alike." Sanborn had pocketed some $200,000 before there was an outcry and the scheme came to an end. Amazing as it seems, the men who inquired into this proceeding reported that it was legal and that nobody could be prosecuted. Perhaps; but as a historian of the period puts it, "Mr. Richardson's resignation was soon after reluctantly accepted by the President [General Grant], and his nomination to the Court of Claims confirmed with equal reluctance by the Senate."

But this was only a curtain-raiser for the frauds of the Whiskey Ring, a conspiracy embracing federal office-holders, distillers, and others, all so well intrenched and protected that in spite of the honest and determined efforts of B. H. Bristow, Secretary of the Treasury, it was long before legal evidence could be obtained, and only a few of the extensive gang of bandits were ever brought to justice. Mr. Bristow was unable to get anywhere through official investigators, but he finally succeeded through the efforts of a journalist of St. Louis (where the frauds were believed to center) in comparing whiskey shipments as disclosed by railway bills of lading with those upon which internal revenue had been paid. It was estimated that in 1871-1873 three times as much whiskey had been shipped from St. Louis as had paid taxes, with a loss of nearly three million dollars to the Government. Part of the graft stuck to private fingers and part was destined for the campaign fund needed to elect Grant for a second term.

Grant's own relations to the fraud were most unfortunate. When evidence was finally obtained and indictments were returned against nearly a hundred government officials, General O. E. Babcock, Grant's private secretary, was among the number. Grant himself, when visiting St. Louis, had been offered—and had accepted—a pair of horses and a carriage from some of the men who were later implicated in the frauds. Babcock had received a gift of a $2,400 shirt stud, but had complained because there was a flaw in the diamond! His loving friends thereupon substituted another (and let us hope satisfactory) jewel. When a letter of accusation against Babcock came before Grant, the President indorsed it with the since famous sentence: "Let no guilty man escape." Unfortunately, his acts belied his words. The prosecutors of Babcock complained of obstacles due to influence higher up, and although a number of prominent men were found guilty the President's private secretary was acquitted. The public was not so lenient, and criticism compelled Grant to dismiss his protegee soon after.

Simultaneously with the frauds of the Whiskey Ring there was a most malodorous bit of lobbying in behalf of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. In 1865 Congress had passed an act authorizing the Postmaster General to make contracts with the Pacific Mail for Asiatic postal services. In 1872 another bill was put through granting the company a subsidy of $500,000 a year for "additional monthly mail service" under various conditions which were not fulfilled. The subsidy was paid just the same, and in an investigation a couple of years later it came out that a fund of $750,000 had been sent to Washington to get the subsidy through. Some $300,000 was intrusted to Representative John G. Schumaker of Brooklyn and lesser sums to at least two other men. The public never learned into whose hands it trickled from those sources. As The Nation of January 28, 1875, remarked, the controllers of the slush fund apparently gave it to the trio with "carte blanche to corrupt anybody they could, relying on their reputation as skilled workmen."

As if all this were not filth enough for one administration, Grant's Secretary of War, W. W. Belknap, went wading up to the ears in the financial mire about him. He turned his office into a brokerage bureau for job hunters, and made a small fortune selling positions in the government service. He sold jobs over the counter, cash and carry; he found work for needy applicants on a commission basis; he had all the outward suavity and internal granite of an employment agency. And speaking of granite, he made $90,000 on the side through contracts for soldiers' monuments in national cemeteries. Eventually he overplayed his hand, the scandal got too loud, and one fine day the House of Representatives voted to impeach him. But Belknap beat Congress to it. A couple of hours before the vote was taken he submitted his resignation to Grant and it was immediately accepted by the complacent President. Just the same the Senate proceeded to an impeachment trial. The ex-Secretary's lawyer argued that with his client out of office the Senate had no further authority. The Senate, by a close vote, decided that it had, and then went on by an equally close majority to record its belief in the ex-Secretary's guilt. But as a two-thirds vote is necessary to convict in an impeachment trial, the verdict had to be one of acquittal.

The Star Route frauds were not brought into the open until Grant had left the White House, but they undoubtedly owe their origin to the political ineptitude and moral anemia of his administration. The distribution of mail in the West depended then to a considerable extent upon stage lines of which, in 1878, nearly 10,000 had contracts with the Government at a cost of almost six million dollars. A syndicate was formed consisting of mail contractors and both Republican and Democratic politicians (even then the two historic parties were combining when self-interest demanded) for the purpose of increasing the amounts paid to certain stage lines. The usual method was to get up "petitions" asking for an increase in the number of trips a week or for quickening the time of the run. Then the politicians saw to it that the "estimates" were allowed, and the swag was divided between the gentlemen crooks in Washington and the flannel-shirt hold-up men in the provinces. By this method the payments to 135 routes were raised from $143,169 to $622,808, while the pay roll of twenty-six lines was boosted from $65,216 to $530,319. It is said that some of these stage services did not carry three letters a week.

As in the case of the Whiskey Ring, it was hard to obtain evidence of the conspirators in the Star Route swindles, and even when it was in hand the ramifications of the gang were so considerable—and their mutual insurance system so effective—that prosecution was impeded. The Second Assistant Postmaster General, Thomas W. Brady, was generally believed to be implicated, but he stood off prosecution by making it known that if he were proceeded against he would reveal some correspondence dragging President Garfield into the mess. Eventually he did make public a letter from the President to the chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee, beginning "My dear Hubbell" and expressing the hope that Brady "would give them all the assistance possible." Brady declared that this meant that he was to get money from the Star Route contractors. The President replied that it was intended as a call upon Brady to contribute to the campaign fund out of his own pocket. The letter was at least indelicate and unwise, and another sentence in it, "Please tell me how the departments generally are doing," showed Garfield's knowledge of and connivance in an effort to shake down government employees for the party campaign fund.

Whether Brady could have made other—and worse—exposures cannot be told. Anyhow various excuses were found for postponing his trial, and it was finally dropped. For that matter the entire prosecution fizzled. According to the account of E. Benjamin Andrews, only one man was ever punished, "and in this case the Government was in error, as the man was innocent."

Perhaps the genius of the counsel for the defense had something to do with the failure to obtain convictions for the Star Route frauds. Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll was one of the lawyers, and it is doubtful if the records of criminal defense contain a more brilliant coup than his plea for a client who had served in the Civil War, before a jury in which sat three Negroes, all probably former slaves. Turning upon these Negroes one after the other, "It is for you, and for you, and for you," he said, "to say whether a man who fought to take the chains off your body shall have chains put on his by your prejudice and ignorance."

The Cruise of the S. S. Henderson

By CHARLES B. DRISCOLL

WE have seen the American navy at work and at play, and now we have come back to our desks to tell the world what the navy needs. We have seen the marines operating backward republics, and we have come back to tell the world about the fine roads that the occupying forces have built.

There were eighty-eight of us, editors and publishers, who set out from Charleston, S. C., as members of what was then called "Secretary Denby's party," to see the maneuvers of the navy in the Caribbean Sea, and to view the work of the marines in the island dependencies. Secretary Denby had planned to accompany us in the capacity of host, but rather pressing matters kept him in Washington, and while we were in tropical waters we read in the wireless news that our host had resigned.

The project was frankly an educational one, or what might be called, in the language of other days, a propaganda enterprise. It was a systematic effort to get the newspaper men to see through navy eyes the navy's program and policy. It was an undisguised effort to justify the American occupation of Haiti and the Dominican Republic before a group of men that might be expected to influence American public opinion. On the whole, I should say that the enterprise was an immense success.

During the long, tropical evenings, when mild moons and soft lapping of the waves make for the abolition of secrets, one catches glimpses of the sweating and planning that made this educational tour possible. One hears that when stops at Haiti and Santo Domingo were proposed high officials responded: "What? Take them down there where there is so much agitation? No!" But other counsels prevailed. Over his sparkling glass in a tropical cafe a high officer of the marines confides: "We were warned to be careful what we said before you fellows. But I don't care. I'm going to say what I think."

And so, despite the continuous round of receptions and the program of activities which, if followed, leave no time for mere idle conversation with natives and the humbler officers, one hears something of both sides of each of the situations presented to us.

There is the question of the needs of the navy. All the way down to the Indies, aboard the transport Henderson, we listen to lectures, two and three of them each day. The lectures are on many subjects, but the lecturers constantly revert to this many-sided topic, the needs of the navy. There is unanimity in the declaration that the navy needs to have the guns on the battleships elevated, so that we can shoot as far as the British can shoot, else the British may outshoot us in the next war. There is much emphasis upon the British light cruiser program, and a general feeling that we ought not to permit the British to beat us in the matter of building light cruisers.

But, on the other hand, our most scholarly and impressive speaker is a rear admiral who weighs his words and speaks with authority. He tells us that what the navy needs is another disarmament conference. He sees only folly in a light-cruiser building race between the United States and any other nation. Granted that the United States shall be ably represented, a conference to stop the building of light cruisers is the desirable thing, says this speaker. The pleaders for a big fleet of light cruisers are outranked by this genial and well-balanced speaker, so they fall silent.

All through the maneuvers, it is plain that the navy needs more money. Four of the battleships are unable to take part because their engines are out of order. More airplane carriers are needed, so that our fleet may spot the enemy's fleet and may keep account of the hits scored. This enemy is a very real thing to the navy men. Sometimes one glimpses the enemy as British, and sometimes as Japanese. But always it is as actually present as was the devil at whom Martin Luther threw the ink-well.

One becomes interested in outwitting this enemy of our republic. One feels that one is getting the navy point of view. And then one thinks of the expense and the energy involved in the playing of this great game. Here are thirty thousand men, in this fleet at anchor in Vieques Bay, and one stands upon the deck of a unit of this fleet, and this one ship cost thirty million dollars. Perhaps the rear admiral is right.

The American Chamber of Commerce has prepared to entertain us at Port au Prince, but the occupying marines, with characteristic efficiency, are closer to the ship with their cars, and they whisk us off. There is some ill feeling on the part of some of the Chamber of Commerce folk, and it seems that this ill-feeling is not altogether new. Some of the business men impart to us the information that the military occupation is not all benevolence. We are assured that altogether too many natives have been shot, and that the first grand sweep of the marines over the city was disastrous to native non-combatant life and likewise to American prestige, for the natives will not forget.

On the other hand, the marines demonstrate for us, to the entire satisfaction of everyone, that they can shoot. They can and do perform wonders with machine-guns.

We visit the Syrian merchants, and they assure us that the American occupation is the salvation of these backward islands. Revolutions are hard on business, they say, and the Americans put a stop to the revolutions. We repeat this testimony in a Port au Prince cafe, where we find an interesting gathering of native intellectuals and free-speaking marine officers.

"Yes, that's what the Syrians say," replies the senior officer. "That's because the occupying forces spent money with them, and they think of nothing but their income. But what I say is, let's get out of here. This military government is top-heavy. Too many political pets at the top, and too many big salaries. These late-comers among the political Americans draw the color line, and you can't do that in a country where everybody is black. The native constabulary is competent to keep order, and we could leave a legion guard. I believe in killing 'em while we're at war with 'em, and killing 'em good and plenty, but there's no sense in the way we're doing to 'em now."

We catch our breath in astonishment, and a black man, who is also a writing man, says: "He's right. He knows our people. I was one who welcomed the occupation. Now I pray for the Americans to leave. Our roads are costing us far more than we can afford, and they are good only for the occupying forces. Our people bring their produce to market on donkeys, and they must pull their donkeys off the roads when they see the military automobiles coming. The roads cost fabulous amounts, and to maintain them is worse. We cannot afford such roads for the conquerors to ride upon."

It is clear that there is discontent here. Maybe the higher officials who objected to our stopping in the occupied islands were right, after all.

But the officers of the occupation, highly placed, assure us that the discontent is slight. True, there is one Haitian editor in prison, and he has been in prison for many months without trial. But it is alleged that he not only made accusations against the high commissioner, a good American, but also cast aspersions upon the family of the President of the republic himself. It is predicted that this editor will be in prison a long while yet. Meanwhile, we are assured, there is freedom of the press in Haiti.

In Santo Domingo the air is charged with nervous hostility, but the people are reserved in their speaking.

"We are preparing for the coming election," they say, "and we are relying upon the Americans to withdraw, as they have told us they would, when we have had our election and got our new government working."

Preparations for the election are seen on every hand. The event has been postponed many times, but now there are big signs strung across the streets, assuring the people that this time the election will positively be held. American officials assure us that it will be an honest election, with no stuffing of the ballot-boxes. Repeating is to be guarded against. Each voter is to have a patch of hair shaved off his forearm when he casts his ballot, and if he is hairless on his arm, then he is to have his forefinger dipped into a chemical solution that will discolor the finger for several days. We smile at the ingenuity of the election officials, and wonder why such an excellent system should not be imported into New York and Omaha.

Will the occupation be discontinued after the election? The Dominican people seem to think so.

Over in the Virgin Islands the people are enthusiastic about the coming of the American party of journalists.

"We are Americans now," a middle-aged merchant assures us. "America has come and taken away our rum, and so we cannot make any money on our sugar-cane, for in these islands, where crops are uncertain, the rum represented the profit in the raising of sugar-cane. They have taken away our free port, too, and so we have not much prosperity. Heavy duties on everything. The ships that used to call at our free port now pass us by. We are getting poorer. But, if we are to be Americans, we prefer to be ruled by the navy men, as we are now. Our governmental expenses are so much greater than our income. Self-government is a luxury that we cannot afford, under American rule. The navy pays the difference, and is good to us."

In Porto Rico Americanization has had more time in which to work. There is intensive cultivation. There is great wealth, highly organized, and of course there is also great poverty, highly disorganized. There is politics, and it is working at all hours, but it is the voluble kind of politics that we are accustomed to in the States. It bears no resemblance to the sacred, secret, bitter politics of the conquered peoples of the backward republics.

The Porto Ricans do not complain of oppression. They merely argue for the right of a greater measure of self-government, and they argue hopefully and boldly. They were shocked by the silly blundering of the notorious E. Mont Reilly, and they use that episode as an argument in favor of the appointment or election of a Porto Rican as governor of Porto Rico. Some favor appointment of a Porto Rican by the President of the United States, some favor election of a governor by the people of Porto Rico, and some want full statehood. One gets the impression that these people eventually will get what they want, because they know the political game, and can play it well.

We are back in America, the land of the free. We read that the marines are active down in Honduras now. And we recall the demonstration battle that the marines staged for us on Culebra island: the bombardment from the sea, the swooping of the seaplanes, the fleets of landing boats, the uncanny amphibious tank that swims out of the sea and climbs up the side of a mountain, spitting death, and the slowly advancing ranks of marines, who know how to use machine-guns.

Yes, we can make them behave. We have the things. And a goodly group of editors and publishers is now fully equipped to deliver lectures and write editorials urging that the naval arm, with its marine fist, be strengthened by larger appropriations. The voyage of the Henderson was a success.

Light Sleep

By HAZEL HALL

Women who sing themselves to sleep
Lie with their hands at rest,
Locked over them night-long as though to keep Music against their breast.

They who have feared the night and lain
Mumbling themselves to peace
Sleep a light sleep lest they forget the strain
That brings them their release.

They dream, who hold beneath the hand
A crumpled shape of song,
Of trembling sound they do not understand,
Yet love the whole night long.

Women who sing themselves to sleep
Must lie in fear till day,
Clasping an amulet of words to keep
The leaning dark away.

Third Party Chances

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

II. 1923, Now—and After

IT is a fashionable liberal fallacy that the Russian Revolution has had no influence on American labor. This is like saying that the German Reformation has had no influence on the High Church of England because it still is more Catholic than Protestant. The Russian experience has profoundly affected the entire international labor movement, though probably least of all our own. For us its idealism is too utopian and its ideology too foreign. In the economic field it has, to my mind, done more harm than good by swallowing a hopeful development toward industrial unionism. But as we look back upon the year 1923 it is clear that it has served, at least to some degree, to frighten into greater activity the counter-reformation in organized labor toward political action.

It was at the Cleveland Conference for Progressive Political Action in December, 1922, that the pre-war radical and conventionally progressive forces in American labor first brushed up against this new left-wing movement in the political field. This wing split from the old Socialist Party in 1919. The historic but unsuccessful efforts of the Socialist Party have always been to force American labor into politics. And on this central issue it maintained itself as the official opposition in the parliamentary proceedings of American labor under one name or another for almost forty years. In 1919 the lightening of the Russian revolution, after it had deeply scorched European labor, finally reached our Socialist Party. The communist section ran away with most of the membership, reducing the old party to its organizational skeleton. But the Palmer raids soon after forced the communists into the catacombs of American labor, where during the next three years they led a necessarily miasmatic life.

But finally, in December, 1921, the impending Michigan anti-syndicalist trials smoked them out under the name of the Workers Party. Since then the Workers Party has been able to swallow most of the radical sects which have been freckling the left wing of labor since the war. Today it issues the Daily Worker, the weekly Voice of Labor, the monthly Liberator, and several allied publications. It has about 20,000 members, of whom between 5 to 10 per cent are English speaking. And, of course, it is affiliated with the Third International for exactly the same reasons that the American Rotarians are affiliated with the International Rotary.

The leaders of the Workers Party are on the whole quite commonplace, with the possible exception of William Z. Foster, who did not join the party openly until last July. Foster is one of the most projective and impatient propagandists in our labor movement and probably the ablest pamphleteer in its entire history. His knowledge of labor history and tactics is enormous and, sieved through his temper, gives to his mind an exaggeratedly Hegelian slant in which every bit of fact and fancy goes toward the molding of the labor New Atlantis. He has the rare gift of reducing complicated movements into simple and dramatic logic, without too much loss, but with that curious touch of unreality which is the main characteristic of those who would apply strict logic to society.

The national secretary of the party is Charles E. Ruthenberg. Athletic, well groomed, a fine and sincere speaker in the socialist and revolutionary vernacular, he makes an impressive figure on the proletarian platform. But somehow after the first few minutes the Trotzky spell clears into an attractive average American who in 1919 was advertising the social revolution and today is advertising a third-party movement. James P. Cannon, the national chairman, is a kindly and honest man, radical by nature, not by sophistication. J. Louis Engdahl, one of the editors of the Daily Worker, is much the same. William F. Dunne, in whose lone person bolshevism was officially outlawed at the last A. F. of L. convention, is a typical American left-wing trade unionist, with the courage of a prize-fighter rather than a fanatic. He is co-editor with Mr. Engdahl of the Daily Worker. Robert Minor's really excellent drawings of the pettiest radical meeting as the first rumblings of the Great Spartacan Revolt make one regret the loss of a good cartoonist in an artless man. And finally there is John Pepper, whose experience has been in the European revolutionary movement, a rather bigoted and embittered journalist, with an enormous "analytical" output on American labor, in which he betrays a capacity for fantastic misinterpretation which takes away the breath even of his comrades.

But in spite of the rather mediocre leadership and imported ideology the Workers Party has had something to do with hastening our labor movement into political action. It has driven the progressives in American labor toward the conservatives, with the result that both of them are now shifting to the left to meet this radical attack with a counter-reformation. It is in this sense, and in this sense only, that the New Radicalism is significant.

Now, no radical group can break directly into the conservative front of any movement. Accordingly the Workers Party is organized as a narrow, sharp, and jesuitically disciplined organization which is trying to bore its way into the progressive forces of the labor movement. And its first attempt was to break into the Cleveland Conference.

This conference met soon after the progressive victories in the congressional and gubernatorial elections of November, 1922, whose character its forces had helped to determine to some degree, especially in the Middle West and the Northwest. It met in a spirit of elation, resolved to carry on its Chicago program of militant nonpartisanship. It is this spirit of militancy which distinguishes the Johnston from the Gompers policy. The dominating group in this conference were the railroad brotherhoods, flanked on the left by the Socialist and Farmer-Labor parties and on the right by the miners and the other international unions. The central motive of the railroad men was to prepare the ground far enough in advance for La Follette in 1924, with McAdoo as a second choice. (McAdoo developed into their first choice only in 1923.) They had no intention whatever of conceiving a third party. They were just getting established as a political household. And they meant to use political birth control; some day, possibly, a third party might see the light of day—when they could afford it.

Needless to say, the Workers Party was an uninvited guest and was quickly railroaded out. Mr. Johnston, the chairman of the conference, is still too much imbued with his Salvation Army past to give anybody the bum's rush personally. So Edward Keating, former Congressman from Colorado and now editor of Labor, practically the official organ of the conference, acted as the strong man. His language somewhat irritated Morris Hillquit, a great stickler for etiquette, who tried to smooth over the unpleasant incident with an impassioned plea for political prisoners, for nationalization of public utilities, and against the abuse of the injunction.

Hillquit is the physician-in-charge of the invalided Socialist Party. From 1919 to 1922 the Socialist Party was really bed-ridden. And Mr. Hillquit's perfect bedside manner had a great deal to do with overcoming its nervous breakdown sufficiently to enable it to take part in the Chicago, Cleveland, and finally St. Louis conferences. Today the party is doing rather nicely. Probably it will never again regain its strength of 1912. Its enmity to the Workers Party is fully as bitter as the inter-socialist feuds in Europe. Still, of late, there are indications that the Socialist Party will try to assume the brokerage role between the various political factions in labor. This new attitude is largely due to Hillquit's tact and knowledge, to his almost uncanny suppleness of motive and subtlety of intention. He is so delicately agile that it is humanly impossible to trust him implicitly. But his whole career in the Socialist movement bespeaks a very fine honesty of purpose, in the long run, behind all his chess-like moves.

However, even Hillquit's parliamentary perfection could not remove the impression that the conference meant to do no more than "to punish and reward" on the old bipartisan basis. To the left wing of the conference it seemed obvious that the counter-reformation was still quite Roman and that it had no theses of rebellion against the College of Cardinals in the A. F. of L. The Socialist Party, of course, had to stay in the conference for the same reasons that the Franciscans had to stay in the church. But the Farmer-Labor Party soon withdrew. It was through with political continence. And early in 1923 John Fitzpatrick, the chairman of the party, issued a call for all good rebels to meet the following July in Chicago. The Workers Party was among those invited.

Whom the gods would partially destroy they first make foolhardy. Fitzpatrick should have known the first law of political pigmentation: in a red-tinted convention power gravitates to the crimsons and not the pinks. Fitzpatrick as a big office-holding trade unionist could not possibly head a red political movement. In July, 1920, Mr. Hopkins delivered the Committee of 48 to the then Labor Party under Fitzpatrick's leadership. Almost exactly three years later, in the very same hall, Fitzpatrick handed the Farmer-Labor Party over to the Workers Party.

The Workers Party wanted to enter the labor movement. It could not get into its orthodox wing. It could not even get into its modernist wing. So the next best thing was to organize the heterodox odds and ends. Heterodoxy is a shade better than heresy. And by last July the Workers Party was thoroughly converted to opportunism. The platform it suggested was, in fact, less radical than the program of the Conference for Progressive Political Action. But somehow through all their orchestrations there ran the red laugh of the revolutionary saxophone, subtly teasing the proletarian emotions, intriguing or provoking through its sheer elusiveness. The press caught and magnified this strain to the tune of the red flag. Fitzpatrick, Brophy, Kutz—all the other responsible trade unionists—had to bolt, but they could no more than limp off. The Farmer-Labor parties of Washington, Ohio, and Kentucky went with the rest of the convention, which formed the Federated Farmer-Labor Party.

The enemies of the new party proclaimed it a paper organization, which was largely true. The Workers Party did not create a real political movement, it did gain an American complexion. It became incorporated as an American third party. And though papers of incorporation are mere fictions, they are useful. William Bouck, prominent for a quarter of a century as a "dirt farmer" in the State of Washington, became the new party's chairman. Bouck knows little about the winds of doctrine in the Third International and cares even less. But he is symptomatic of far Western unrest much in the same way that Magnus Johnson has been for over twenty years in Minnesota. Johnson was elected to join Shipstead in the United States Senate, thereby lifting the whole third-party movement into national politics. And while Johnston of the Conference for Progressive Political Action is not on speaking terms with Ruthenberg, Johnson of the United States Senate is on speaking terms with Bouck.

Probably no one exulted more in the victory of the Workers Party at Chicago than Samuel Gompers. His age-long theory received its most dramatic vindication. Miraculously, John Fitzpatrick, Nockels, Brophy turned into prodigal sons. I interviewed Mr. Gompers soon after the convention. Boys will be boys, seemed to be his attitude. He was almost in a chuckling mood, in so far as such a fiery personality ever chuckles. Besides, Gompers appreciated that in Chicago the Workers Party also swallowed Foster and his Trade Union Educational League, thus practically nullifying the "inner" drive toward industrial unionism. And he also appreciated that the Chicago fiasco was bound to push the Conference for Progressive Political Action somewhat to the right, thereby enabling him to meet it half way and to put himself into an attitude of a subtly more benevolent neutrality toward the political unrest of labor.

During the next half year the Conference for Progressive Political Action vigorously carried on its organization throughout the country. It started local and State conferences in New York, Massachusetts, West Virginia, Ohio, throughout the Mississippi Valley, in the Far West. Almost everywhere it encountered the active opposition of the Federated Farmer-Labor Party but without much hurt. The radicals can hurt the conference only when it loafs, not when it works, for it comprises about half of the organized labor movement. And so the conference threw itself into this educational organization work, ably aided by its Socialist wing in the industrial East, by the populist movement in the Northwest and Middle West and even in the Southwest, by the railroad brotherhoods, and—to a lesser degree—by the miners everywhere. The conference was laying its foundations rapidly and well. At the Portland convention of the A. F. of L. there was, of course, the traditional plank against independent political action. But though the Conference for Progressive Political Action is rapidly developing into a third-party movement, the Gompers machine is by no means fighting it.

On November 15 and 16 last a conference of practically all the third-party groups outside the Conference for Progressive Political Action met in St. Paul under the auspices of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party. The Wisconsin, North Dakota, and California Nonpartisan Leagues, the Farmer-Labor parties of Washington, Montana, Idaho, and South Dakota, the Progressive parties of Pennsylvania and New York were present. The irrepressible Mr. Hopkins resurrected the Committee of 48 for the occasion. And, most significantly, John Fitzpatrick and Jay G. Brown of the National Farmer-Labor Party were there along with William Bouck and Joseph Manly of the Federated Farmer-Labor Party.

The St. Paul meeting adopted almost entirely the program of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party. The prestige of its two absent United States senators hovered over all proceedings. And when an enthusiastic radical delegate started to berate the Conference for Progressive Political Action she was immediately squelched, for Shipstead and Magnus Johnson are very grateful to the conference for its aid in their election. The assembled delegates then passed a resolution urging "the National Conference for Progressive Political Action to support . . . the efforts of established farmer-labor organizations whose economic aims are its aims in preference to giving support to either of the old-party organizations." And they decided to reconvene in one of the Twin Cities on June 17 next in a presidential nominating convention. The semi-official labor organs of the Conference for Progressive Political Action reported the St. Paul meeting very fairly, almost favorably. At the time it seemed as though there was a drift toward a united front of all the implicit and avowed third-party groupings in American labor and populism. But since then the oil scandal has given a somewhat different direction to this drift.

But before we go into the effect of this scandal on the political labor movement we must mention the third national convention of the Workers Party, which met in Chicago on the last day of 1923. A very interesting subdued struggle ensued there between Foster and Pepper. Foster, with the support of Ruthenberg, wishes the party to become an ever more indigenous part of the American labor movement, which would enable it to participate wholeheartedly in just such conferences as the St. Paul meeting. Pepper, whose experience in American labor is only a little over one year old and whose knowledge of it is practically nil, thinks much more in terms of the Communist International. The Third International is still, of course, the sacred cow of the Workers Party and its greetings were received with religious fervor. But not every day is Red Sunday, and American labor works during the week. The Foster tendency won out by electing William F. Dunne to the National Executive Committee, which now is almost as all-American as the average football team, though the bleachers are still crowded with foreign-speaking workers. But, then, it is well to remember that the percentage of foreign-speaking men and women is higher in the American labor movement than at the Harvard-Yale game.

Then came the oil scandal. The oil scandal has suddenly tremendously increased the immediate third-party chances of the Conference for Progressive Political Action and of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party and its contiguous influences. Senator La Follette is now very seriously considering running on a third-party ticket.

Senator La Follette would not and could not run on a reform ticket. He would have to run on a Farmer-Labor ticket of some sort. Under these circumstances his own Wisconsin organization, the Conference for Progressive Political Action, and the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party with its extensions in the Northwestern States will form the nuclei of this new party, with the general liberal, progressive, and protest vote as protoplasm. This raises the Conference for Progressive Political Action and the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party to heights of respectable responsibility whence they can easily ignore the motley left-wing groups whose support, to their mind, La Follette must eschew.

With these new hopes the Conference for Progressive Political Action held its third meeting in St. Louis on February 11 and 12. It reaffirmed its Chicago and Cleveland programs, only with far greater confidence and zest. The world has changed considerably since its Cleveland meeting. Russia has moved so far toward the right that the Workers Party is practically nothing but a corresponding member of the Third International, and it is trying hard to become Americanized. This does not mean that the big labor leaders do not thoroughly distrust the radicals; but, I believe, it is fair to say that—at least in the political field—they fear them now less than at any time within the last two years. What supplied the spiritual leaven to the St. Louis conference was the rise of British Labor into power; and a really nauseating disgust with the hopeless incompetence and corruption of the two old parties. Following a stirring preamble, the conference added to its Cleveland program a demand for the retention of surtaxes and the restoration of the excess-profits tax; for the taxation of stock dividends and undistributed profits; for the absolute public ownership of all water-power, railroads, coal mines, and natural resources; for the abolition of imprisonment for "contempt" of court without jury trial; for the Norris-Sinclair bill which would eliminate the middle man in farm marketing; and for a referendum on any proposed war.

So far the conference has been nonpartisan partly on account of the natural conservatism of the leaders, but even more so because during 1923 the railroad brotherhoods were marking time for McAdoo. With the apparent collapse of the McAdoo boom, the entire conference instinctively veered in the direction of a third party and toward the possible candidacy of La Follette. For a few hours the leaders of the big international unions wavered. But finally, under the brilliant and persuasive pressure of Morris Hillquit, the conference voted unanimously to hold a national convention July 4 next in Cleveland, "for the purpose of taking action on the nomination of candidates for President and Vice-President." And so at last, after forty years of struggle, the most important international unions which control our labor movement have come out for independent political action, for we must not forget that the Conference for Progressive Political Action officially represents about half of all organized labor in this country, and its more strategic half at that.

There is no doubt that we stand today at the threshold of a political labor movement which is slowly gathering around itself all the progressive forces of American society—much as was the case in Great Britain at the beginning of the century.

Winds of the West

By WILLIAM HARD

SO as I wandered in the West, in Illinois and in Wisconsin, a few straws hit me in the eye and I herewith offer them to the scrutiny of wiser meteorologists who may say what winds they indicate or portend.

"Milwaukee is radical." "It has a Socialist mayor." "He has just been reelected by a triumphant margin over a coalition combination candidate of the other two parties."

Is that a straw? No, it is only dust. The straw is as follows:

Daniel Webster Hoan, Socialist mayor of Milwaukee, was reelected by a triumphant margin consisting largely of church people and of home-loving, home-keeping women who wanted a clean town and who objected to the so-called conservative candidate, ex-Mayor David S. Rose, because his record was one of favoring an open, loose town.

Rose was for the American flag and the gay life. Hoan was for socialism and the home. Hoan won. Query: Was it a victory for municipalization or for matrimony?

Straw: There is much matrimony in Milwaukee under Mayor Hoan and little municipalization.

The voters of Milwaukee, while reelecting Mr. Hoan, gave him a non-Socialist majority in the city council and also a non-Socialist majority in his own administrative cabinet.

Simultaneously and somewhat similarly, while they eagerly voted large issues of bonds for such standard conventional projects as a playground system and a civic center, they were sharply and closely divided on the mildly novel and tamely socialistic project of a "municipal repair shop."

Many Catholic priests were for Hoan, the Socialist, because of being for morality, public and private. Hoan himself attributed his victory not to Karl Marx but to "the women."

Marriage banns announced in Milwaukee:

1. Karl Marx and the home.
2. Flag-waving and joy-riding.

Hoan was accused of being against the flag. Straw: Milwaukee went for decency with or without the flag.

Kipling has a phrase: "jelly-bellied flag-flapper." Query: Can it be that the jelly-bellied flag-flappers are losing their grip a bit—here and there—in American politics?

"Wisconsin is radical and unsafe for business, and business is leaving Wisconsin."

So they say, when they don't care what they say and are only talking through their hats as well as sniveling through their noses and crying into their port-wine sangarees at Havana while contemplating the ruin of a country which still can afford to give them these sunny trips to Havana.

Turning, though, from snivels to straws, behold:

The corporation taxes in Wisconsin, based on capitalization, were not raised in 1923 but they nevertheless in 1923 yielded 10 per cent more revenue than in 1922. Incorporated capital in Wisconsin is not going down. It is going up.

A large motor-car manufacturer transferred himself some years ago from Michigan to Wisconsin and has recently transferred the work of a certain motor-car plant from Indiana to Wisconsin. The State debt of Wisconsin is only eighty cents per capita.

Query: Will some voters turn away from La Folletteism when they clearly and bitterly perceive that La Folletteism in fact is not destructive to business?

The voters of Wisconsin voted last week overwhelmingly for La Follette delegates to the Republican National Convention; and as these words are being written it is doubtful if the Old Guard can carry for Coolidge even the one congressional district which four years ago it carried half and half for Lowden and for Wood.

A large straw: The State which likes La Folletteism most, and more and more, is the State which has known him longest and deepest.

The railroad workers in Wisconsin were all set to go into the Democratic primaries and help William Gibbs McAdoo presidentially against Al Smith. Then the La Follette people beckoned and whistled to them for help to give "Bob" a big vote; and thereupon in hordes they forgot McAdoo and went into the Republican primaries for "Bob's" sake.

With these railroad workers McAdoo is a hero but "Bob" is God.

Without "Bob" to distract the railroad workers in Wisconsin from the Democratic to the Republican primaries, McAdoo would have defeated Al Smith crushingly, although being "dry" is no passport to a victory in Wisconsin.

McAdoo's enemies in Wisconsin derided him as the "oil and water" candidate. It is the conviction of this writer that the water hurt him much more than the oil. It is further the conviction of this writer that the oil hurt McAdoo hardly at all. His enemies realized that fact. They did not lay much stress on his employment by Mr. Doheny. They concentrated on his being "dry," while much of eastern Wisconsin is "wet."

In Illinois an extremely high Democrat said to this writer: "I wish those investigations in Washington would stop. When we had proved a few leading Republicans guilty, we were sitting pretty. Now when we are proving everybody in the world guilty, the public is beginning to say: 'Oh, they're all alike. Bring on the good old straight ticket, either way, of our forefathers.'"

Three distinguished politicians of Chicago, who have made enormous sums of money out of politics, rollicked into a political club in Chicago the other night swaying arm in arm and gleefully singing a beautiful refrain entitled: "We are the three Must-Get-Theirs." They are not hated. They are liked.

Suggested generalization:

If political money-making hurts the voters in their homes and businesses, they will ultimately rally against it. If it does not hurt them in their homes and businesses but only in their theories and principles, they tend to view it in practice with indifference.

Supporting straws:

The famous Nat Goldstein of St. Louis, who was nationally and almost internationally charged with taking money for being a Lowden delegate in the last Republican national convention, was thereupon triumphantly returned to the St. Louis central Republican committee by his neighbors.

The famous Governor Small of Illinois, whom for years the Chicago Daily News and the Chicago Tribune have proved guilty of all sorts of minglings of politics and personal profits, has proved himself one of the most difficult men to defeat in all Illinois political history. People rally to Small and say he is being persecuted.

Query: Will McAdoo be more hurt by oil, or will he be more helped by the "persecution" which in the name of oil he is receiving from "the predatory interests"?

Straws that passed in the night:

McAdoo's train comes into a junction point. There is a round-house. It is learned that McAdoo is on the train. There comes for him a salvo of welcoming locomotive whistles in shrieking deafening unison. And so at the next point. And so at the next one. And the next.

The New Irish Crisis

By EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL

(Following the events described by Mr. Jewell in this article, the Irish Free State Government dismissed the Army Council and President Cosgrave assumed the office of Minister of Defense vacated by the resignation of General Mulcahy. The day after the cabinet changes were announced the outrage at Queenstown took place, in which British soldiers were attacked by men dressed in the uniform of Irish army officers. The incident was instantly disavowed and deplored by the Government; no connection has been made between the attack and the previous mutiny, although someone in the attacking party is rumored to have called "Up Tobin" as it drove off.)

Dublin, March 20

FOR the first time in ten years St. Patrick's Day passes "without incident." The columns of the local press are full of cheering words. "Hope has attained realization." "When we compare today's conditions with those of two years ago, we can thank God and take courage." "Law and order will prevail once more throughout the land." The Free State, one apprehends, is at last on the highroad to stability and enduring peace—peace internal and with all the world. There is rejoicing in Ireland. But there is also gloom in Ireland. For St. Patrick's Day, however authentic the optimism, finds the nation plunged in one of the tensest crises of its existence.

Troubles in a national army are ugly issues at best; when they involve the legislative and executive organism of the state as well they assume proportions of real alarm. Such a situation exists today in Ireland. All is shrouded in mystery, which stimulates infinite speculation before domestic hearths. No one knows what is happening behind the scenes.

It began, ten days ago, with news of an army revolt, peddled more or less wildly in extras cried about the streets. Two officers high in the army—Major General Liam Tobin, formerly aide-de-camp to the Governor General, and Colonel Charles Dalton—had "absconded," dispatching, upon the flying heels of departure none knew whither, an "ultimatum" to the Government. In this document the Executive Council, of which Mr. Cosgrave is President, was denounced for failure to interpret the treaty with England in a manner acceptable to the people of Ireland. "The I. R. A. (Irish Republican Army) only accepted the treaty," these officers declared, "as a means of achieving its objects, namely, to secure and maintain a republican form of government in this country." It was their considered opinion that the present Government had not these objects in view.

"Our interpretation of the treaty was that expressed by the late commander-in-chief, General Michael Collins, when he stated: 'I have taken an oath of allegiance to the Irish Republic, and that oath I will keep, treaty or no treaty.'"

Nor, it speedily came to light, were General Tobin and Colonel Dalton alone in their gesture of defiance. Scores of officers and men in all parts of the Free State had simultaneously revolted. Considerable quantities of arms and ammunition disappeared. Bulletins poured in from Templemore, Baldonnell, Roscommon, Clonmel, from Waterford, Kerry, Gorey, and Cork all concerned with armed flights and resignations.

The Dail met. The Dail is the Free State House of Deputies, in which each minister, and the President, has a voice. It was the most rigid moment since the defeat of the Republican rebellion in 1922. The army—or rather, an element of ungauged strength within it—had risen, flinging a gauntlet. Critical if viewed as a serious political cleavage in the ranks, it was yet more critical if viewed as an attempt to "involve the army in a challenge to the authority of the Government." From President Cosgrave down, all admitted the issue acute. Proceedings in the Dail, however, while a breathless gallery watched and the benches of the press were packed, seemed curious indeed.

It became apparent that though orders for the arrest of the officers had been published and earnest efforts were being made to bring army conditions back to normal, action of the Executive Council was instinct with concealed moves. It was imbued with a caution which both puzzled and dismayed. The "ultimatum" was read aloud by President Cosgrave, who, looking up from the page when he had finished, remarked:

Deputies will agree that this constitutes a challenge which no government could ignore without violating the trust conferred on it. I do not propose to discuss any political point connected with the document. I consider that in the circumstances such a discussion would be indefensible, and I may say that this Government has never discussed questions of politics with army officers. The necessary administrative and disciplinary steps will be taken.

But with this terse smoothness many of the deputies revealed dissatisfaction. It had been announced that the matter would not be threshed out in open Dail debate, but would be investigated by a cabinet committee. A murmur of objection ran round the hall. It meant more "secret diplomacy"; let all the cards of the Executive Council be spread upon the table.

Then as answer came a startling new development. Deputy Joseph McGrath, Minister for Industry and Commerce, arose and tendered his resignation from the council. This course, he explained, was not based upon the challenge proceeding from General Tobin and Colonel Dalton, with which he professed to be not in sympathy; it was based on his conviction that there had been "bungling, mishandling, and incompetence on the part of a department of this state." No minister was directly named, but all eyes turned toward General Mulcahy, Minister for Defense. Doubt did not exist anywhere that it was General Mulcahy's department to which the resigning Minister referred. What had, an hour ago, been an army crisis became in a flash a cabinet crisis. Now one understood why an armed "conspiracy" had not been met by a solid flank in the Dail. The Dail itself was in confusion. One knew less than before what the dilemma boded.

Discussion upon the floor of the Dail was smothered. The matter went to committee over the protest of deputies like Mr. Darrell Figgis, who stood for immediate, uncompromising grapple with the facts. If there was dirty linen to wash, it ought to be washed on the front doorstep.

Meanwhile, a second epistle mysteriously arrived from the two leaders of the "conspiracy." In it they explained that their "ultimatum" was not intended to be construed as a challenge to "the Government and the representatives of the people"; it sought only to call attention to "what we consider a serious menace to the proper administration of the army." This, to some extent, put the revolt in a less alarming light. "Absconsion" (the word was coined by Mr. Kevin O'Higgins, Minister for Home Affairs) depended, everyone perceived, upon the recent reorganization of the army, involving wholesale demobilization. From a force numbering at its maximum about 55,000 men, the army of the Free State had been cut down to something like 18,000—for purposes of easing the budget. Nine hundred officers had been let out, while the rank of many who remained was reduced. This had the effect of adding a fresh battalion to the already formidable army of civilian unemployed. Discontent is rife—augmented by the fact that the present personnel of the army includes a good many ex-British army officers. So that—this at any rate is the prevailing Free State interpretation—there has been less surging to the banners of Republicanism, less out-and-out revolt against the Government's interpretation of the treaty, than protest against demobilization. At a stroke, however, the graveness of the cabinet crisis was increased, the "conspiracy" assuming an aspect of side-issue.

Yesterday, March 19, the Government approached a breaking-point. The night before there occurred a tragicomic raid on a house in Parnell Street, where the I. R. A. Council was thought to be sitting. General Mulcahy, hoping to effect the capture of General Tobin and Colonel Dalton, lay siege to the premises. Troops arrived on the scene early in the evening. The place was surrounded; pedestrians were kept out of the fighting zone; tram cars were allowed to go through the block, but might not stop; a few shots were fired. It was a taste of the old days—days which Dublin does not long to see revived. There were amusing incidents, one so characteristic of the war-weary apathy existing here that it bears repeating:

The ground floor of the encircled building was occupied by a public house. At one stage of the proceedings a man dashed toward the door and was halted by a soldier.

"What do you want?" he was asked.

"A drink," was the laconic reply.

"Don't you know you're liable to be shot if you go in there?"

"I'll risk it," the man said. "I want a drink."

Meantime Mr. Joseph McGrath, resigned Minister for Industries and Commerce, had learned about the swoop and rushed to Parnell Street. He considered the raid fresh evidence of "bungling and mishandling"; he questioned General Mulcahy's authority. It cannot but strike an outsider as odd that a resigned Minister for Industry and Commerce should dash up in the middle of the night to take part in a military action; but Mr. McGrath was satisfied, he said, that "the sole object of the raid was to create trouble"; and, anyhow, such is official life in Dublin.

When the house was finally entered it was found to be empty. An open window at the top testified to the probable escape over the roofs of General Tobin and Colonel Dalton. Nine or ten arrests were subsequently made, and in the small hours of the morning the street was allowed to slumber.

Today—the 20th—in the Dail, discord reaches a focus. The air is electric with political cross-purposes. Again the gallery is thronged with citizens seeking some tangible knowledge of what is happening to Ireland. All the deputies are in their places; one seat alone is vacant: that of President Cosgrave, who has taken to his home under urgent doctor's orders. Kevin O'Higgins, Minister for Home Affairs, states that General O'Duffy, recently appointed O. C. of the army, has been given the additional title of Inspector General, which means that he is now in complete command of the military. The resignation of three officers functioning under General Mulcahy has been requested. General Mulcahy is himself taking leave of the Council—the second cabinet resignation within a week.

Mulcahy is next on his feet, vouching for the absolute loyalty of the army as a whole, but stating that he finds his position intolerable. "I cannot condone mutiny."

Implications are the order of the day. Ministers are repeatedly hinting: "If I chose to tell all I know . . ." Mr. McGrath arises and delivers a fiery address, referring to a raid staged last week on his own house in the interests of learning whether the two "absconding" officers were hidden there. By this time spectators are prepared for almost anything. Nerves are on edge. The crisis promises, moment by moment, to escape bounds, bringing the Free State crashing down. When, like a ray of beneficent sunshine, the soft voice of the Dail's peace-maker, Major Bryan Cooper, is heard. Steady, steady, this voice urges. The state is in peril. Let nothing be done in hatred or in haste. "Let us wait until tomorrow."

So until tomorrow it is. And the Dail adjourns. And armed lorries are seen in the streets, as they have been seen since the beginning of the trouble. Sentries guard the government buildings and the Bank of Ireland. And by every hearthside the debate goes on, perplexity weaving back and forth, in and out, anxiety mixed with that heart-touching stoicism born of long years during which each tomorrow has been, in one way or another, problematical.

An article on Russia, The Trial of a Communist Bank President, by William Henry Chamberlin, will appear in a forthcoming issue of The Nation.

Carol: New Style

Dedicated to Certain Worthy Theological Controversialists

By STEPHEN VINCENT BENÉT

*If Jesus Christ should come again
On Christmas Day, on Christmas Day,
To study the hearts of righteous men,
On Christmas Day in the morning?*

The first one said, as he passed by,
As he passed by, as he passed by:
"I see three thieves a-hanging high,
On Christmas Day in the morning."

The second one said: "What sinful men!
What sinful men, what sinful men!
Hanging is too good for them,
On Christmas Day in the morning!"

The third one said: "Oh stay your word,
Stay your word, oh stay your word.
Do you not see that one's the Lord,
This Christmas Day in the morning?"

"I know Him by His weary head,
His weary head, His weary head."
Whereat they all fell sore adread,
On Christmas Day in the morning.

"How sad this is we all avow,
Yes, indeed, we all avow!
But what shall we do about it now,
This Christmas Day in the morning?"

Primus:

"I'll run away as fast as I may,
As fast as I may, as fast as I may,
And pretend I haven't been out all day,
On Christmas Day in the morning."

Secundus:

"I'll buy Him a shroud that's spick and span,
Spick and span, spick and span,
For I was always a generous man,
On Christmas Day in the morning."

Tertius:

"But what if we should cut Him down,
Cut Him down, cut Him down?"

Primus et Secundus:

"You fool, do you want to arouse the town,
On Christmas Day in the morning?"

"My speech was rash," the third one said,
The third one said, the third one said.
"We're surer of God when we know He's dead
On any day in the morning."

They knelt in the snow and prayed and bowed,
Prayed and bowed, prayed and bowed.
And the two dead thieves laughed out aloud
On Christmas Day in the morning.

*As Jesus Christ was hanging high,
Hanging high, hanging high,
He saw three Christians passing by,
On Christmas Day in the morning.*

In the Driftway

MANY years ago the Drifter, with certain of his companions, used to while away some of his leisure hours at playing "school"—possibly on the theory that voluntary pain is almost pleasure. As he remembers these ventures into education, they were rigidly conventional and dour; the teacher issued orders to the pupils in a stern voice and if he was not instantly obeyed he beat them with a stick, provided they remained within beating distance; suggestions from bright pupils as to what they should do next were not received in good part by their mentor. In other words, the Drifter and his associates believed in education in the old-fashioned way—which is only another way of saying that they had never heard of a certain school in Mexico City.

THE Drifter is indebted to Mr. Frank Tannenbaum and the Century Magazine for the account of what they, and he, call the Miracle School. The school was started by one courageous man in the middle of one of the worst quarters in the city, a haven for cutthroats and bandits; no one had ever thought of establishing a school there, or of collecting taxes there, or of carting away refuse, or performing any other civic functions. The citizens were supposed to be beyond redemption or the wish for it; let them go their own evil ways, and rear their children in them, said the civic authorities—until the school was started. Mr. Tannenbaum tells a naive and captivating story of the school's beginnings in an old beer garden destroyed by a revolution:

... the walls and the ceilings were on the floor. The teacher called the children together and said, "Let us make a school." They did. The first thing to do was to clean the place up and reconstruct it. The teacher showed them how to do it. He picked up a stone and began to carry it out. The children did the same. There was no organization. There was no telling this child to do this and this child to do that. The children knew the place had to be reconstructed and every child did what he could or would. ... They sat down when they were tired and worked when they felt like it. ... All the children in the neighborhood heard of the great enterprise, and many came to share in it, because it was a happy one. ...

This sort of haphazard work, so decried by the exponents of formal education, actually brought results. The building was cleaned out, and the walls and ceiling put back into their proper place. But the children had tasted blood—nothing but another world to conquer would suit them:

When all the dirt had been taken out of the inside of the school, they began to clean up the outside of the school, and gradually followed the dirt into the streets of the neighborhood. Those streets had never seen a broom from the days of creation, and the first appearance of little children sweeping them startled the neighborhood. Occasionally, one might now see an older man sweeping the streets with the children, attempting to discover the secret that made the children so playful and happy at their task. . . .

It was all so easy; one tower after another fell before the conquering arrows of the young; the streets being swept, it became necessary for the sweepings to disappear—a parade of the children brought the Street Cleaning Department to their doors. When clean ground appeared under the piles of rubbish in the schoolyard it seemed a pity to let it lie idle, so the children planted vegetable gardens and worked them; the strips of soil in front of the school building were filled with flowers and shrubs.

* * * * *

THE children, while not neglecting the more aesthetic aspects of their surroundings, did not forget either that one should improve one's own appearance as well. Washing, unknown among their elders, became furiously popular; morning inspection, with a young and severe inspector, precedes breakfast; breakfast itself, prepared by young cooks, is followed by a grand cleaning-up. The school-day is a long one, but the children make it so themselves. There is so much to do—and, incidentally, so much to learn. It is at this point that the Drifter begins to hear the chorus of tried and true educators such as he exemplified so well in his youth. "This is all very well," they shout belligerently, "but what really do they learn besides sweeping and face-washing? Have they a spare hour—" this with heavy sarcasm—"for the three R's or any similar subjects hitherto considered essential to an elementary education?" The children would answer scornfully, he knows, but the Drifter, grown patient with age, is willing to explain. The young gardeners sell the produce they raise; how shall they know a fair price or a reasonable profit if they have not mastered arithmetic? Before they are given their land, which they own outright, they must be able to read the deed, and even before that they must send in a written request for their patch. Writing and reading become part of their curriculum because they have need for them. It becomes necessary to keep their savings safe, and the creation of a bank and a young banker lays the foundations for the study of economics. And so it goes: they learn because they must, and they must not because someone tells them they must.

* * * * *

WELL, the Drifter does not mind saying that he would like to attend this Mexican school. Failing that, he might almost decide to become a teacher there, not in order to teach the children but to learn from them. And since it seems hardly possible that he could desire to remain in one place long enough to find out all that the children can evidently teach, he wishes for moderate riches with which to make a gift that will enable other teachers to go there. For the nine hundred children have long overtaxed their first teacher; their needs are growing daily; there are a thousand things they must find out at once. They must learn about baking and printing and carpentry and sewing, and just now they have no one to teach them these things. But the Drifter is not greatly worried. Energy like theirs can hardly fail to achieve its desires, partly through its own fierce efforts and partly through the enthusiasm it kindles in others, even in hardened old educators like

Muscle Shoals—Sold

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. William Hard tells us about Henry Ford and Muscle Shoals; he quotes Senator Norris on the subject, and closes with the remark that it would be an impertinence to add anything. But I think there is something to be added both to what Mr. Hard and Senator Norris have said; I think the story is not complete until it is explained:

1. Henry Ford said to the bosses of the bipartisan capitalist political machine: If you don't give me Muscle Shoals on my terms, I will run for President and sweep the country and kick you all out.

2. The bosses said: For heaven's sake, don't!

3. Henry Ford spent an hour with Cal Coolidge, and immediately afterwards announced that he was not a candidate for President, and that the American people were fortunate to have so great a President as Coolidge.

4. The bipartisan capitalist political machine is now engaged in delivering Muscle Shoals on Henry Ford's terms, and nothing that you or I or Senator Norris or William Hard can say is going to make any difference.

5. America is moving with the speed of a hurricane straight to that social revolution in which it is not going to make the smallest particle of difference what price Henry Ford agreed to pay for Muscle Shoals or what price he didn't agree not to charge for fertilizer.

UPTON SINCLAIR

The Paris Correspondents

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I comment on Lewis Gannett's reference to the Paris correspondents in his interesting article on the Secret Corruption of the French Press, in your issue of February 6? The venality of the French press is hardly news. It was no more a subject for cablegrams to American newspapers than l'Humanité's weather forecasts. Mr. Gannett's inferences in his last paragraph therefore seem to me wholly unwarranted. He wonders whether "the achievement or hope of that bit of red ribbon (the Legion of Honor) has anything to do with the strange fact that these men who send daily cables to their American papers have not noticed the amazing news printed by l'Humanité." Even by inference it is a serious matter to attack the honesty and sincerity of one's fellow-craftsmen. I happen to be one of the American journalists who wear the red ribbon of the Legion of Honor. The others who wear it are well known in the craft. Nothing that any one of them has ever written or refrained from writing justifies Mr. Gannett's slur.

As fearless and impartial writers, constantly confronted with delicate conditions and working in a superheated atmosphere, the American correspondents in France are a credit to any country and to any craft. Since 1914 they have had a hard row to hoe. But they have hoed it persistently and successfully. The American public does not realize how much it owes to Paris correspondents. They ask for no credit, and they don't care to be praised. But it is only their due that those who have no facts upon which to base their inferences refrain from doing themselves the very thing they rail so bitterly about in the press, i.e., publishing suggestio falsi.

Friends and Foes of Jezebel

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Scudder Middleton's Jezebel seems to me to be so good, so poised, so sure that one almost hesitates to applaud.
San Francisco, February 28 JAMES RORTY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Thank you very much for Oswald Garrison Villard's magnificent summing-up of Woodrow Wilson's success and failure. I am from Missouri and he has shown me. I wish some one had performed a like service for the prize poem. Of course it is the very crest and spume of the poetry flood, but if an ignorant old woman from the high-grass country like myself had somehow been slipped into the committee of awards, she might have done as did Jehu, the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi, with the original Jezebel, and ordered it flung out of the window. Ain't culture the grandest thing?

I wish, now, I had burned some midnight oil instead of thinking that I must

 My daily course of duty run.

Complexes and Clams

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If I had been judge of the contest, Wilbert Snow's Advice to a Clam-Digger would not have received third place. The Jezebel and Parable of Paradise play to The Nation complex: there is too much nature and reality and health in Mr. Snow's Georgic for you jaded intellectuals. Long life to his poem—to that type of poem—and to Wilbert Snow!

Dreams in Arkansas

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Read this denunciation by the Arkansas Methodist and bite the dust!

GHOULISH TASTE

The prize offered each year by The Nation is this time awarded to Scudder Middleton for a poem called Jezebel. The versification is fair. In that respect it is superior to the former prize poems. It is less vulgar, is not so brazenly repulsive as the poem of last year; but it is really a glorification of sinful dreams, and is intended to suggest that we are guilty in sleep of that which awake we do not think. It slanders God and good men. It says "God is hard," and makes men hypocrites, saying, "We have torn off the lying masks we wear, and sown without the fear that we must reap." Either the poems are all so rank that only a rotten one can be selected or the judges have the taste of ghouls. Faugh!

From Clam-Digging Country

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just read the Advice to a Clam-Digger for about the fifth time and am moved to write a short note of appreciation. Not being a poet nor even pretending to be a judge of poetry it would be, of course, foolish of me to pass a judgment on it, even if in this case the verdict would be one of the highest praise. But perhaps you would like to know that to some readers, to be exact, everybody that I have spoken to here in the Puget Sound country that reads The Nation, it appears that had there been an actual clam-digger on the staff of judges the honors would have been apportioned differently. But that may be due to the fact that this is a clam-digging country, and we respond to things that are already in some way a part of our Apperceptive Mass (to borrow a term from Wundt—or is it Herbart?). This, in spite of the fact that, here at least, forks and hoes are both equally useless on the clam bed.

Poet's Praise

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I like Miss Taggard's poem. It is a good corollary to her Ice Age poem. Her picture of red lava running over the globe like snakes is uncommonly good; her idea that the world is to be saved from within itself is also sound philosophy; and her diction is altogether brilliant.

Whose Library Is It?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The strictly public character of the New York Public Library is legally established beyond doubt, both by virtue of its consolidation agreement and of that with the city of New York, which built for it the central building at an approximate cost, exclusive of the ground owned by the city, of $9,000,000. According to "Does New York Know New York? Its Library, for Instance," published by the New York Public Library in 1919 and written by E. J. O'Brien, the public catalogue of the library's reference collection "contains a complete record by author and title of every book in the library." And yet what happens? The intelligent and educated citizen, following the library's own suggestion "to go to the information desk on the third floor as the best way to find out about getting the reference department books" ("Facts for the Public," p. 13), and failing to find a book in the public catalogue inquires at the information desk about its existence in the library and receives a negative answer, departs in the belief that the library cannot serve him. It was such an incident that led to my discovery that the library maintains a secret catalogue of perhaps over a thousand book-titles, known as the three-star catalogue, entirely excluded from the public catalogue, containing many important books, known to an extremely small number of readers.

In my capacity as a serious research student I requested, and this repeatedly, that I be permitted access to this catalogue of titles (no access to these book stacks being allowed). My request was curtly refused. The officials said, however, that upon inquiry the existence of the book I wanted would be reported to me and the book read at the delivery desk.

The following inscription, quoted from Thomas Jefferson, exists in the trustees' room: "I look to the diffusion of light and education as the resource most to be relied on for ameliorating the condition, promoting the virtue, and advancing the happiness of man." But the present directors do not appear to be of Jefferson's mind.

Europe 1919-1924

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This is a great age for the feeble-minded. Propaganda and stereotypes are the old enemies of rational opinion. The public is not aware of the danger in which the world finds itself today.

We still hear talk of the disastrous consequences that a conquering Germany would have brought about. This may be true, but let us examine the peaceful world we are living in. France has lost her powerful friends, the English, who are grinding their teeth at French continental supremacy. Italy is using polite phrases in her notes. Germany is similar to a cow—a dead cow, which is expected to give large quantities of milk. Sixty million people are waiting patiently for an inevitable revenge. France is a poor country, but finds sufficient means to provide other countries with a supply of ammunition, so as to prepare them against any "attack." She is doing exactly what she expected Germany would do to her. Europe is now safe for at least two future wars.

S. S. FITZ-RANDOLPH

For Unamuno

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is a pleasing fancy of our modern civilization that the affairs of our neighbors are not our affairs and that official murder or persecution (while no doubt regrettable) are of minor importance as long as they are being committed across the boundary line.

Upon some few occasions, when atrocities have been a trifle more outrageous than usual, we outraged citizens have shaken an angry finger and have said, "Naughty, naughty!" But our admonitions were invariably followed by a communiqué on the part of the accused Embassy stating that "His Excellency is not aware of the facts mentioned in the letter to your paper. There may of course have been an outbreak against the laws of His Excellency's country, in which case, as all reasonable citizens will understand, it became the duty of the authorities to maintain peace and order."

As the record of the last five hundred years holds out no hope for a different answer from the present Spanish Ambassador, I suggest that we go ahead without further reference to the "regular channels" and take some more direct and practical action of our own which may, to a certain extent, relieve the financial needs of Miguel de Unamuno.

What happened to Unamuno is well known. Although rector of the University of Salamanca and recognized as one of the most brilliant leaders of modern Spanish thought, Unamuno has been exiled to the Canary Islands on account of a letter which he wrote to a colleague in Michigan. This letter was inadvertently copied in an Argentine paper and then appeared in one of Barcelona's gazettes. In this letter Unamuno criticized the personal government of Spain's synthetic dictator, General Primo de Rivera.

This criticism was not unreasonable. It was not even seditious. It was the sort of thing one intelligent man might write to another about some particular donkey, just then in power.

Professor Unamuno was a poor man and as the Government refused to pay the price of his ticket to the Canaries, he is now in a very precarious position. The French authors have already sent a protest to the Spanish Government, which in so far as we can learn has been relegated to the Andalusian ashean. D'Annunzio (who would hardly be suspected of revolutionary leanings) has started a movement of protest in Italy.

The Spanish Government, remembering what happened after the murder of Ferrer, will hardly dare to shoot Unamuno. He is probably quite safe, but also quite broke.

I would suggest that The Nation undertake to administer such funds as we may be able to collect for Unamuno. A few dollars go a long way when translated into pesetas. No doubt the University of Salamanca will be glad to forward such funds to the Canary Islands, which if I am correctly informed produce no oil and are therefore without political significance.

If you will do this, I shall be glad to sell a few of the ducats which my grandpapa stole a couple of centuries ago from one of His Catholic Majesty's obdurate subjects, and shall devote the proceeds of this transaction to the good cause.

TO READERS OF THE NATION:

As a result of joint conferences held in Chicago, St. Paul, Omaha, Denver, and elsewhere, it was agreed to call a National Farmer-Labor-Progressive Convention in the Twin Cities on May 30th next, to nominate new party Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates.

This Convention is pledged to the Abolition of Special Privilege, and the conferees designated as their platform: (a) public ownership of railroads; (b) control of money and credit by the people, through government and cooperative banks; (c) public control of natural resources; (d) preservation of civil rights guaranteed by the Constitution; (e) prevention of judicial abuses.

We will appreciate your filling in your answers to the questions following and returning to the above headquarters as promptly as possible.

Returns received from Nation readers to date are as follows: La Follette 80, Borah 60, Norris 55, Amos R. E. Pinchot 27, Brookhart 25, Wheeler 23, Murdock and Shipstead 15, Frazier 10, Ladd and Walsh 3, Underwood 1, "a Socialist" 1.

ELECTION QUESTIONNAIRE

- In view of the admitted corruption, lack of principle, subservience to special privilege, and practical identity of the Republican and Democratic Parties, as graphically illustrated in the recent Sugar, Oil, and Department of Justice scandals, do you favor a new political party?
- Are you in general agreement with the national platform which has been adopted as the unanimous expression of the organizations affiliated in the new party movement?
- Do you endorse the National Farmer-Labor-Progressive Convention called for June 17 in the Twin Cities?
- Will you attend this Convention and serve as a delegate if selected?
- Any local unit comprised of 25 people or more, who subscribe to this platform, is entitled to one delegate. Shall we send you a blank petition so that you can obtain the necessary signatures and qualify as a delegate?
- Whom do you favor for President on the new party ticket? Indicate your choices by marking an X in each column.

The Economic Conquest of Canada

By SCOTT NEARING

THE speedy shifting of economic control which has been one of the outstanding features of public affairs during the past fifty years is nowhere better exemplified than in the checkered career of Canada: a British dominion, at the outset of minor importance, pushed suddenly into the limelight as the largest market for British overseas investments, and then, even more quickly, deprived of this source of capital and forced to turn to the United States for needed economic surplus.

A MECCA FOR BRITISH INVESTORS

Until about 1900 the amount of British capital invested in Canada was small, the British bankers seeming to prefer Australia, the Argentine, and the United States. With the opening of the Canadian West, however, and the building of spurs to the transcontinental railways, mining, manufacturing, lumbering, and farming developed very quickly, with a corresponding demand for new capital. Said O. D. Skelton, writing on Canadian Capital Requirements in the Annals for November, 1916:

At the end of 1910, according to the London Stock Exchange totals, compiled by the Economist, Canada had outranked all other parts of the Empire. . . . In 1913 these borrowings reached their maximum. In that year, according to the Statist's compilation, Canadian flotations in London amounted to £47,000,000 out of a total of £245,000,000 capital subscriptions made in the United Kingdom, or nearly one-fifth of the whole. This movement continued to the very eve of the war: in the first six months of 1914 over £37,000,000 British capital found the same outlet.

C. K. Hobson in the same publication estimates that in 1913 British investors placed £44,119,000 in Canada, as compared with £18,000,000 in Australia, £18,000,000 in the United States, £15,000,000 in Brazil, £11,000,000 in the Argentine, and lesser amounts in other countries. The total holdings of British investors (1913) he places at 515 millions sterling in Canada, 378 millions in India and Ceylon, 370 millions in South Africa, 319 millions in the Argentine, and 754 millions in the United States. Thus Canada was the principal recipient of new investment funds from Britain, and, with the exception of the United States, was the largest single British investment field.

UNITED STATES INVESTORS ENTER THE FIELD

Investors from the United States were late in entering the Canadian field. The "Monetary Times Annual" for 1914 estimates United States investments in Canada as follows:

1909.....	$279,000,000
1911.....	417,000,000
1913.....	636,000,000

At the outbreak of the war, therefore, United States investments in Canada were a little more than one-fifth of the British investments.

Even at this period the dependence of Canada upon the United States was very great. While the bulk of her exports went to the British Isles, the bulk of her imports came from the United States. Thus, in 1913, Canadian exports (of Canadian produce) totaled 413 million dollars, of which more than half (215 millions) went to the United Kingdom and 163 millions to the United States. In the same year Canada imported goods to the value of 618 millions, of which nearly two-thirds (395 millions) came from the United States, while only 132 millions came from the United Kingdom. Thus Canada was borrowing in Britain, and used the money to pay for the goods that she was buying in the United States.

THE WAR HASTENS MATTERS

The war greatly increased the demand for Canada's goods. Her total exports jumped from 455 millions in 1913 to 1,179 millions in 1917. The amount of capital invested in her manufacturing industries increased from 1,994 millions in 1915 to 3,230 millions in 1917. A similar expansion took place in her mining, power development, and other public utilities.

Such expansion requires large amounts of new capital. Since this was not available within Canada, it had to come from outside—and from the only possible outside source—the United States.

With the war, the export of British capital practically ceased. The first three war years gave the American business world exceptionally large profits. Before 1914 United States investors had discovered the Canadian investment field. The war provided an added impetus in this direction. Ingalls in "Wealth and Income of the American People" places the total of United States investments in Canada at $1,800,000,000 in 1920, or three times the amount for 1914. He estimates that $220,000,000 of United States capital went into Canada in 1919 and $325,000,000 in 1920.

NATIONALITY OF CANADIAN CAPITAL—1919

The nationality of Canadian industrial capital in 1919 is suggested by a report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in which detailed analyses are given for some of the leading industries:

	Capital (millions)	Per cent Canada	Per cent U. S.	Per cent British
Lumber	$126	61	27	11
Pulp and paper.....	135	68	24	4
Agricultural implements.	39	58	31	10
Cotton textile	36	89	5	6
Building	21	57	41	0.2
Foundries	48	70	21	8

DEFLATION HELPS THE UNITED STATES

Many of these Canadian industries were started during the war on a "shoe-string" that snapped when the war demand dropped off. Such enterprises fell quite naturally into the hands of American investors, who were the only ones capable of making large foreign investments in the dark days that followed 1920.

There are no authentic figures regarding American investments in Canada subsequent to 1920, but on both sides of the line investment bankers have made numerous estimates covering the past three years. Thus the American Economist for March 2, 1923, says:

There are six or seven hundred openly known branches of American industries in Canada, such as International Harvester, Canadian General Electric, and General Motors, but there are hundreds of companies with Canadian names, Canadian directorates, and supposedly Canadian management, that in reality are finally controlled in New York, Chicago, Boston, and other centers.

In support of this contention the editor quotes a salesman for a leading office supply concern who reported that more than 80 per cent of his important business contracts with Canadian houses were finally accepted or rejected on the United States side of the border.

The American Economist estimates that in 1918 United States capital held 34 per cent of all stocks, bonds of other Canadian manufacturing companies.

The proportion rose to 50 per cent by the end of 1920, when the deflation period set in. Since then a fresh series of absorptions has brought the ratio up to 60 per cent.

There is a wide difference of opinion as to the actual proportions of British and United States investments in Canada in 1923. Thus the Royal Bank of Canada, in its Bulletin for January, 1924, estimates:

The amount of foreign capital invested in Canadian enterprises has increased from $450,000,000 in 1900 to something in excess of ten times that figure. . . . In regard to the total quantity of capital invested, Great Britain still holds the premier position.

By way of contrast with this statement, the Manchester Guardian Commercial of January 10, 1924, notes that Mr. R. W. Dalton, senior British trade commissioner in Canada, draws attention to the influence of American investments in Canadian industry, which are over three times as great as those of Great Britain.

The real question of the relative importance of American investments in Canada resolves itself into a guess as to the amount of American control that has been established since the depression of 1922. The latest official figures run no further than 1920.

A Canadian investment banker who has large dealings with American bankers estimated that in December, 1923, the total of United States investments in Canada was about 2½ billions as compared with 2 billions of British investments. If this estimate is correct British investments stand today at about the same level which they occupied in 1913, while United States investments have increased approximately fourfold.

BRITISH IMPERIALISM HELPS

The present economic policy of Great Britain is compelling American capitalists to take a larger and larger share of their production business into Canada. The General Motors, for example, from its plant in Ontario exported 18,000 cars in 1922. For at least one month within the past year British imports of motor cars from Canada exceeded in number and value imports from the United States. The reason is apparent. The British Government collects a duty 1/6 less on Empire manufactures than on foreign manufactures. This extends in the case of automobiles to those which are 60 per cent built in Canada. The American manufacturer by locating a plant in Canada can thus supply the Canadian market free of duty and undersell his United States competitor in the markets of Great Britain.

Should the British Empire raise a higher tariff barrier with the aid of imperial preferences, United States capital will be compelled to locate a still larger proportion of its plants in Canada. Thus British imperialism is laying the foundations for American control of the strategic economic advantages of Canada.

The situation is thus summed up by the American Economist:

American capital is year by year obtaining a more complete grip on Canadian manufacturing and commercial business. Branches of large United States corporations are being established in Canada, or Canadian companies are being taken over, at a rate that indicates economic conquest.

THE INEVITABLE COLLISION

The economic control of Canada has passed out of the hands of British bankers and into the hands of United States bankers. The political control of Canada remains with the British Government. Such an anonymous relation between economic and political authority creates a condition of unstable equilibrium which can be remedied only when the same group holds both economic and political control.

There is no likelihood that the economic hold of United States investors upon Canada will be loosened. On the contrary, there is every indication that it will grow stronger during the next decade.

Britain will hesitate long before surrendering the political control of this greatest among British dominions. The Canadian business men themselves are intensely patriotic, with strong imperial leanings; they sing "God Save the King" with fervor; they are committed politically to a "pro-Empire" policy. There are two possible solutions to this social complex. One is to have an American army and navy take possession of Canada in the good old-fashioned way. The other is to have American bankers buy Canadian newspapers, subsidize Canadian colleges, make large gifts to Canadian churches, and through a generation of careful manipulation institute a pro-United States campaign for Canadian public opinion which will justify peaceful annexation.

There is, of course, a third possibility, namely, that the producers on both sides of the Canadian boundary might throw off their imperial masters, join hands, and organize an American producers federation.

More About the "Other France"

By SYLVIA KOPALD

THE uneasy days that have come to France on the crest of the reactionary wave have given new strength to the protests of the "other France." If Poincaré's policies had won success, it is highly probable that a good portion even of this other France would have rejoiced with the chauvinists over la victoire de la patrie. As it is, the failure of the Ruhr occupation, the financial demoralization, the economic crisis, and the isolation of France have reacted most strongly upon the workers, the peasants, and the small business men. Hard times are swelling the volume of protest.

The situation in France is still so unformed that it is difficult to trace the significant tendencies in it. Several factors, however, do stand out clearly: The rapid depreciation of the franc has brought a sharp rise in the cost of living. The unions are concentrating a good part of their attack against the Government upon this issue. For several months now the rank-and-file response to rising living costs has been a "partial-strike epidemic." On the other hand, the very fall in the value of the franc which is bringing such hardships to the workers is enabling the employers to strengthen their positions all along the line. As in Germany, private industry is acquiring for its own, long-standing state monopolies. The May elections may constitute the first widespread clash of the "two Frances."

The cost of living indices presented in the Bulletin of General French Statistics issued by the Minister of Labor reveal a steady and rapid rise since the third quarter of 1922. By September, 1923, average living costs throughout France had risen by 239 per cent over those of 1914. During the last quarter of 1923 the rise has been precipitate. To obtain the real story one goes to the reports of the regional commissions instituted by the decree of February 19, 1920, and functioning in fifty-seven departments. The lowest index of living costs revealed by these reports for a worker's family of four showed an increase of 299 per cent over 1914 (Lyons, September, 1923). The highest showed an increase of 445 per cent (Lille, October). The budget cost indices for all the departments during the last quarter of the year (1914 = 100) tended to mass between 360 and 390.

The rising tide of protest, the huge "bread demonstrations," and the strike epidemic indicate clearly that wages have not kept pace with this advance in prices. The Bulletin of General French Statistics presents regular figures on the daily wage rates of coal miners which bear out this conclusion. In 1914 coal miners earned on the average 5.96 francs per day; at present they earn 21.31. The wage-rate index (1914 = 100), therefore, is 357. Against this figure, it must be remembered that unemployment has been widespread and that actual wages—a product of wage rates and the opportunity for work—probably show even a greater discrepancy with the cost of living.

The increasing unrest of the workers is an inevitable product of these facts. In the expression of their protests many of the unions have transmuted the bread-and-butter unrest into a direct attack against the policies of the present Government. At a great mass meeting of civil-service employees held on February 8 attacks upon the Government were typically emphatic and frequent. (In its new policy of "economies" the Government has drastically decreased its budgetary allowances for pensions and social insurance. The civil-service employees have been particularly hit by this.) M. Lartigue of the Civil Service Employees said:

The index of the cost of living is at least 400; one must have, therefore, at least 20 francs every day in order to live. . . . Yet the same Government which is refusing to indemnify us against the high cost of living is voting 1,500,000,000 francs to the Little Entente. The working class must no longer tolerate this scandal.

M. Laurent, secretary of the Federation, spoke against the increase of transportation rates and other indirect taxes. M. Rigail, of the police, pledged the support of the policemen in "the union of all the exploited against all the exploiters . . . , in the struggle against the reactionary Government. . . ."

These workers have formed a Committee of Action of Civil Service Employees.

The Economic Council of the Confédération Générale du Travail (General Confederation of Labor) has issued a lengthy report upon the problem of the high cost of living.

The increased costs are ascribed to the burdens left by the war, to the errors of the peace, and to the financial policies of the Government, among them the occupation of the Ruhr. Nevertheless, the report also maintains that

The failure of America and England to sign the treaty of alliance promised to France has increased the general insecurity and lack of confidence. . . . While we have been unable to settle the reparations problem England, hiding her ambition and her greed under internationalist professions, has grown rich without limit. After the German colonies and fleet it was the mandates over Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Persia; Britain's Empire covers half the globe. She is the great beneficiary of the war, and the Greco-Turkish War has merely served to assure the English domination of Constantinople.

On the other hand, a public manifesto issued by the Administrative Council of the C. G. T. during January says:

The French workers can no longer doubt the Government's responsibility for the constant rise in the cost of living. . . . No improvement in the position of the franc can be attained without a complete transformation in the internal and external policies of France.

While the unions talk, the rank and file have resorted to significant action. The past months have seen a crop of unauthorized, local, spontaneous strikes. L'Information Sociale describes these strikes in its issue of February 28, as follows:

Strikes have sprouted like mushrooms recently. In all the industrial regions of France, and particularly in the vicinity of Paris, thousands upon thousands have stopped work to obtain once again an adjustment of wages to the cost of living. But these strikes have not set in motion the working mass within each given industry. Not a word of common command has marked their origins. . . . One can compare these uprisings to torches which kindle, are seen, inflame the whole horizon, then go out, only to kindle again farther away, and go out again. There are innumerable torches of this kind. . . .

These strikes have become so important that the radical wing of French labor, the Confédération Générale du Travail Unitaire (United Confederation of Labor), is attempting to transform them into a mass movement. Its organ La Vie Ouvrière (The Worker's Life) broadcasts appeals like these:

No More Partial Strikes!
Let Us Prepare for a Real Fight!
General, Planned, Methodical Strikes!

To back these demands with definite issues, the C. G. T. U. has formulated the following program (February 1):

Six francs a day increase for all workers; 1,800 francs a year increase for civil-service, railway, and public-service workers. . . . Down with 25-sous bread. Down with the 7 milliards new taxes.

The C. G. T. U. is now engaging in a national campaign to transform the "partial strikes" into a general movement by means of these definite issues. In this campaign it is using its interesting comités de l'usine (works committees), built and functioning on a plan similar to the "cells" of the Communist Party in Russia. By the end of February many of the strikers had taken up the program of the C. G. T. U. But settlements made with the employers thus far have seldom granted an increase as high as the 6 francs per day demanded.

The employers are fighting this movement. They have

A FEW weeks ago a dinner was given at the City Club in New York which the intellectual leaders of the metropolis attended, in honor of Jessie Redmon Fauset. It was a celebration of the birthday of a new sort of book about negro life—no lynchings, no inferiority complexes, no propaganda. It is a romance of cultured upper class negro men and women in New York and Philadelphia. As impressive in their circles as the upper class white society which Edith Wharton and Archibald Marshall love to write about—yes, there is something new under the sun. Readers will find it in this stirring novel.

attacked the cost-of-living indices issued by the departmental commissions. For instance, the Textile Association of North France has made a now famous attack upon the commission's "over 400" index of last autumn, claiming that the index should have been appreciably lower. They have met the new campaign of the C. G. T. U. with challenges such as the following in Industry on February 16:

The great industrial associations, such as that of the iron mines, the builders, the industries of Lyon, have just taken a clear-cut and firm position on this question of wages: they will accept in no case a general increase in wage rates. . . . The industrialists must fight a combined battle. . . . In this regard it should be added that our industrialists have perhaps neglected the possibilities of obtaining foreign manual labor. . . .

But the employers have done more than fight the workers. Through the same situation which has brought increased living costs, unemployment, cut pensions, cut social insurance, and lengthened working days to the workers, private industry has obtained established state monopolies for its own. During the last week of February the Chamber decided by a vote of 365 to 188 to deliver the state monopoly of matches to private industry. The Government forced the vote by putting the question of a "vote of confidence." The central committee of the Union of Match Workers and Léon Jouhaux, secretary of the C. G. T., have accused the Government of deliberate bad faith in this.

Because of these new conditions, the May elections may bring a new alignment, although of course the rise of the franc consequent upon the Morgan loan makes matters easier for the Government. In its recent congress (January 30 to February 3) the French Socialist Party determined to continue its collaboration with the Liberal (left) Bloc against the National Bloc, and refused to cooperate with the Communist Party. The latter at its congress (January 20-23) determined to demand a workers' and peasants' coalition against "all bourgeois parties." The C. G. T. U. and the Communists are now agitating for this Bloc Ouvrier et Paysan.

Llewellyn Jones¹

By LLEWELLYN JONES

LLEWELLYN JONES was born in Castletown, Isle of Man, shortly after the publication of Darwin's "Origin of Species." The actual year was 1884, but, vide Einstein, that is unimportant, for the Isle of Man has its own time, which, in intellectual matters, is quite a few years behind European time. Hence, until at a comparatively late period of childhood he learned to read, he was brought up in a pre-Darwinian universe. This universe was first unsettled for him by his reading a bound volume of a magazine edited by Annie Besant. There was a serial story in it by George Bernard Shaw—"Love Among the Artists" or something like that—which made no impression on him because his love-life up to that time had been confined to a "crush" on a dressmaker. There was also an article entitled "A Letter from an Infidel to a Christian Friend." The letter made a great impression, demolishing, once and for all, the theory of plenary inspiration in which he had been brought up. Jones proceeded to learn the elements of Darwinism through reading in a file of a religious periodical the answers made to Darwin by the evangelicals. All these volumes, of course, were some years old, at the time, but that had nothing to do with the case—the boy was participating in the battle, blissfully unaware that he was a few years late.

Thus Jones may be said to have become an intellectual radical early in his career. However, he lived in a town which by American standards was old. The castle which gave it its name and its historic importance was built in the tenth century—at least its nucleus was. The grammar school which he was to attend dated from the seventeenth century, and the "public school"—King William's College—which he attended during a comparatively short term of family prosperity was indeed founded by King William IV. The town was surrounded by an even older country which the youth loved, in later years, to disturb with a geological hammer: tracing volcanic eruptions through the limestone beds of the south, climbing the conglomerate of Langness, finding encrinites at Poolvash, and tracing glacier scratches on the boulders of Barrule and Snaefell. The result of that sort of thing was, of course, a sense of the secular that kept his radicalism where it belonged—confined it perhaps to the real meaning of the term, and made him, in his emotional reactions, a conservative. It also gave him immunity from the American doctrine of success and the estimation of life by its productivity in money.

Before coming to America Llewellyn Jones had stopped a course of education which was designed to make him a science teacher in the English board schools—he found mathematics too much for him—and had gone to work on a newspaper. Writing was so much easier in words than in mathematical symbols. After some years of wandering he settled in Chicago, and while working in a publishing house he began to write reviews for the Chicago

Evening Post Friday Literary Review, then edited by Francis Hackett. Up to that time his personal interests had been scientific and philosophical, and he had read little fiction and only such poets as had been called to his attention by people whose own interest in them was mainly philosophic. His awakening to the specifically human and purely literary elements in literature he owes to Floyd Dell, who succeeded Francis Hackett as literary editor of the Chicago Evening Post. Through reading Dell's critical work—and Jones still thinks that Floyd Dell is a natural-born critic in the creative sense of the word—through Dell's assaults on his own work, and through his observations of Dell's life in the realm of art and letters: in other words, through his observance of this "moment" (in the technical sense of the word) in process, Jones was delivered from a partial and merely intellectualistic view of the life of the spirit.

Delivered, however, that he might proceed on a way perhaps wholly his own: a way essentially set for him by his early life, where runic crosses, ruined castles and cathedrals, and mountains which lay heavily and a little sadly athwart the scene even when sweet with heather or bathed in the stimulating scent of flowering gorse—where these were always in the background reminding progress that it was not the whole of life.

Perhaps, indeed, not any of life, for one of the earliest influences on Llewellyn Jones's mind was this same attitude toward mountains and heaths and the passage of time, as it is reflected in the writings of Thomas Hardy. "Jude the Obscure" was one of the first serious novels Jones ever read, and its disillusionment fitted into something—perhaps clarity of sight, perhaps some organic defect or infantile fixation—in his own nature. Of course the boy disliked pain when he had to bear it in his own person, but he also disliked the idea of it. And his first interest in philosophy was because he knew that philosophers discussed, among other things, "the problem of evil," and he naively thought that some day one philosopher might, by good luck, actually solve it. Even now, perhaps, were a greater philosopher than Bergson or Croce to be announced, the literary editor of the Chicago Evening Post Friday Review might be seen, sitting at a cluttered desk, thumbing the index (if there were one) for the words, "Evil, Problem of—" But it would not be done in a spirit of expectation any more.

The controversial side of Mr. Jones's work as a critic has been for the most part in defense of the idea, common to Croce and to English aesthetic thought, if not to aesthetic thought everywhere outside of America, that the artist gives us, if indeed he be an artist and not a mere artificer, a vision of experience as it comes to him at its face value. Those who use art to "inspire"—inspire who knows what cheap and cowardly people to what commonplace ends—are consciously or unconsciously prostitutes. Or if their product be honest they are at least misbranding it. Their customers claim that the world is so sad that they do not wish sadness in their fiction or poetry. And in the same breath they explain that there are so many pleasant things in the world that the author has no excuse to write only of the sad things. These comfortable people know that there is suffering in the world, but they do not wish to be reminded of it because then they might feel obliged to take some action in the matter.

This does not mean that Mr. Jones leans toward the other side of purposive art: the side on which the sufferings of the downtrodden are exhibited to win the pity of others. Indeed, he has far more sympathy for the cruelly worked horse of city streets than he has for the mass of the downtrodden human beings who have not sense enough to rebel against their position. This is partly temperamental and partly the result of a reasoned individualism. Although he has few philosophical beliefs and is certainly not a disciple of, and could not defend or even explain, any system of objective or subjective idealism, Mr. Jones has never been able to get away from the prior situation—so to speak—of idealism and over to the behaviorists: that is to say, he has never been able to explain away the fact of consciousness and that all we know of the outer world is in terms, however limited, of our particular human level of consciousness. There is one philosophical work which has done more perhaps than any other to shape Jones's later mental development: "Individualism," by Warner Fite, a book which for the first time to Jones's knowledge systematically studied the social relations of man and the nature of human progress in terms of the consciousness and self-consciousness of the individual. In summary, Mr. Fite's theory is that consciousness is a meeting of the many in the one which can, as it develops, make subtler and subtler adjustments of what to a simple consciousness would be alien or hostile elements. Conflict therefore is always a sign of the inadequacy of consciousness: two billiard balls going in opposite directions along the same straight line must collide; two conscious beings pursuing such a course need not collide. The fully conscious man (not yet born of course) may legitimately expect to attain all his ends, without any self-sacrifice, but he can do this only by adjusting them to the ends of every other fully conscious man. But these ends can only be announced by each conscious man for himself: for instance, we cannot say the rights of labor are such and such and we will help labor to fight the capitalist. Labor itself must clearly think out its rights: if it cannot think its rights, it ipso facto has no rights; but when it has thought out its rights it can use the capitalist as the means for attaining its ends, even as the capitalist uses the laborer for the attainment of his ends, each being an end for himself as well as a means for the other. In brief, Mr. Fite would restore, as he himself says, but, of course, with new meanings, the exploded doctrines of rational egoism, natural rights, and the social contract.

"But," the reader may remark, "you have told us that this Mr. Jones, about whom you appear to know so much, is a pessimist and a disciple of Hardy, who is certainly a monist of some Haeckel-like variety, that he deserted his intellectualist views of life and art under the influence of that youth—whom I always considered something of a reprobate—Floyd Dell, and now you make him out the disciple of a philosopher who is certainly an idealist as against a mechanist, who is certainly a rationalist as against an emotionalist, and who is by no means a sentimentalist—while Jones certainly skirts sentimentalism closely with his mountains and overworked horses and things."

But I, dear reader, am not to blame for that. If Jones happens to be inconsistent, or if he has not yet won through to a unified view of life, I, as his apologist, cannot help it. And I think that as long as Jones is only setting up as a critic of literature, all that the world can ask of him is that he hold a consistent aesthetic: especially as he has, in late years, confined his public interests to aesthetic criticism.

And Jones does have a consistent aesthetic. He has not been swept off his feet by recent attempts, for instance, to interpret art in terms of psychoanalysis. Although he does not feel competent to accept or to reject the neo-idealism of Croce, he belongs to the school of critics who have learned, if not what art is, at least what it is not, from the writings of Croce. And, put in non-technical language, his view of art is that it is experience, of the outer world or of the inner, symbolized by the artist in certain techniques that enable the reader to repeat in his own consciousness approximately the experience which the artist wished to record; that the whole significance of art lies in expressing for the artist and recreating for his public those experiences in their original unity, before they have been broken up by the conceptual judgment for our practical action on them or by the moral judgment for our moral approval of them; that, in a world which we have to subject to practical exigencies all the time, it is only through the life of art that we can live completely and not as a superior sort of animal; that psychologically the critic's function is not to sit in judgment but to re-experience what the artist has experienced; and that, practically, his function is to help other people so to re-experience the artist's vision, or, if he find that there is no vision to reexperience, to show wherein other than aesthetic motives have entered into the artist's work and how they have vitiated them. And if the reader wishes to know how Jones arrived at this point of view, I refer him to Croce's "Aesthetic," to J. E. Spingarn's "The New Criticism," and to Lascelles Abercrombie's "Toward a Theory of Art" and "The Theory of Poetry." For in those books Jones found what he would call his theoretical aesthetic salvation.

The only critical bad habit of which Jones is accused is his guerrilla warfare on people who have views about verse structure which differ from his. He is supposed to have read every book on English metrics published in twenty years, and his own writings on the subject have stirred up the disciples of Lanier and also the free-verse propagandists to voluble disagreement. The theory of English verse he holds may be put in a sentence: all good English verse is free verse, but unless it is written in a fixed pattern we do not get the full benefit of the free cadences.

And that is Jones—part of him. But when he reads this article he, having to acknowledge it as approximately true, will wish, as long as it is so, that it were so for more of the time; wish, indeed, that, being as he is described above, he were that more of the time, and a citizen, a taxpayer, a pedestrian unit in the census figures less of the time. Indeed, he may even be reminded, mutatis mutandis, of a poem by W. H. Davies entitled "Confession":

One hour in every hundred hours
I sing of childhood, birds, and flowers;
Who reads my character in song
Will not see much in me that's wrong.

But in my ninety hours and nine
I would not tell what thoughts are mine:
They're not so pure as find their words
In songs of childhood, flowers, and birds.

Two American Poets: A Study in Possibilities

By FLOYD DELL

THE last quarter of the nineteenth century is to me a peculiarly interesting period. It was the period in which my own generation was born and brought up; it was, moreover, a period in which the whole world was being vastly and rapidly changed. In that period the writers and artists of all sorts who are now coming to occupy the attention of the public spent their youth; from that period they received the influences which have, with some mysterious assistance from temperament, made them what they are. It has occurred to me to compare and contrast two American lives conditioned by those influences, in order to see what different effects the same quarter-century could have on two different minds.

As one of the subjects of such a comparison I have taken the poet Vachel Lindsay. The other is a poet unknown to any except an occasional collector of rare and curious books. His name, Park Barnitz.

Park Barnitz was born in Kansas in the year 1877. He went to the State university in Colorado, and later to Harvard, where, so my information goes, "he was a favorite pupil of Barrett Wendell and William James." He is said to have had "a remarkable knowledge of art and musical history, of the world's literature, of languages, and of philosophy." He seems also to have been aware, in his fashion, of the crude and boisterous American civilization of his time, and he did not like it; he preferred his beautiful dreams, and he took to drugs to cultivate these dreams and make himself indifferent to the ugliness of the contemporary scene.

In the first year of the twentieth century he summed up, in a little book of poems, his impressions of the quarter-century through which he had lived; and in the following year he died, at the age of twenty-five, of drugs.

His impressions of that quarter-century may be gleaned from the titles of his poems: Ennui, Litany, Helas! Changelessness, Monotony, Scorn, The Grotesques, Sepulchral Life, etc. But to taste the specific flavor of this young Kansan's response to the noisy and enterprising American life of his time, it is necessary to read at least a stanza entire:

I am a little weary of the Persian
Girl that I lov'd; I am quite tir'd of love;
And I am weary of
The smoking censers, and the sweet diversion
Of stroking Leila's jasmine-scented hair,
I thought so fair.

One recognizes, of course, the Persian girl, the jasmine-scented hair, the smoking censers as characteristic and familiar features of a young poet's life in Kansas, Colorado, and Cambridge, Massachusetts. At any rate, these were what Park Barnitz, with the helpful assistance of drugs, saw in America during the nineties.

His slim volume ("The Book of Jade," Doxey's, San Francisco, 1901) is dedicated "to the memory of Charles Baudelaire"; the contents are echoes, thin and vain, of Baudelaire, Wilde, Swinburne, Gautier, Dowson. These were among the chief literary influences of the time, and it is not strange that a young American who was interested in literature should have had a mind open to such influences. What really is strange is that these influences should have so utterly squeezed out from his mind every memory of Kansas and Colorado and Cambridge. But so it was; and since a man is what he makes of his memories of life, it may be said that these influences squeezed out all that was Park Barnitz.

Let us turn to Vachel Lindsay.

Vachel Lindsay was born two years later than Park Barnitz, and only a few hundred miles away—in 1879, in Springfield, Illinois. In his early youth he decided to be a pictorial artist. His youthful drawings may be seen in his privately printed "Village Magazine." And they are, with all their differences of temperament, oddly reminiscent of Park Barnitz's poems. Young Barnitz's poems were Baudelaire-and-water; young Lindsay's pictures were Beardsley-and-milk—the milk of infantile innocence. Such visual perceptions as young Lindsay had of the outside world were not sufficiently dear to him to cherish; he, too, preferred his dreams, which smack of the Yellow Book, of Flaxman, of Japanese prints, of Blake—of anything but Springfield, Illinois. Springfield was to him merely "the city of my discontent." If he liked to look at the obelisk-decked tomb of Lincoln it was because he could fancy himself looking at something in Egypt, where he would much rather have been. The fact is, he had turned his back upon the outside world—because it was ugly. And—as a pictorial artist—he lacked the imaginative and intellectual sympathy which could have found a meaning in that ugliness. If he had found meaning in it he would have found beauty in it, and he would have drawn pictures of it rather than of soap bubbles.

It is not so different, after all, it would seem, from the story of Park Barnitz.

But young Lindsay also intended to be a poet. This, you say, was his real forte. Yet, as a poet, he began to play the same trick of turning his back upon actual life—with the same results. He shut his eyes to Springfield, and dreamed—of India, of China, of the moon, of the nursery paradise of Mother Goose. There are many exotic themes in his collected poems, as well as many pages of mere effervescent nursery nonsense.

But his dreams began to take on a Utopian tinge; and one must look, not away from, but through and beyond the actual world, to see Utopia. He wasn't quite content to dream of beauty; he wanted to see it come true. Ancient Greece had been beautiful; why couldn't Springfield be beautiful, too?

We should build parks that students from afar
Would choose to starve in, rather than go home,
Fair little squares with Phidian ornament,
Food for the spirit, milk and honeycomb.

Say, is my prophecy too fair and far?
I only know, unless her faith be high,
The soul of this our Nineveh is doomed,
Our little Babylon will surely die.

It was in the light of this Utopian faith that Springfield became interesting to the young poet. It occurred to him that "no picture-palace in a fairy-book" housed such poignant emotions as these familiar roofs. He was not alien from these people; they, too, desired beauty. True, they desired it in an American, middle-western, religious, reformistic manner. But the wish to create a new and splendid world was at the heart of these tiresome old "causes." And so we find him, in his poems, talking to "the sister with the little pinched face, the busy little sister with the funny little tract"; we find him telling "Why I Voted the Socialist Ticket," explaining why "Factory Windows Are Always Broken," and celebrating "torchlights down the street to the end of the world."

Of course, the sympathetic understanding of these passionate causes does not make a poet; with that alone, Vachel Lindsay would have been a temperance lecturer, a political reformer, a radical "spellbinder" at the utmost—or, not impossibly, a banker, and a member of the local Rotary Club, with a penchant for delivering graduation day addresses with a touch of inspirational eloquence in them. It was a streak of laziness in young Vachel which saved him from that, made him critical of the largely meaningless bustle of American business; that, together with the genuinely religious streak in his nature. Laziness and religion make the mystic, and sometimes the poet. Vachel Lindsay was happily compelled by this whimsical part of his disposition to cherish useless things, such as leisure and beauty, and defend them passionately against the encroachments of the machine age. He must admire gallantry, and will speak up even for the Devil when the Devil has fought bravely. This keeps him out of the narrow rut of strictly ethical preoccupations; it makes him a citizen of a large, lovely world, full of lost causes and desperate hopes.

His failure as a pictorial artist and his success as a poet have here been considered consecutively, but as a matter of fact—so complex is human nature—they were contemporaneous. While he was shutting his artist's eyes to the world about him, he was opening his poet's eyes to that world. But he was still singing in tunes learned from books, and they did not fit his themes. The America which he was celebrating was an America of the uplifted voice—an America of camp-meetings, Fourth of July orations, political rallies, Salvation Army meetings, temperance lectures, funeral sermons. Vachel Lindsay had been cradled in this eloquence and song, and yet he had written his verses according to the text-books.

It was perhaps a mere happy accident when he wrote of "the death of the leader of the Salvation Army, and the poem sang itself to a kind of Salvation Army tune. "General William Booth Enters Into Heaven"—and he enters to the tunes he knew so well. "The banjoes rattled, and the tambourines"—and everyone could hear them, in the poem. It caught the ear of every man who had ever stopped on a street-corner to listen to the "big voiced lasses," "tranced, fanatical," that "shrieked and sang," gathering in their "unwashed legions with the ways of death."

That was the beginning. Since then Vachel Lindsay has taught us to chant his poems to a thousand tunes that are as much a part of our American life as the subject-matter of his poems. "Fat black bucks in a wine-barrel room . . ." "I am the Kallyope, Kallyope, Kallyope . . ." "Listen to the fast-horn, kill-horn, blast-horn!" "Listen to the music of the Fireman's Ball!" The America of the uplifted voice, not yet destroyed by the machine-process, finds its place in poetry and in the hearts of the lovers of beauty.

That is the end of my comparison. I do not want to draw any rash conclusions from it. Is it too rash a conclusion to think that, however poor the world one lives in, it is a great deal better than none at all, even for so sensitive and particular a person as a poet?

British Policy in the Near East

The Struggle for Power in Moslem Asia. By E. Alexander Powell. The Century Company. $2.50.

THE struggle for power between Europe and Asia, which is the theme of Herodotus, has been the most important issue in world politics ever since his time and is so still. Most modern Europeans, owing to inadequate knowledge of history, regard the supremacy of Europe as a law of nature, but in fact there has been a slow oscillation which is now beginning to swing in favor of Asia. Xerxes represented a culmination of Asiatic power; from Alexander to the fall of Rome Europe had the ascendancy; then came a millennium of Asiatic supremacy, represented by Attila, Mohammed, Genghis Khan, and the Turkish conquest of Southeastern Europe. The subsequent conquests by European nations are due to the fact that the West invented science, which it applied to industrialism and war. It should, however, have been evident that sooner or later Asiatics would learn what we had to teach. The Japanese learned first, and achieved equality with white nations; now the Turks, profiting by German instruction before and during the war, have inaugurated the liberation of Western Asia. It should be regarded as nearly certain that all Asia will achieve independence during the next fifty years. Those European Powers which offer least opposition to this movement will suffer least from it. Probably the British Empire will offer the most opposition, and will, therefore, suffer most.

At the end of the war it seemed to our imperialists that we had the whole former Turkish Empire at our mercy. The elimination of Russia, to whom Constantinople had been promised, appeared as an extraordinary stroke of good fortune. It became possible to hope that we might link up Egypt with India, via Palestine, Mesopotamia, and Persia; that we might acquire control of most of the oil in the Near East; and that we might dominate the straits.

During the war we had made use of Arab hostility to the Turks, and had promised independence to those who had sided with us. Hussein, who utilized his power over the Holy Places to make extortions from pilgrims, was supposed by us to be on this account beloved throughout the Moslem world. We made him King of the Hedjaz; a son of his proclaimed himself King of Syria, but was ousted by the French; another son was foisted by us on Irak against the wishes of the inhabitants. We tried to get Hussein recognized as Caliph, but failed ignominiously. Gradually all our schemes went awry. The failure of the Greeks, who were acting on our behalf, is sufficiently well known. But even fairly well-informed people know little of our intrigues in relation to the Arabs. Mr. Powell, who writes as a disinterested American, tells the story vividly; I hope it may come to be appreciated by political opponents of Lord Curzon, Mr. Lloyd George, and Mr. Winston Churchill.

One of the things which a Labor Government could do instantly, in spite of not having a parliamentary majority, is to evacuate Mesopotamia, or Irak, as it has been called since Mesopotamia ceased to be a "blessed word." Let us take our policy in regard to that country as a sample of British Near-Eastern imperialism.

In 1916 the British and French governments concluded what is known as the Sykes-Picot Agreement, partitioning among themselves the greater part of the Turkish Empire. This agreement assigned Mesopotamia to England, except Mosul, which was to be French. In 1918 the French abandoned their claim to Mosul in return for British support in Syria. (It is worth while observing that the Syrians, being asked what destiny they desired, said that they preferred independence; failing that, they wished to be under America; failing that, they preferred Britain; above all, they did not wish to be assigned to France. The League of Nations therefore gave a mandate to France, in accordance with the Sykes-Picot Agreement.) The French maintained that this agreement of 1918 left them a share of the Mosul oil, which the British denied; however, Lord Curzon has repeatedly told us that oil is no part of his reason for desiring Mosul.

In November, 1918, after the armistice, an Anglo-French declaration promised "The complete and definitive liberation of the peoples so long oppressed by the Turks and the establishment of national governments and administrations drawing their authority from the initiative and free choice of indigenous populations." In 1920, after some experience of liberation under a British garrison, the people of Mesopotamia rebelled and nearly captured Bagdad. After this Sir Percy Cox, the new High Commissioner, repeated the promise of self-determination. Certain prominent Mesopotamians, who had assisted us in quelling the revolt, were invited to join a provisional government, among them Seyyid Talib. "It should be added," says Mr. Powell, "that the British were under the greatest obligations to Talib, who during the rebellion of 1920 had answered their appeals for help by coming to the aid of the beleaguered garrison of Bagdad, thereby saving British arms and prestige from serious disaster."

At this juncture Mr. Winston Churchill, as Colonial Secretary, ordered, against Sir Percy Cox's advice, that Feisal (son of Hussein) should be made King of Irak, although it was known that almost all the inhabitants loathed him. Talib got wind of the plan, and, at dinner in his own house, expressed strong disapproval of it. This failure to understand the meaning of "self-determination" was quickly rectified. Seyyid Talib was invited by Lady Cox to tea at the Residency. On his departure he found the road blocked by an army truck, he was arrested, taken in a special train to Basra, and conveyed, a prisoner, to Ceylon in a destroyer.

Will Mr. Thomas order the instant restoration of Talib to his native country? And will he take steps to redeem the British Government's promises to allow self-government to Irak?

The failure of our imperialist ambitions in the Near East is attributable to three causes operating successively and one operating throughout the venture. The cause operating throughout was British popular indifference, which made Lloyd George fail in his attempt to get up a crusade. Of the other three the first was the policy of the Soviet Government, springing partly from sincere convictions, partly from the need of retaliation against our support of rebellion in Russia. The Bolsheviks succeeded in persuading Asia that they did not wish to interfere with the independence of the nations on their frontiers. Being shut out from Europe by the blockade, they became the champions of the liberties of Asia, and were so regarded from the Bosphorus to the Yellow Sea. Their assistance was no doubt of great importance in the early stages of Turkish resistance to the unratified Treaty of Sèvres. The growth of Nationalist Turkey, which they assisted, was the second cause of our failure; the third was French opposition to our schemes of conquest. This last, from the point of view of French imperialism, was probably shortsighted, since the ultimate result is likely to be the liberation of Asia from all Western dominion. The two Powers which have gained in the scramble are Russia and America, because they have displayed least imperialism and are believed by Asiatics (rightly or wrongly) to have no sinister designs.

Oil has been the chief prize sought everywhere, and the history of North Persian oil illustrates America's wisdom. In 1916 the oil in the northern provinces was granted by the Shah's Government to a Russian named Khoshtaria, but this concession was never ratified by the Majliss and therefore (under the Persian constitution) was not legal. In 1920 a British company bought it, Khoshtaria being in need of cash on account of the Russian revolution. It was thought that the irregularity of title would not matter, owing to the Anglo-Persian Convention and the presence of British troops in Persia. The Majliss, however, refused to ratify the convention, and the Persians showed themselves so bitterly anti-British that an expensive war would have been necessary to keep them down. Perhaps we should have engaged in this war but for a masterstroke of policy on the part of the Persians. They gave a concession for the oil in the northern provinces to the Standard Oil Company, a concession duly ratified by the Majliss. Consequently we could no longer inflict "self-determination" upon them without coming into conflict with America. The Persian Government proceeded to invite the assistance of a number of American financial and technical advisers, who are setting the country on its feet. We have come back to the state of affairs which would have existed if Morgan Shuster had been allowed to do his work. It is to be hoped that the independence of Asia will be securely established by the time the Americans wish to annex Persia.

The dealings of modern Europe with Asia show that there is absolutely no effective good-will toward Asia in any European country. There are times when the taxpayer objects to paying for the enrichment of concession-hunters and when young men object to dying for the same great cause. These exceptional times, when parsimony and laziness overcome imperial pride, are the periods of a liberal policy. But there can be no security for any part of Asia except in its own strength. Any failure of British or French or Italian or Greek schemes is to be welcomed—all alike are nefarious. I hope the present British Government may be led, by motives of economy, to abandon the less lucrative of Lord Curzon's ventures. I see in the Daily Herald of January 31 that the Air Ministry is now opposed in principle to the late Government's policy of dropping bombs from airplanes on Mesopotamian villages which are in arrears with their taxes, but I am troubled by an announcement next day denying that this has ever been our practice—a denial which it is very difficult to accept. I hope the Labor Government will not be too prone to accept the assurances of officials who have no sympathy with its policies.

The most important parts of Asia fall into three groups: Moslem, Hindu, and Chinese. If all achieve complete independence, as seems likely, it will be well for mankind. There is no such thing as benevolent government of one country by another, and such books as Mr. Powell's are useful in reminding us that we are not exceptions to this rule.

BERTRAND RUSSELL

Incurable Intelligence

Crazy Man. By Maxwell Bodenheim. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

"CRAZY MAN," by Maxwell Bodenheim, is a novel of breadth and distinction that makes the reviewer pause before he begins to wave aloft the usual adjectives that serve as traffic signals on the literary highroad. It is the author's seventh book, and with its publication he seems to rise like one of the peaks that dominate the plain in the American scene. It is, broadly speaking, realistic—at least the reviewer may be pardoned for designating it so, after beholding a flying wedge of bouncers in a cheap New York dance hall converge upon a lame duck and throw him downstairs. But the lame duck disseminates a doctrine of non-resistance in the most romantic manner, and now and then the author contributes such unrealistic bits as "the kiss was belief, seeking to be full born against his skin," something that reads like an entry out of a diary that might have been kept by Richard Feverel in his trysting days.

The story of "Crazy Man" has to do with the petty world viewed by Selma Thallinger, who worked during the day as a milliner and at night sold her services as a dancing partner in Ravanni's "Academy" in lower New York. Twice every week Selma gave herself to the same pair of men, the owners of the dance hall, but the custom had long ago become meaningless and tiresome. Mr. Bodenheim has read her mind with marked insight; in fact, she is the most clearly visualized character in the book and absolutely convincing. Her revolt against the blandishments of Ravanni had already begun when John Carley appeared at the dance hall. His pleading manner and his clothes—tieless and patched—were breaks from normality and a challenge to Ravanni and his cohorts; so he was thrown out. But because he followed a philosophy of non-resistance he returned again and again, to be beaten to a pulp, but to conquer in the end through his gameness. It was natural that Selma, surfeited with her meaningless life, should turn to Carley and seek to understand the strange philosophy that had been born in him by much reading. "Every book I read tells me something different, but all the people I meet, they say the same things all the time," says Carley. He has become convinced that men must emancipate themselves from the claims of the flesh and give more thought to their intellects.

He believes that only too often men are the "duped, evanescent trustees of property," the slaves of its bulk. To free men from its tyranny he robs the rich to give to the poor—that is, he specializes in stealing furs out of large stores, and then distributes the money gained by their sale to indigent strangers. His view of religions is that they ask you to take care of your feelings and treat men like you'd want them to treat you, but they don't pay any attention to your mind, to what's going on inside of your head.

And as for human beings:

They've got to teach their minds and their feelings to have more respect for each other, and when they do they don't take each other's bodies so often because that's not the only thing that they're interested in. It's all right for them to take each other if they're taking something else besides their flesh, if they're really trying to get into each other's minds and hearts and look for the secrets that are hidden there.

It is natural that most of the men Carley talks to cannot comprehend, and Selma, too, is confused because his principal occupation is talk when her body is longing for his embraces. Society, too, has its doubts, and eventually pronounces Carley the victim of an exalted paranoia and sends him to the state insane asylum. Carley breaks out, but he is convinced that permanent incarceration is not far off. "I will be arrested again," he says, "and when that happens they will undoubtedly keep me in an asylum for the rest of my life, as an incurable case of intelligence."

Mr. Bodenheim has a clearness in portraiture due in part to the fact that he expresses himself with much precision and economy of language; he makes words carry the burden of his ideas with a keen perception of their powers and capacities. This imparts a feeling of surety and accelerates movement; it commends his work to judgment in company with that of the few stylists in America. But Mr. Bodenheim's clarity in expression is set off by an individual and sometimes irritating mannerism. He turns easily to simile and metaphor; one never knows when he is going to breathe life into inanimate objects and consult their feelings in such conspicuously original terms as the "chin advised her face," or the "wound communing with hostility," or the "sawdust waiting to be teased by feet." A man careful of his diction does not fling these figures about nonchalantly; one may conjecture that Mr. Bodenheim does so with intent and after much deliberation; have we not proof elsewhere in his ironical poem Hatred of Metaphor and Simile? Here he depicts an audience crying: "Give us earth and logic!" "Down with metaphor and simile!" and then evicting two forlorn poets who show their contempt by "flicking the ashes carefully into the rage of faces around them." Bodenheim, striving for clarity in his novel, eliminated all extraneous matter from his plot and wove a story of a few simple characters and a single theme; the book is nearly one-third under way before the first incident is disposed of. But Bodenheim, the poet, kept looking in the casement and dictating a disturbing line here and there, and thus produced this strange conglomeration of styles which reminds us of a description Witter Bynner once wrote of Bodenheim's lines: "It is a drunken thief's hand, still deft in the poetic treasury." We find such circumlocutions as these: "His face . . . was firmly framed by the outward adventure of a jaw," "Emotionally, a Negro revival meeting was hurling its cries from the curves of his heart"; "invading their nearness by the tragical mirage of distance"; "the sunshine of a warm spring day waltzed with this curiosity in ever-narrowing circles."

But these are the inequalities that stand out from the body of this author's prose like gargoyles on a cathedral and lead one to the belief that the poet is fighting for survival against a young novelist who is gaining in strength. The rest of the prose has many conspicuous qualities, not the least of which is its honesty and clarity. Mr. Bodenheim conveys the vernacular of Selma, Ravanni, and others of a coarser social stratum without ever becoming the literal reporter, and he is coherent throughout, thereby breaking with the younger experimenters, who cannot hope to be understood outside a narrow circle without a glossary.

HARRY HANSEN

Thomas Mann

Buddenbrooks. Translated from the German of Thomas Mann by H. T. Lowe-Porter. Alfred A. Knopf. 2 vols. $5.

THOMAS MANN is a great writer with but a single theme. In having but one theme he is not very unlike writers as different from himself, as different from each other, as Carlyle, Ibsen, Nietzsche, Shaw. Amid a thousand variations one central and controlling thought, one characteristic attitude to the totality of things, will emerge from a close study of the works of each of these. Mann differs from them by virtue of the mood out of which he attacks the substance of his vision. It is not, as in the case of all the others, an impassioned, triumphant, prophetic mood. It is shy, difficult, reserved, estranged from itself. It is the mood of a lyrical nature constantly transcending itself by sheer force of intellect and artistic self-discipline. It is a nature that yearns for music. But another strain in that nature fears music as weakness, as mere emotionalism, as self-abandonment. Mann would not yield to the musician in him nor to the lyrical poet in him. With an austere deliberation he chose prose, the most stringent and responsible of the arts, and early made himself a master of that art not only in the common matters of felicitous phrasing and expressive rhythm but in the severer beauty that belongs to a structure at once intricate and lucid, at once orchestral and logical.

He was born in Lübeck of a family of patrician merchants such as he has shown in "Buddenbrooks." But his father, who, one may without impertinence assume, is at least symbolized by Thomas Buddenbrook, made an even more unusual and romantic marriage than Mann's character. The mother of Thomas Mann and of his brother Heinrich was a Portuguese lady. Thus in Mann there blends the sober, exact, realistic strain of the North German and the passion and elegance of the Latin. Or, rather, these two strains did not blend. With the highest consciousness of his early maturity there came to him and within him a struggle between these two elements and, more especially, between the North German severity that regards the passion and elegance of the Latins as always a little vulgar and tawdry and the Latin warmth which regards Northern sobriety and self-restraint as always a little stupid and anemic. And in Thomas Mann's innermost self there has always been a deep if not always a willing respect for his paternal inheritance, for those Lübeck burghers who lived with so much sanity, dignity, manliness, balanced power. He knows that these qualities easily degenerate on a lower plane into flat, fatuous, unsucculent Philistinism, but he also knows—and this knowledge is set down in "Buddenbrooks" in Permaneder and Permaneder's Munich—that the ease and grace and charm of the Latin or semi-Latin temperament degenerates with equal ease into moral sloth and spiritual slackness. Had he ever been confronted with the dilemma of being either a Lübeck Philistine or a Munich Bohemian, he would have chosen the former alternative at once.

In Thomas Mann's creative work this conflict within him appears as the antithesis between two worlds: the world of art, thought, music, the world of the children of light who have, alas, no power over practical affairs and so often live without restraint, dignity, or that measured beauty of rational action which is perhaps the highest beauty, and that other world of sane action, natural joy, well-balanced acceptance of man and society which alone can, when all is said and done, make the common lot of man tolerable and fruitful. It follows that nearly all of Thomas Mann's protagonists—Thomas Buddenbrook, Tonio Kröger, the heroes of a dozen of the impeccable shorter narratives—are all artists, thinkers, children of the light who are sick with a gross or subtle sense of their own insufficiency, their feebleness in battling with the world of practical action, their remote but apparently inevitable relationship to the clowns, vagabonds, strolling players of an earlier age. They go down to disaster through their inability to unite in the practice of their lives the ideals of strength and light, balanced power and creative passion, distinction of gesture and action and freedom and variety in the choice of action. This conflict is Thomas Mann's recurrent theme. It is symbolized with the highest concentration in the very few pages of a sketch called "Die Hungernden"* which is, I think, the key passage to a correct insight into all his work.

His theme is, in reality, a discord brought about by two conflicting themes, and the problem which Mann has sought to solve in both his life and his art is the problem of the resolving of this discord into harmony. The artist, then, the child of light, who can never conquer the practical world, never share the common joys or practice the common virtues of mankind, must introduce virtue—virtus—into his own domain and thus achieve personal power, distinction, dignity of soul. He can do this, like Gustav Aschenbach in "Der Tod in Venedig," like Mann himself, by exercising the highest self-discipline, striving after the utmost solidity, lucidity, comeliness of form, yet never letting form become the master, never letting it be empty or virtuoso-like. It must be perfect through its perfect molding of substance, perfect by the test not only of beauty, but of an ultimate intellectual scrupulousness. An artist of this temper can not only conquer a perfection that is natural to him; he can transcend himself. If he has not what the French call "the long breath" he can attain it by a series of tireless creative acts. He can turn from music, from the lyric, to prose, to epic narration and can, by triumphing in this originally not quite native field, achieve a human dignity, a moral power that saves him from the old taint of the market-place, the manycolored rags, the gaping crowd. . . .

I have tried to give the reader of English this general insight into the personality and work of Thomas Mann in order that "Buddenbrooks," now at last available in our language, may meet with a more understanding appreciation. It is plainly enough, even as a mere novel, an isolated story, a very great book, a narrative of human beings and of human fates of an incomparable depth, insight, creative fulness, structural perfection. There is no turbidness in it, no faltering, no laxness. Mr. H. T. Lowe-Porter's version contains an occasional blunder, as when he mistakes Kräutersuppe—potage aux fines herbes—for "cabbage-soup." But, upon the whole, it is adequate and at times elegant. The translator would be the first to admit that the full beauty of Mann's prose is lost in any medium but his own. But the translation cannot obscure the magnificent architectonics of this work. Each of the eleven parts, each chapter of each part, each paragraph of each chapter, has individual charm and functional rightness in the organism of the whole structure. "Buddenbrooks" is a first-rate work of art; it is, in that special sense of Thomas Mann which I have tried to explain, an artistic deed of the highest virtue. And I am anxious that both aspects of it should be understood. For only an understanding of these two aspects can form a proper approach to the total work of one of the noblest artists and personalities of our age.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

World's End

Galapagos: World's End. By William Beebe. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $9.

"Galapagos" is a glorious book. It is high romance, exact science, fascinating history, wild adventure. Those lava islands six hundred miles west of the coast of Ecuador have stirred the dreams of boys and boy-hearted men for nearly four centuries; and they remain one of the few spots of undisturbed mystery on the earth's surface. Every small boy who has ever been to a zoo and seen the man-size tortoises that gave the islands their name has been tortured by the ambition to sail to the islands and capture one of those giant relics of an age when reptiles ruled. And here is William Beebe's story of the fulfilment of that high ambition—and Beebe still leaves mystery.

Indefatigable Island is only twenty-five miles wide, yet no man has ever penetrated across its hot, cactus-covered "hills, slopes, and gullies, all fashioned of great sheets and disks of clinker, like thousands of misshapen manholes balanced on edge or thrown together as the last upheaval or earthquake left them" to its crater-center. Rumor has it that there is a lake in that crater, and doubtless the last of the great tortoises—Beebe's expedition found but one of them—still dozes in the delicious mud about that tarn. One yearns to depart, with copper shoes that the lava cannot penetrate, for that legendary crater. If the very shores of Galapagos yield four-foot-long marine lizards and birds so tame that one can touch them, what mysteries may not remain for the explorer of that crater?

Galapagos was first a favorite resort of pirates and buccaneers and then of whalers; and in more modern days one of the islands has been used as a particularly cruel penal colony. In the old days the giant tortoises abounded and were a god-send to the weary mariners. William Dampier, who later rescued Alexander Selkirk, the prototype of Robinson Crusoe, from Juan Fernandez Island, described them as "extraordinarily large and fat, and so sweet that no pullet eats more pleasantly." So abundant were they (this was in 1684) that "five or six hundred men might subsist on them for several months without any other sort of provision." As late as 1813 Captain Porter of the American navy could write that Vessels on whaling voyages among these islands generally take on board from two to three hundred of these animals and stow them in the hold, where, strange as it may seem, they have been known to live a year, without food or water, and when killed at the expiration of that time found greatly improved in fatness and flavor.

Not only their food value but their oil content hastened the fate of these tortoises; today some of the landing-places are strewn with their shells, but the tortoises are almost extinct. There may be more of them left on islands unvisited by the Beebe expedition, but their rarity only doubles one's thirst to explore Indefatigable's crater.

Charles Darwin visited the islands on the Beagle in 1835, and his observations of the curious variations in life on these isolated islets played a large part in determining his thought upon evolution. William Beebe constantly pays warm tribute to Darwin's account of his observations, but Darwin is pale reading compared to Beebe. No naturalist, I think, has written more fascinatingly and yet less sentimentally. I must pass over the dramatic account of his first encounter with a giant lizard and quote merely his reflection upon a dead lobster:

One of the most beautiful things in death is the giant thorny lobster of the tropics. . . . When death comes to this crustacean and the fishes and the scavenger mollusks and worms have made away with all his muscles and flesh then the empty shell, as wonderful in carving as the Taj Mahal, is washed up and pounded to pieces upon the lava, and all the fragments scattered through the sand—a myriad mosaics of the most exquisite sculpture and with pigments faded into unnamably delicate tones and hues. As I casually unearthed some jewel of a leg-joint, well worthy of a setting in platinum, a slender rod splashed with mauve and crimson, with a galaxy of blue stars wound in a spiral around it, I realized more than ever what a casual thing is man upon the earth. For untold ages since thorny lobsters first crawled about in the waters of the upper chalk, perhaps sixty million years ago, beautiful detritus such as this has littered the tropical sands.

A major part of the task of the Beebe expedition of 1923 was to collect data upon the origins of the curious life upon these volcanic peaks in mid-Pacific. There is no native land mammal life, although wild donkeys, goats, and sheep, brought ashore by early Robinson Crusoes, have become so abundant upon some of the islands as to threaten other forms of life with extinction. The penguins and the southern sea-lions have reached the Galapagos on the Humboldt Current from the Antarctic; some of the birds betray by their wildness the fact that they are migrants, accustomed to more dangerous man-infested regions; but many of the species are peculiar to the Galapagos. Each of these tiny islands has some species all its own, of plants, of birds, and of insects—although insects are singularly scarce and their absence adds to the mysterious silence of the islands. The birds tend to be longer-legged, larger-beaked, smaller-bodied, and darker than their relatives of the mainland—effects of the long process of natural selection in a barren region. Mr. Beebe's tentative conclusion, based in part upon the relationship of species and fortified by the Prince of Monaco's soundings of the ocean floor, is that the Galapagos Islands were once connected by land with Central America (not with the nearer mainland of South America) and that in long isolation— isolation since a pre-mammalian age—they have developed their peculiar characteristics.

It is a fascinating book. One wishes that the expedition had lasted more than its two and a half months and that the scarcity of water had not forced the Noma back to Panama and shortened the actual time on the islands. Beebe's tale of the hunt for water, and of its final discovery where it could not possibly be piped to the ship, is one of the high dramatic spots of the book. The tale of the shipwrecked taxi-driver is a classic for all time. But why attempt to retell it? It must be read. Putnam's must publish this sumptuous book in a cheaper edition so that it can have the wide reading it deserves.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Priests of Modernism

Faith and Health. By Charles Reynolds Brown. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.

The Social Origins of Christianity. By Shirley Jackson Case. University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

Imperialistic Religion and the Religion of Democracy. By William Adams Brown. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.25.

The Religion of the Social Passion. By Charles Henry Dickinson. Christian Century Press. $1.75.

CHANCE more than anything else brought these four books on religion together on the reviewer's desk. All four of them are written from the point of view of liberal Protestantism, and while they are not primarily controversial and do not pretend to cover the whole of Protestant philosophy, we may fairly consider them as to some degree an answer to the inquirer who seeks to know something of the message of modernism to our times.

Judging by the first of these books that message is eminently sane, on excellent terms with the physical sciences including medicine, and, on the whole, cheerful and "constructive." "Faith and Health" is a revision of an earlier book by the same author. It includes Coué as well as Christian Science and the Emmanuel Movement. On all of them Mr. Brown talks good common sense. Religion of the right sort makes for health, but we need physicians and the practice of modern hygiene. Simply on the score of physical health we gather that Mr. Brown would place science above faith, but he thinks (on a priori grounds rather than on any extensive examination of the evidence) that the Christian faith is likely to be more potent in its suggestion of health than Dr. Coué. The Virgin of Lourdes, we take it, may persist when the doctor of Nancy is forgotten. There is no discussion as to whether the Christian religion is superior to other religions in its power of health and if so, why.

"The Social Origins of Christianity" shows the admirable objectivity of modernism and its scientific interest in the origins and growth of Christianity. Mr. Case does well what Mr. Lake in his "Landmarks of Early Christianity" did brilliantly. He examines the social situations in which Christianity had its rise and growth and explains its success in terms of its ability to adapt itself to the needs of its time. Such a story naturally suggests the right and duty of the modernist to do likewise without too rigid a devotion to the notion of a faith once for all delivered to the saints. Mr. Case delicately points that moral.

The forward look of modernism and the irenic spirit of some modernists is shown in William Adams Brown's interesting attempt to classify religions in general and the various forms of Christianity in particular as imperialistic, individualistic, and democratic. The first is the religion of submission to authority, the second of individual salvation not so much in submission to authority as in the traffic of the soul with its God, while "democratic religion begins when it first dawns on a man that God may have something to say to him through the different thing He is saying to his neighbor." These types rarely exist in any form of religion pure and unmixed. All of them have values which Mr. Brown is careful to bring out. Roman Catholicism tends to be essentially an imperial religion, Protestantism heretofore has been a confused "half-way house between imperialism and democracy" with at least a negative type of individualism strongly developed. The religion of the future, Mr. Brown hopes, will be the religion of democracy. Its unifying principle will be its creative power. Christianity is not yet such a religion, "but of all existing religions it has the best chance to become so."

"The Religion of the Social Passion" attempts more directly than any of these others to deal with that central problem of religion: the nature of God in relation to men. The author's special appeal is to "reverent and devout souls who doubt God because they love men." His argument is commended to us on the jacket of the book by a battalion of authorities headed by the indefatigable Edward Alsworth Ross, who writes: "If Dr. Dickinson's wonderful presentation of social religion does not heal the soul of the reader, nothing will." This reader—alas that I should have to confess it—is evidently beyond hope. I found in the book some admirable sentiments and some eloquence. But mostly words.

Mr. Dickinson's social passion at its most definite best is the kind of thing that sent young people to settlement houses fifteen years ago, but it was never so unromantic as to make them realistic labor unionists or socialists. Later, under the influence of the war propaganda, it sent them to the trenches to fight the "false prophets" who apparently were almost all German. (Mr. Dickinson can still write a sentence like this: "The sin propagated by the Hohenzollern was sin against humanity in the deepest sense: it was sin against the continuity of humanity's growing life.") "Social passion," in Mr. Dickinson's words, "urgent, patient, imperturbable of soul, inspiring the fulfilment of the equal and supreme opportunity," etc., etc., is nevertheless a thing so wordily romantic that it would have inspired as much scorn in Tolstoi as in Nietzsche. Social passion, we are told, is God!

The social passion is not one impulse among others, but is the whole of real human life. Unto this converges every constituent of our being and is fulfilled in this forevermore. This is the true God and eternal life.

If that explanation does not resolve all your doubts, it may help you to understand why Roman Catholicism and Protestant fundamentalism still hold the allegiance of multitudes who find it hard to begin their prayers: "O, Social Passion, urgent, patient, impartive of soul."

NORMAN THOMAS

Gaily the Philosopher

At a Venture. By Charles A. Bennett. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

ONE of the queerest things about human nature is the way people distinguish between pleasures and duties. As soon as you get paid for pleasure it becomes work, and the unconscious—or something—puts on its armor.

I have worn armor for the past three weeks in respect to Mr. Bennett's book. The Editor of The Nation sent it to me to read and review. Right then it turned itself into a job. For nearly a month it has lain on my desk shouting Read me! every time I came into the room. Finally, I had to read it to get the incriminating evidence out of the way.

Before I had read the first one of the thirty-four essays that make up the volume I forgot all about the job and thought how delightful it was to run across a new writer—new to me, at any rate—of such subtle penetration combined with a light and lazy humor.

Mr. Bennett has a fine sense of satire, of character, of life—and he is a master of the luminous phrase. Moreover, he carries himself with that air of detached superiority which is essential to successful satire. In one of his essays he tells of a man who started to write a book on "Social Psychology" which emerged with the title "The Wonders of Insect Life." I rather fancy that Mr. Bennett had himself in mind. In a measure, I mean; you know.

He discusses live subjects—and his papers cover all sorts of topics from advertising to zebra raising. But there is not a word about Horace, Chaucer, the precieuse poets, medieval history, or the cursed Greeks. This is a great relief. He is as modern as a gasoline engine. But he is not too modern to write with ease, elegance, and grace.

The book is illustrated, and the pictures are priceless. They are the work of Clarence Day, Jr. All movement—irony—and grin.

I like his characterizations of people. There is Mr. Armitage, for example. Mr. Armitage never thinks of people or of things; his mental processes take in only "world movements"—such as the "rising tide of social unrest," and other tides, forces, pendulum swings, and reactions.

A rise in the price of butter makes Mr. Armitage think of the world-wide fluctuations in price levels. People blowing in their money on the movies cause him to reflect on the inflation of the currency. He talks of the "whole drift of modern ideas," and you get the image of humanity blown along by some invisible force, like clouds blown across a full moon.

I don't know whom Mr. Bennett had in mind when he described Armitage, but I am willing to make an even bet that it was Clarence W. Barron, proprietor and editor of the Wall Street Journal. Last year, on his return from Europe, Mr. Barron said that Coolidge and Mussolini are the "two greatest economic minds in the world." This dictum has gone down to posterity as one of the remarkable sayings in 1923.

Mr. Bennett is a professor of philosophy at one of the Eastern universities. Just think of that!

A Symphony of Sin

The Man Who Died Twice. By Edwin Arlington Robinson. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

ONE is tempted, after a first reading of any new poem by Mr. Robinson, to remind him of the advice which Poe gave to Hawthorne in a review of "Mosses from an Old Manse": "Get a bottle of visible ink!" Yet Poe was wrong, and after a second or third reading of the present work Mr. Robinson will seem profoundly right. No one else would compose like this; but surely no one could. For a reader who tempers himself to his task somewhat as Mr. Robinson tempered himself to his, there are no obscurities in "The Man Who Died Twice." Rather, all is luminous with an other-worldly light; not the sun, but some energy of ghostlier brilliance and less warmth glitters along these lines and makes them clear. For such a reader also there is no prose within the volume. Open it at random and in ignorance, and many a passage will yield no music; temper the ear, however, to the whole and the whole will sing where Mr. Robinson intended that it should sing, in the depths of the brain. Mr. Robinson has never written better than here. Few American poems are more beautiful.

The details of the story are not to be taken too literally, for the theme is abstract and the application is universal. It is a tale of the unpardonable sin; a man in full consciousness that his soul is one of the rarest gifts of the gods violates that soul and descends to a slow ruin. Superficially the story is this: Fernando Nash, a musician of genius whose promise from the gods is that some time he shall hear music

Blown down by choral horns out of a star
To quench those drums of death with singing fire Unfelt by man before.

refuses to wait until this music pierces his effective mind and takes a form there which can make it communicable to other men. Fiercely scornful of lesser men and madly reckless in the certainty of his eventual inspiration, he listens too long to the drums of death that are to be a minor note of his great symphony; he lets the devilish note

That was to be a part be everything;

he flings himself for twenty years into debauchery and idleness—whether of the body or of the mind does not matter—and emerges a man who can hear nothing with sheer, triumphant divinity in it. He hears it, indeed, just before the first death that he dies; but it is too late then. Awakening from his final orgy, reduced and starved and empty, he witnesses a marvelous march and countermarch of good and evil music which ends upon his ears with that choral golden overflow

Of sound and fire, which he had always heard—
And had not heard before.

Blinded with tears of joy and exhaustion he gropes into the hall outside his room

Crying aloud for God, or man, or devil,
For paper—not for food. It may have been
The devil who heard him first and made of him,
For sport, the large and sprawling obstacle
They found there at the bottom of the stairs.

Such is his first end. His soul is saved but his art is gone, and now he pathetically beats the drums of life with the Salvation Army until his second death, when his friend who tells the story takes his ashes out and sinks them in the sea.

It is seldom or never that a good poem can legitimately be considered to need music for its fuller expression. "The Man Who Died Twice" is especially complete within itself; it is a symphony of most gorgeous content, and yet it is authentically a poem; the music is unheard. At the same time, one rather wishes that a competent composer would attempt something with these lines and these ideas for its basis. Particularly one would give a good deal to hear an approximate rendering of that dreadful mood which expressed itself for Nash by the coming through a keyhole

 Of a slow rat, equipped with evening dress,
 Gold eye-glasses, and a conductor's wand,
 Soon followed by a brisk and long procession
 Of other rats, till more than seventy of them,
 All dressed in black and white, and each of them
 Accoutred with his chosen instrument,
 Were ranged in order on the footworn carpet
 That lay between Fernando and the door,
 Having no chairs, they stood erect and ready,
 And having made obeisance to the master
 Upon the wall, who signified his pleasure,
 And likewise to the man upon the bed,
 They played with unforeseen solemnity
 The first chords of the first rat symphony
 That human ears had heard. Baffled and scared,
 Fernando looked at Bach, who nodded slowly,
 And, as he fancied, somewhat ominously;
 And still the music sounded, weird but firm,
 And the more fearful as it forged along
 To a dark and surging climax, which at length
 Broke horribly into hoarse and unclean laughter
 That rose above a groaning of the damned;
 And through it all there were those drums of death,
 Which always had been haunting him from childhood.

MARK VAN DOREN

Anybody's St. Francis

St. Francis of Assisi. By Gilbert K. Chesterton. George H. Doran Company. $1.25.

ALLOWING for Mr. Chesterton's little ways, with which we are all agreeably familiar, we are ready to grant at once that he has written an entertaining and even an edifying book on the most diverting as well as the most attacking of the saints. He has written it for those who have no acquaintance with the Franciscan idyl and who require some little persuasion to approach it sympathetically. This accounts for a certain apologetic tone when he is speaking of those phases of the story at which the modern skeptic might be expected to stumble, though no one who knows Mr. Chesterton is likely to bring against him a charge of "minimism." "It was necessary," he writes, "that my outline should be a merely human one, since I was only presenting his claim on all humanity, including skepticism, humanity."

Though all readers of the Franciscan story will find their account in this book, many of them will enjoy it with certain reservations. Mr. Chesterton's incessant crackle of fireworks seems to us quite inappropriate. To portray these touchingly simple episodes against a flickering background of paradox and word-play is a little like descanting on the beauties of a landscape to the sputter of a motor-cycle. But there is another and more serious obstacle to our pleasure in the book. Mr. Chesterton has been much too free and easy with his facts. It is not true, for example, that St. Francis sang the Canticle of the Creatures "wandering in the meadows in the sunnier season of his career." He composed it in a hut erected for him by St. Clare in the garden of San Damiano hardly a year before his death. He was then half blind. It is not the fact that "he is said to have made a journey" to intercede with the Emperor "for the lives of certain little birds"; but he is reported to have said that if he ever had speech of the Emperor he would beg him to see to it that the larks were protected and especially that they and all other birds should be fed on Christmas Day. It is not "tradition" that St. Francis and St. Dominic met for the first and last time at the famous "Chapter of the Mats," held at the Portiuncula in 1219. They seem to have met at Rome in 1215 and at least twice afterwards. It was not a Franciscan who said, "a monk should own nothing but his harp." It was Joachim of Flora, who died two years before St. Francis's conversion. There is no evidence that Dante was a member of the Third Order, though many writers, like Mr. Chesterton, have assumed that he was, on the basis of a well-known passage in the sixteenth canto of the Inferno. The Portiuncula, where St. Clare feasted with the Brethren and where St. Francis died, is not, as Mr. Chesterton twice implies, set upon a hill, but lies low in the Spoletan valley, surrounded by what Carducci calls a "cloister of lovely mountains." These, of course, are trifles, but there are many such trifles in this book. After all, an army of scholars has put the details of the Franciscan story within the reach of any inquirer, and there is no excuse, at this time of day, for writing a life of St. Francis without consulting the authorities.

Mr. Chesterton's book, therefore, is not nearly so good as it ought to be, but, then, no book on St. Francis is. The perfect life is still to write. But when all is said, the humility of Mr. Chesterton's concluding words is sufficient to disarm criticism. He claims "to have nothing to set up under the overhanging, overwhelming arches of such a temple of time and eternity but this brief candle burnt out so quickly before his shrine."

CHARLES H. A. WAGER

Cleveland and Olney

Grover Cleveland. The Man and the Statesman. By Robert McElroy. Harper and Brothers. 2 vols. $10.

Richard Olney and His Public Service. By Henry James. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THE joint names of Cleveland and Olney at once call to mind Debs and Venezuela and the two actions for which Cleveland receives least lasting tribute. Mr. James unqualifiedly condemns the Chicago strike and does not consider the unwisdom of the ensuing injunction or the use of federal troops. Mr. McElroy gives a more balanced account of the disturbance and touches upon the debit side of settling strikes by blanket injunctions. On the other hand, Mr. James gives the more adequate record and appraisal of the Venezuela affair. One hesitates to bracket Cleveland and Olney with Mr. Daugherty, for the time and the situation afforded less justification for the latter's injunction than for that of his predecessor, yet Mr. McElroy points out that even in 1894 the wisdom of such unrestrained use of judicial power was "questioned by far-sighted men, some of whom had themselves handled this two-edged sword to their regret." Self-interest will divide men on this issue as it no longer divides them on twisting the Lion's tail. The folly of the latter is now denied by few but Fenians. At the time, it brought to Cleveland more widespread popularity than any of his other acts. In condemnation as in praise contemporary opinion was shortsighted. When Cleveland was most maligned, he was exemplifying homely virtues which posterity has gratefully acknowledged.

The Venezuela policy was doubtless dictated by the same moral imperative that animated Cleveland's other actions. He saw a powerful nation trusting to procrastination and inertia to gain an advantage over a weaker one. His fault lay in his appraisal of the facts and in his resort to the language of the indictment rather than the politer palaver of diplomacy. Neither he nor Olney was a jingo by temperament. This is clear from their attitude toward Hawaii and toward Spain and their negotiation of the general arbitration treaty with Great Britain. Olney, as a member of the Cabinet, though not then Secretary of State, participated in the conferences over Hawaii and supported Cleveland in withdrawing from the Senate the annexation treaty of Harrison. Thus we declined a title with grievous moral flaws. The deed which we accepted later was more legibly witnessed by Manifest Destiny. The restraint with respect to Cuba was commendable, though it did not find the way of peaceful adjustment. The arbitration treaty slept in the Senate. The record has less of achievement than of high purpose and good-will. These must be remembered as offsets to the Venezuela bluster. When Attorney General Olney argued the Income Tax cases and lost he was in essence an old-fashioned fighting lawyer, though less hidebound than some. He mellowed somewhat in his later years and wore well the distinction which position had given him. Mr. James pictures him with objectivity and fairness. He confines himself almost wholly to Olney's public life, which is all that makes him a subject for biography.

As a personal and a public figure Grover Cleveland is far more inspiring than Olney. Mr. McElroy's fascinating story keeps Cleveland the moralist always in the foreground. Most issues he saw as moral issues. His puritanism took the form of a conviction of righteousness. This is expressed again and again in his letters and state papers. Few men in politics have given less heed to expediency. Mr. Roosevelt was not silent about ethics, but he professed himself a practical man. Sturdy and doughty he can be called, but not rugged like Cleveland. Popular disgust with corruption brought Cleveland to his high place and dogged enmity to corruption stands forth as his chief characteristic. His familiar conception of trusteeship made him essentially the conservator rather than the innovator, the guardian rather than the leader. He fought spoliation of the Indians, debasement of the currency, tariff barons, pension raiders and party spoilsmen. He was wiser in what he sought to restrain government from doing than in what he sought to do through government. The strength and charm of Mr. McElroy's biography are in its depiction of Cleveland the man. As an historian the author is allusive rather than explicit. A more adequate background might have been given without serious impediment to the smooth flow of the personal story. The hostility which Cleveland engendered is duly, perhaps unduly, reported, while relatively slight emphasis is accorded to the less vocal support which placed him twice in the Presidency and gave him a large popular majority when the electoral vote went against him. The shameless partisanship of the period is a sad commentary on the temper of the time. It is not certain even yet that Republicans can gracefully accept and fairly evaluate a Democratic President.

An economic interpreter of history would class Cleveland with dominant commercial interests. Judged by the lights of today his social vision was limited; but yesterday was not today. Cleveland once said that he chose the Democratic Party because it seemed to him to represent greater solidarity and conservatism, yet the choice between Cleveland and Blaine or Cleveland and Harrison was not on any clear basis of economic cleavage. The extent to which Cleveland opposed high tariffs because the Republicans favored them cannot be determined. His sound-money convictions were untinged by party affiliations, as his rejection of Bryanism demonstrates. To an unusual degree Grover Cleveland was his own man, who went his own way. He respected the formal theory of the separation of powers and did not attempt executive coercion of the legislature except the negative coercion through the use of the legislative veto power. His administrations illustrate how admirably our system of checks and balances may fulfil the object of preventing united governmental action. Cleveland would not be the tool of party leaders or dicker with them through the use of his appointing power. He seemed unable to convert Congress or to start in the constituencies a backfire to budge its balky heels. Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Wilson were different. They ran on platforms which promised legislative achievement and they felt themselves responsible legislative leaders whom Congress should respect. In reaction from this conception, the last election showed favor toward the idea of executive subordination in everything but distinctly executive functions. Whether we shall some day return to Mr. Cleveland's conception of the presidential office seems doubtful. The temper and turmoil of his two administrations are not conducive to constructive achievement. When some slack mood for normalcy or tranquillity inclines us toward what Mr. Lloyd George calls not a policy but a yawn we are likely to seek for a complacency in the White House which will look beyond the Mall for guidance. When the yawn has duly stretched itself and legislative lassitude in turn becomes irksome we may turn again to some dominating personality who will coerce Congress to carry out the policies proclaimed in the campaign. Cleveland's intermediate attitude belongs to an older time which is not likely to come again.

THOMAS REED POWELL

The Ecstasy That Refrains

Strait Is the Gate. By André Gide. Authorized translation by Dorothy Bussy. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

ANDRÉ GIDE is one of the most important figures in French letters. By many he is even regarded as the greatest contemporary proseur, and "Strait Is the Gate" is an extremely beautiful book. It is high time that he should be given to American readers, and his publishers deserve gratitude for having presented him in an accomplished translation. But one wonders if in performing an introduction it was necessary so completely to misrepresent him. "'Strait Is the Gate,' in its study of French puritanism, will be a revelation to those who imagine that this malady of the soul is peculiar to the Anglo-Saxon world," says the jacket and the effect is immediately and no doubt intentionally to connect him and his book with the satiric studies of narrow-mindedness so popular with us today. Nothing could give a more false idea. In the first place, the author achieves a complete imaginative identification of himself with his characters, and, in the second place, the "puritanism" concerned is about as much like what ordinarily goes by that name here as Blaise Pascal is like John Roach Straton. Doubtless the publishers, with the sale of the book in mind, hardly dared say, "This is a passionately mystical book about a young woman who died an old maid, rejecting her lover because she was afraid that their love would come between her and her love of God, and because she preferred the ecstasy of renunciation to the ecstasy of fulfilment." Yet this would be the simplest and truest description. The girl's attitude is not one which is congenial to our time, but it is not, and Mr. Gide well knows that it is not, either hard, barren, or ridiculous. Some of the greatest men of all time have assumed it, and if the result of the passionate battle which we Americans are waging against spiritual narrowness is that we cannot accept a beautiful and profound presentation of a very important attitude except as a sort of foreign supplement to our anti-puritan fulminations, then we have become very provincial indeed in our efforts to escape provinciality.

It is true enough that a temperament like Gide's is to us unfamiliar and completely exotic. The peculiar character of his emotional susceptibility is strange. In America there is never, for example, any doubt as to whether or not a man is religious. We are really familiar with only three types: the Sunday school superintendent, the Babbitt who considers Jesus an effective business partner, and the rationalist or materialist; we do not know the type which is, indistinguishably, either a diabolist or a saint—a state of spiritual intoxication not very different from, and connected with, the intoxication of the senses. We cannot conceive, for example, of Mr. Mencken's suddenly turning Catholic, whereas that is exactly the sort of thing which is constantly happening among the Latins; Huysmans and Papini slip into the fold of the church and change the modus operandi of their spiritual life without greatly changing its emotional character. To understand Gide it is necessary to understand this temperament, for there is something of it in him. He is in search of the completest possible emotional realization of life but he is not sure how to attain it. He speaks in one of his books of an ideal of life in the annihilation of all which is not "sensation and fervor"; he speaks even of "sensual ecstasy," but he is perplexed by the question whether that is not best obtained through renunciation rather than through indulgence. In "La Tentative Amoureuse" he says of a character "Luc desired love but feared carnal possession as a bruised thing," and yet again, in more general terms, he dreams of "a science of the perfect utilization of the self by means of an intelligent restraint." This may be puritanism or anti-puritanism, but it is something entirely different from what is commonly meant by either term in America. It is rather a sort of political economy of the soul, an attempt to answer the question, not yet definitively answered for all people, whether things are not most completely realized when they are transferred entirely to the imagination.

"Strait Is the Gate" tells the story of two children brought up in a Protestant household and steeped in the romantic piety of Pascal and Racine. They fall passionately in love, but conceive early a horror of sensuality, so that excess of scruple keeps them apart, gradually postponing their engagement until the girl comes to the point where she cannot bear to change the ecstasy born of renunciation for the commonplace affection of marriage or to have human love come between her and her absorption in the divine. The story is told in the first person through the narrative of the man and the diary of the woman, and Gide's identification with his characters is so complete that the book is to be regarded not so much as a study of a certain mental state as a participation in it, as an experience rather than a criticism. In his search for the most effective way of life, Gide has lived through with complete emotional realization the lives of the two characters who have chosen the way of renunciation, and if he decides for himself that this is not the best way it is not without a full appreciation of its possibility. No one can read his gravely and passionately beautiful pages without sharing his understanding and without realizing that the girl who exclaims near the end of her diary "Oh, jealous God, who has despoiled me, take Thou possession of my heart" has in her own way lived as intensely as she would have done if her passion had subsided into the tranquillity of married life.

I am no mystical ascetic, no preacher of the philosophy of negation, but I believe that it is the business of the great artist to perceive and of the critic to interpret whatever passionate experiences are possible to humanity.

Post-War Illusions

Bibliographical Survey of Contemporary Sources for the Economic and Social History of the War. By M. E. Bulkley. Humphrey Milford.

Trade Unionism and Munitions. By G. D. H. Cole. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

THE Carnegie Endowment found that it could not insure international peace either by its pre-war plan of studying the causes of war or by its war plan of helping the Allies win the war. So in these post-war days it has turned to writing the history of the war, just as disarmament conferences automatically turn to making rules for war, to be broken in the next war. The disproportionate activity of British scholars in this history has already been noted. We now have the promise of numerous studies for other European countries, but Germany still remains almost wholly in outer darkness, along with the United States and the British Dominions. In the British series we note M. E. Bulkley's "Bibliographical Survey of Contemporary Sources for the Economic and Social History of the War" and G. D. H. Cole's "Trade Unionism and Munitions." The former is a well-classified and briefly annotated list of publications, nearly all British, but embracing a few American and foreign titles. Complete only as to government publications, it includes also useful references to books, pamphlets, articles, and reports. Mr. Cole's volume is a serviceable assemblage of material for the history of dilution, especially in the engineering trades. As adviser to the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, Mr. Cole had unusual opportunities to see things from the labor point of view, and he has brought together a large number of valuable official and other documents. His most interesting conclusion is that British industry has gone back with unexpected rapidity and completeness to pre-war methods and customs, because there is no expansion of her post-war markets sufficient to warrant continuance of that mass-production so rapidly introduced during the war. Meanwhile a million and a half of her work-people are unemployed.

HENRY MUSSEY

Midwife to Culture

Port of New York. By Paul Rosenfeld. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

PAUL ROSENFELD'S new book so admirably named "Port of New York" sets out to persuade the reader that here and now in America there has appeared a deep, indigenous culture capable of holding its own against any that is present in the older countries of Europe. The thing has been largely achieved, so it seems to Mr. Rosenfeld, by the work of some fourteen of his own contemporaries—writers, painters, and musicians.

There is something about Mr. Rosenfeld's work that is extremely reassuring. One may be irritated by his partiality, by a certain self-indulgence in his style, but one cannot fail to recognize this critical writing as a very rare and valuable influence upon the life of America today. Few men of letters who concern themselves with the aesthetic life of this country can show as much spiritual sympathy, as much sensitiveness, and as much inspiration as this refined, distinguished, and generous-hearted gentleman who has had the daring to take Beauty, wayward and wanton though she be, for a mistress.

In the task of adaptation to life on the material plane America has long since excelled. Mr. Rosenfeld is anxious to believe, does believe in fact, that at last the hour has come when her intellect has begun to develop also. In the pages of this book his most persuasive pen encourages the reader to share in a vivid consciousness of this awakening. Through his eyes, through his love-inspired vision we are made to contemplate the American scene with new understanding. We see the vast continent stretched out before us from New York to San Francisco, like a fecund drab, sprawling in a perpetual childbirth with Mr. Paul Rosenfeld at the bedside, an anxious, dedicated midwife, slapping to life the most frail and delicate of all the monster's myriad offsprings. He envisages America as "part of a civilization of outer frenetic movement and inner rigidity," as a society "organized for business only" reinforced by generations of young men "all admirably adjusted to the immoral, untightened thing that exists." And against this inert mass, whose only motive power is the acquisitive instinct, stands a handful of select artists who refuse to be satisfied with life constructed on so commonplace a design.

And Mr. Rosenfeld with his unfailing emotional receptivity is most admirably fitted for elucidating the particular virtues that belong to the artists he loves. His periods, rich, undulating, sensuous, go trailing across his pages like colored clouds of incense. They assail the senses and are provocative of "easeful" dreams. He writes with velvet gloves on his hands, on those beautiful pontifical hands that neither dig nor spin. And yet his method, that singular method so unique and original and amusingly characteristic of Mr. Rosenfeld, is capable of initiating one's mind into difficult artistic secrets far more surely than that of other methods the technique of which is more direct.

It is a pity that he so often allows his style such enormous liberty, that he allows it to lengthen out, to deteriorate, to become lush and over-silky. Ah! if one might only be permitted to compile a list of the words that this eminent writer should be forbidden to use, words that are typified by his constant substitution of the word commence for the simpler word begin, words that are affected, sentimental, soft, words like colourful, unbeknownst, distinguishedness, daypour, fountainwise, trustfuller. If one were but permitted to indicate with due modesty a suspicion that there is something perilously self-conscious about such sentences as these: Of New York, "The stuff of the breast can make its way into the world here too"; of Sherwood Anderson, "Creatures able to strengthen him were about," or again, "Walls are noiselessly a-crumble in Anderson"; of Carl Sandburg, "He perceives resting upon the ravished countryside the unearthly light of the future. Verses come."

But then against this particular kind of exaggerated personal unction which Mr. Rosenfeld is only too easily prone to pour over life, like treacle over an unleavened pancake, one must set a thousand other examples, where, in spite of its opulence, his style remains penetrating and firm.

Take this of Theodore Dreiser: "It was only Brontosaurus rex lumbering through a Mesozoic swamp," or this of Sherwood Anderson: "The premature decay of buildings in America, the doleful agedness of things grown old without becoming beautiful, and the brutality of the Chicago skyline, open to him through a furtive chink some truth of his own starved, powerful life, his own buried Mississippi Valley, his own unused Empire."

Indeed, the mere publication of this book with its wide, aesthetic sweep, offers sufficient proof that "the hard, cheap, untitled American soil" can produce not only massive monuments of financial acuteness but products which, though less substantial, are perhaps even more essential to the welfare of a nation. To use Mr. Paul Rosenfeld's own inimitable phraseology "the water world beyond Sandy Hook" need no longer "draw" Americans. "A kind of strong, hearty daylight has come upon the Port. . . . It seems that we have taken root. The place has gotten a gravity that holds us. The suction outward has abated."

LEWELY & POWYS

The Higher Hokum

Crystallizing Public Opinion. By Edward L. Bernays. Boni and Liveright. $3.

THIS is a plea for the recognition of a new profession—that of public relations counsel. He is your publicity man of yesterday, the shabby, underpaid fellow who sought to worm a little free space out of the newspapers by devious ways, raised to the nth power. Today, equipped with his new title and other accoutrements of respectability, he steps forth as a super-diagnostician of the public mind. This new sublimation is in response to an obvious need. Mr. Bernays points out that "besides the danger of interference by the public in the conduct of the industry," there is another factor of first importance: "business and sales are no longer to be had for the asking." Therefore it is "imperative that the seller consider other things than merely his product in trying to build up a favorable reaction." Here is an example: Formerly the Jewelers' Publicity Association merely "acquainted the public with the value of jewelry for merchandise gift purposes; now it finds itself engaged in eliminating from the public mind in general, and from the minds of legislators in particular, the impression that 'the jewelry business is . . . useless.'"

As another sample of what can be done, Mr. Bernays cites the following:

Shortly after the World War the King and Queen of the Belgians visited America. One of the many desired results of this visit was that it should be made apparent that America with all the foreign elements . . . was unified in its support of King Albert and his country. To present a graphic picture of the affection that the national elements here had for the Belgian monarch, a performance was staged at the Metropolitan Opera House . . . at which the many nationalist groups were represented. . . . The story was spread in the news columns and by photographs in the press throughout the world. It was evident to all who saw the pictures or read the story that this king had really stirred the affectionate interest of the national elements that make up America.

Mr. Bernays considers that "perhaps the most significant social, political, and industrial fact about the present century is the increased attention paid to public opinion," especially by men and organizations whose attitude not long ago would have been "the public be damned." Significant, no doubt. But, considering the nature of this attention, is it cause for rejoicing? Will the final result be greatly different for a public which, while it no longer tolerates being "damned," guilelessly permits itself to be "bunked"? Is seduction preferable to ravishment? The public relations counsel's function will be to create illusions, of which far too many have already been foisted on society without expert aid; to make people want things they don't need; to perfume the malodorous; to make the worse appear the better cause. It is an extension of this very idea to professionalize and exalt what is already not an unknown though largely untitled vocation in our midst. Plenty of lawyers, diplomatists, clergymen, journalists, and business men now carry it as a side line. Mr. Bernays views the matter more rosily. His conclusion is that the public relations counsel is destined to fulfil his highest usefulness to society "in the creation of a public conscience." Not only may one doubt that the glorified press agent will fulfil this destiny, but that a public conscience thus "created" would be useful or desirable.

ERNEST GRUENING

Appreciations

Essays in European and Oriental Literature. By Lafcadio Hearn. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

MORE and more the "shy, wild, beautiful spirit" that was Hearn is emerging from the fine dust of controversy which for a time almost threatened to conceal his essential quality. Owing partly to Hearn's erratic personality, partly to his outspokenness, but most of all to his revealing and voluminous correspondence, this singular figure in American literature seemed to step from life into legend—with no twilight zone between. His commentators were like so many prowling literary buttonholers, intent upon exploiting their theories at any cost. In fact, all that was necessary in order to qualify as a commentator was at some time to have evolved a theory about Hearn—or to have received a letter from him. Sometimes the two things coincided, but not always. Recently, however, there has been a healthy tendency to drop controversy and to return to the writings of the man. His lectures on literature to his pupils in Japan have been compiled from shorthand notes; his letters, especially those to Basil Hall Chamberlain, have proved rich in critical material. Finally, Albert Mordell has unearthed, in Hearn's writings for the New Orleans Times-Democrat, a stimulating assortment of articles. These papers testify to the enthusiasm, the alert curiosity, and the fine critical perceptiveness of their author, who kept his mind free from the journalistic treadmill by his discoveries and his appreciations of French, Hindoo, and Japanese literature. Some of his findings are as applicable today as they were when they were written in the eighties.

The novel is the literary form which the nineteenth century may truly claim to have perfected. Yet at the present time even the novel seems to be suffering from the over-scientific spirit. . . . In all the provinces of literature we stand in dire need of the buoyant naturalness which is characteristic of the earlier writers. The longing for this quality is not to be satisfied by the anatomical accuracy and overwrought attention to detail which chiefly marks the most applauded efforts of contemporary genius.

And this, from an essay on Heine:

Imitation is not a word which can explain talent; but it is an accusation which may be leveled at the highest modern creative power with some superficial show of argument—the sculptor, the painter, the poet, are all to a certain extent imitators, since progress in literature and in all art involves the preservation and renovation and expansion of the beauties of the Past.

LISLE BELL

And He Called the Name of the City, Samaria

Harvard Excavations at Samaria, 1908-1910. By George Andrew Reisner, Clarence Stanley Fisher, and David Gordon Lyon. Harvard University Press. 2 vols. 1924.

And he bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, and built on the hill, and called the name of the city which he built, after the name of Shemer, owner of the hill, Samaria.

THE city of Samaria, founded by Omri of Israel as his capital early in the history of the Divided Kingdom, has been resurrected and reconstructed for modern eyes by the skill and patience of Professor Reisner and his coworkers. As a result of the European War and other vicissitudes, even the Samaria undertaking suffered; for, though the excavations took place in 1908-10 and the reports were practically ready in 1913, printing was delayed until 1923. At last, however, two substantial folio volumes, of sizes calculated best to exhibit the numerous photographs and drawings, present the detailed records and results.

The summit of the hill of Samaria formed, as usual, the nucleus of the settlement. On it were found the most important structures, the Israelite palace and the later temple of Herod. Excavations outside of this section were limited almost entirely to the West Gate of the city and to the Roman basilica. The oldest building, the Israelite palace, itself revealed three distinct stages of construction, due presumably to Omri, Ahab, and Jeroboam II. Bits of the earliest fortification wall, found at the West Gate and along the cliff at the southern edge of the summit, complete our present knowledge of the Israelite city. This was destroyed by Sargon of Assyria in 722 B.C.; but house walls survive in such positions as to show that the place was soon rebuilt, presumably by Sargon's colonists, while a new fortification wall clearly inclosed a more restricted portion of the summit.

A gap in the use of the site may have followed, but the positions of dated coins and pottery show that it was occupied continuously from perhaps 500 to 107 B.C. Alexander's conquest in 331 and the struggles of his political heirs had little effect on the topography. John Hyrcanus, however, seems about 107 B.C. to have wrought destruction which was not made good until Gabinius restored Samaria some fifty years later. Many streets and houses of this latter period were found filled in with rubbish beneath the pavement of the great temple which soon followed. This was built by Herod the Great in honor of his Emperor Augustus, for whom also the name of the city was changed to Sebaste. Forum, basilica, hippodrome, and theater (most of these still unexcavated) suggest the increased importance of this Roman town. But when Sebaste ceased to be a capital, the temple fell from its glory to serving as a stone quarry, from which plight it was temporarily rescued and restored under the Emperor Septimius Severus about 200 A.D. A humble modern village off to one side now occupies this site of ancient greatness. Such in brief is the recovered history of Samaria.

But the process of recovering such a general picture requires a mass of detailed observations; and, since "every excavation destroys historical material which has been accumulating for ages," so that "no future excavator can verify or confute the evidence or the interpretation," it becomes "the excavator's duty to put his archaeological colleagues and successors as fully as possible in his own place, and with notes, maps, plans, and photographs, to enable them, as far as possible, to reconstruct graphically the progress of the work." The bulk of the two volumes, then, forms a reference work consisting of these detailed records on which all conclusions must depend.

The problems raised by unusually confused stratigraphic conditions at Samaria have led Reisner to make a more general contribution also to the science of archaeology. Besides explaining his own methods and records, he has discussed, with diagrams, the deposition of the various types of debris and their modification by later operations.

"Only a small fraction of the space within the wall has been dug up" so far, says Reisner, appealing for further exploration of the Samaria site. But, though of undeniable interest to the biblical student, one may question whether further results at Samaria could be comparable in historical and cultural value to those now being attained by Fisher at Beisan, to those of Reisner himself in the Sudan (where he recovered not only ancient Egyptian connections but the tombs and history of all the kings of ancient Ethiopia), or finally to the possibilities offered by countless Babylonian mounds. Skilful and conscientious excavators are all too few. May we hope that the Samaria project will not withdraw such able archaeologists as Reisner and Fisher from more productive fields of effort.

T. GEORGE ALLEN

Books in Brief

The Novels of Jane Austen. Edited by R. W. Chapman. Oxford University Press. 5 vols. $35.

No other British novelist has yet been edited with the sumptuous care here given to Jane Austen, who would doubtless be as surprised as any human being, living or dead, to see her novels thus honored by the Clarendon Press. The text, long corrupted, has been restored by collation with the early editions; there are elaborate notes and copious indexes; and the superb volumes, half-bound in delectable style, are illustrated with many pictures from contemporary sources. Though only the six completed novels are included and though there is no biography, the work is admirably thorough. Mr. Chapman has written informed and piquant disquisitions on Miss Austen's English, the reading and writing and modes of address observed among her characters, the manners, "improvements," carriages, and travel of the age, the chronology and punctuation of the novels, the early editions, the relations to current books, and the topography of Bath. Not too systematic, the editor distributes his dissertations through the volumes in accordance with some charming scheme which is not too apparent, and in his notes permits himself a few such amateur touches as the statement that in the United States "well-bred" "husbands and wives, even among intimates, refer to each other as 'Mr.' and 'Mrs.'" A conspicuous feature of the edition is the illustrations, both plain and colored, which exhibit the manners and looks of the age, indoors and out, as no other illustrations of this author can be said to do. Perhaps the most charming consequence of the editorial method which Mr. Chapman has pursued is that the apparatus criticus never seems mere learned lumber. Despite the pains taken to explain Miss Austen at every turn, she still emerges in all her native eminence of wit, verve, perspicacity, and grace.

Boston Days of William Morris Hunt. By Martha A. S. Shannon. Marshall Jones.

"In another country," said Hunt himself, "I might have been a painter." Very little of any such sense of his limitations appears in this biographical study by Martha Shannon, who judges him by his intentions and his influence rather than by his actual achievement. Loving Boston, she loves the most conspicuous painter of its silver age. The illustrations of her volume are in the main satisfactory, and the text pleasing if not quite critical.

by Maximilian Harden

Translated and Edited by WILLIAM C. LAWTON

Maximilian Harden is a voice crying in the wilderness. He contributes here the most arresting political work that has come out of Germany—out of Europe, for that matter—since the war. Persecuted and reviled by his own countrymen, Harden will yet be counted a prophet; a German, singularly unbiased, who can see beyond Junkerism and the hopelessness of new wars. $2.50

Yea and Nay

A SERIES OF DEBATES

Imagine a tea table conversation with Rebecca West, a political discussion with the brilliant Philip Guedalla, or a heart-to-heart talk with H. G.

Wells on the evils of present-day education. If you are a woman, the idea will thrill you; even men will be interested. That is what YEA AND NAY is all about. A group of unstudied, friendly debates, in which are engaged many of England's greatest literary and political celebrities. It is unique among contemporary letters. $2.00

The Story of Boxing

by Trevor C. Wignall

Through Mr. Wignall's thrilling pages stalk the fighters of the centuries. Side by side with our own Jack Dempsey the champions of old England pace, Tom Sayers, Jim Belcher, Gentleman Jackson and the rest, a confraternity of modern gladiators. Boxers and lovers of the manly art will find THE STORY OF BOXING both fascinating and complete. Illustrated. $6.00

Contemporary Portraits

FOURTH SERIES

by Frank Harris

Author of "Oscar Wilde," "Montes the Matador," etc.

In this fourth volume of his famous portraits, Frank Harris has analyzed several Americans much in the public eye. Included are Charles Chaplin,

Senator La Follette, Otto Kahn, H. L. Mencken, and many others. Frank Harris never writes about anyone whom he has not known intimately, nor, one might add, about anyone who is not well worth knowing. $2.50

Barbed Wire and Wayfarers. By Edwin Ford Piper. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.
Skylines and Horizons. By Du Bose Heyward. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

Two volumes of American local verse—the first dealing with the old West and the second with the Southern mountains—which lack genuine vitality as poetry because their authors have failed to invent a local language. By this is meant not a dialect but an idiom, and particularly a rhythm, saturated with the atmosphere and the human character under observation. Mr. Piper and Mr. Heyward write respectable, up-to-date verse of the sort that may be used for any subject; there seems to have been no artistic necessity for their treating the mountains and the plains.

Suetonius. History of Twelve Caesars. Translated by Philemon Holland (Anno 1606). Edited by J. H. Freese. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

Heliodorus. An Aethiopian Romance. Translated by Thomas Underdowne (Anno 1587). Revised and partly rewritten by F. A. Wright. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Three Plays of A. V. Lunacharski. Faust and the City; Vasilisa the Wise; The Magi. Translated by L. A. Magnus and K. Walter. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

These three volumes expand the limits of the already generous series called The Broadway Translations to include Roman biography, Greek romance, and Bolshevik drama. It is agreeable to have Philemon Holland's enthusiastic version of the most lurid of all biographers available once more, even at the present price. Mr. Wright has worked with his known delicacy and skill to make Underdowne's Heliodorus readable by moderns yet savory of the Elizabethans. Lunacharski appears now for the first time in English dress, except for a limited edition of "Vasilisa" two years ago. It is doubtless impossible to render him perfectly, in view of his extreme fertility of idea and phrase; but it is sufficiently clear through him that contemporary Russian drama lives freely and vigorously in the new air of the revolution.

Some Thoughts on Hilaire Belloc. By Patrick Braybrooke. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

Mr. Braybrooke's consideration of Belloc is as curious as his book about Chesterton; in both instances he talks completely around his subject, giving expression to nebulous ideas which are either irrelevant or unimportant. As an interpreter of the writer whom he honors, he never gets anywhere near an orderly exposition of orderly thoughts, and even in the projection of his own notions he is about as illuminating as a roman candle of rhetoric. In his chapter devoted to Belloc and the press, Mr. Braybrooke summarizes his own convictions thus: "I contend therefore that as things are at present the ownership of the press by wealthy men is not only desirable but to my mind inevitable." Elsewhere he remarks: "I think that Belloc's book on the Jews while interesting is full of faulty arguments." And this: "I do not think Belloc is likely to have a very sudden or great popularity as an essayist. . . . Yet when all is said and done, we at any rate shall in the winter sit by the fire and read him." Mr. Braybrooke may read Belloc as much as he likes, but why should he write about him—in summer or winter?

Birds of the New York City Region. By Ludlow Griscom. American Museum of Natural History.

Few bird manuals are as dramatic as this check-list of the birds of our greatest city. For here is not merely the story of forests giving way to suburbs and of birds yielding to the white man almost as completely as has the red Indian; here is also the story of a readjustment. The pileated woodpecker, the magnificent logcock of the northern woods, after being threatened with extinction, is coming back in northern Jersey as elsewhere; certain species of gulls which were almost unknown in New York harbor ten years ago are now common sights each winter; few New Yorkers are aware that the national eagle winters on the Palisades, or that the peregrine falcon, or duck hawk, manages to adjust itself to life in the rich pigeon-hunting grounds of the city. If the eighteen native species which nested in Central Park in 1908 have been reduced to eight, the transient current of bird life is still so rich that sixty-six species were seen on one May day of 1922. Mr. Griscom's book, a compilation of the records of a century, is more than a check-list; it is a history of the city's shifting avifauna, including many useful hints for field identification which are not to be found in the older manuals.

Sam Slick. By Thomas Chandler Haliburton. Edited by Ray Palmer Baker. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Extracts from ten of Haliburton's books, largely devoted to the sayings and doings of Sam Slick, that memorable Yankee clockmaker and philosopher. Exhibiting Slick at full length, the extracts serve also to reproduce the conditions of Canadian life in the middle of the nineteenth century as no other writings could do.

Cavalier and Puritan. Ballads and Broad-sides Illustrating the Period of the Great Rebellion, 1640-1660. Edited by Hyder E. Rollins. New York University Press.

Seventy-five ballads and verse broadsides, of which not more than half a dozen have ever been reprinted since the days which called them forth. The introduction, with its history of broadsides during the English Civil War and the Commonwealth, is a first-rate piece of erudite investigation, and the verses themselves are edited in a manner to excite and aid all antiquarians and collectors.

The Art of Terence. By Gilbert Norwood. Oxford: Blackwell. 7s. 6d.

Gilbert Norwood, author of an admirable book on Euripides and Shaw, here studies Terence as "one of the most consummate playwrights in the whole history of the stage," like Congreve in brilliance of style, like Thackeray in character-drawing, like Marivaux in dialogue, and like Balzac in sheer humanity. The praise is excessive, but the argument is excellent.

Negro Poets and Their Poems. By Robert T. Kerlin. Associated Publishers. $1.50.

A valuable reference-book for those who need information about modern Negro verse. After a brief preliminary chapter on the folk-material already so well known—the Spirituals and the Seculars—the editor presents an extensive body of biographical and critical data concerning individual poets, the majority of them contemporary. Little of the verse quoted is good if judged by liberal standards, but none of it is cheap and all of it is impressive when seen against the background of its race.

The Heights. By Marguerite Bryant. Duffield and Company. $2.

All great truths may very possibly be spiritual, but a certain conservative element can still be found sticking stolidly by the belief that there are a few little ones which are matter of fact and material. Not so in "The Heights." There a man cannot adjust his collar without shedding an introspective tear. He cannot sit down without the aid of a leaden heartache. He cannot wash his face except in a tepid bath of lavender emotion. Life on the hazy slopes back of Monte Carlo is a humid day-dream that gropes on and on—platitudinously.

is more than that. It is a panorama of the noblest English verse from Chaucer to Masefield, with some prose works by poets and some critical and bibliographical works concerning them. Siege. By Samuel Hopkins Adams. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Mr. Adams is a competent craftsman and a shrewd observer of the contemporary scene; he understands how to put a novel together so that its values will be luminously disposed, free from foggy interludes and arid patches. "Siege" is a study of family and character, well thought out and set down with skill and pace. Few recent novels dealing with the antagonism of the old and the new generation have presented the theme as successfully.

The Innocence of G. K. Chesterton. By Gerald Bullett. Henry Holt and Company. $2.25.

Quite appropriately, Mr. Chesterton is here tried on a charge of innocence and the verdict is guilty. Mr. Bullett is more intent upon summing up for the jury with eloquence than he is upon presenting the evidence; the case is, notwithstanding, conducted with proper decorum. His indictment is more serious on paper than in court; Mr. Chesterton emerges smiling and undiminished.

The Travels of Fa-hsien (399-414 A.D.), or Record of the Buddhist Kingdoms. Re-translated by H. A. Giles. Cambridge University Press. 5s.

A fascinating chronicle of one of the most heroic adventures ever undertaken. Fa-hsien went on foot from Central China, across the desert of Gobi, over the Hindu Kush, through India to the mouth of the Hoogly, and took ship back to China with books of the Buddhist Canon and images of Buddhist deities for which he had gone. By comparison, says Mr. Giles, with this expedition "the journeys of St. Paul melt into insignificance." A trustworthy source of information regarding Buddhist Asia in the glow of its dawn, the little book is intrinsically full of charm and wonder. The present translation of the "Travels" is an improvement upon any now existent in a European language.

Art and the Camera

By THOMAS CRAVEN

THE photograph has two qualities capable of stimulating the aesthetic faculties. The first of these is concerned with the rendering of textural distinctions; the second lies in the simple reproduction of the physically beautiful, that is, of the beauty which nature has so lavishly provided. To bring out accurately in black and white the harsh and the delicate tones and the fine shades of colored surfaces demands a small measure of creative thought—the end must be visualized and the chemistry of printing regulated accordingly. But creation of this sort has no more significance than the plates made by astronomers and metallographers aiming wholly at practical results; and it is a waste of time to lay much emphasis on the artistic merits of such performances. The process is largely a matter of chemistry and mechanics, and the fact that the operation of light can be controlled, that the tonalities of prints are susceptible to infinite variation, in no respect alters the original objective nature of the undertaking. The second quality, the preservation of the beauty inherent in natural objects—the charm of faces and flowers, the disposition of clouds, the fall of snow—is merely a transfer of values. When a photographer opens his lens upon a given scene he leaves behind him the emotional force of direct experience, and has nothing to substitute for this indispensable aesthetic factor. The interest in the transfer is de-terminated entirely by good taste and by the intelligence and by the ingenuity manifested in the selection of the subject matter. As emotional creation it is comparable to the activity of a sentimentalist before a beautiful sunset.

One of the commonest errors committed by dilettantes and amateur aesthetes arises from the belief that the whole content of an emotional experience before nature can be rendered pictorially by reproducing the scene which has set the feelings into motion. This is an old superstition: years ago it was prevalent in a conventional English school where the actual failure of such a belief when put into practice caused naive painters to append poems and literary rhapsodies to the frames of their landscapes.

Alfred Stieglitz, probably the most accomplished photographer in the world, shares the delusions of the laborious old botanical copyists. He asks us to believe that the reduplication of natural phenomena carries an emotional freightage identical with that of creative art; that the transfers of his camera are as intense and exciting as the canvases of imaginative painters whose forms are not the result of simple impressions but the product of knowledge, reflection, and a genius for construction. I think that Stieglitz feels unconsciously the meager success of his intentions, and for this reason discovers symbolical meanings and curious psychic values in what are only remarkable transcripts of nature. His bewildering explanations are not only unnecessary but damaging to the value of his photographs as such. In his third exhibition at the Anderson Galleries he has a series of cloud formations—unusual selections beautifully printed. These pictures are better than the clouds of Tarr's Physical Geography because they are printed by a man with an uncanny understanding of his medium; but aesthetically there is little to choose between them. They are not, as Stieglitz seems to have convinced himself, portraits of human souls, and the effort to exploit them in this light is too transparent in its psychology to go very far. In the last analysis, work in this world will have to stand on its intrinsic merits. It is as fine photography that Stieglitz's prints will stand and not as monuments of the creative will.

Drama Confession II

IS it because the season is waning and grows a little weary that I am asking for the moon? But in truth I am not asking for the moon. I have tried to explain from the analogy of music that there is something well-nigh intolerable in the present situation. There is a closer analogy, one, at least, that will strike home more. Consider the desolate and unfurnished mind of one who reads no books but those hot off the press and whose ears are filled only with the debates and interests of the hour, one who never withdraws with story or poem or essay into those cooler and serener chambers of the past where striving and crying are over, debate has long been hushed, and beauty and the life of beauty take on something of an eternal semblance. I have just been reading the verses of Miss Millay. She is a fine poet. But I would not read her and her coevals without ceasing. With a profound relish, with a renewed quietude of mind I take up my Herrick, even my Carey. "Ask me no more where Jove bestows . . ."

But as a critic of the theater I cannot indulge in a parallel experience. I can read the older dramatists, to be sure. But I am not supposed to be writing about dramatic literature from the viewpoint of the study, but about the theater from the viewpoint of the stalls. And it is there, in the stalls, that I have no opportunity to have the experiences which alone, alone I must repeat, can keep a dramatic critic decently fit for his job or an habitual theatergoer properly attuned to an appreciation even of new works—especially, indeed, of new works.

I discount the possible dangers at once. There is nothing that is 100 per cent safe in all human experience. Of course such a repertory as I demand would breed the critic who is a confirmed laudator temporis acti and who can see nothing good in anything that was not new when his grandmother was a little wench. But that critic is with us anyhow. For he is commonly not so much wedded to the past as he is frightened of the present and of the inadequacy of his own judgment and will, even as things are, praise only the thrice praised, having no stomach for being left alone with a masterpiece. It is the bright and willing and younger critic who will be saved from his present errors of astonishment at the eternal moods of great literature, of attributing a lasting significance to the feeble, temporal, ephemeral, of writing as though the history of the drama, save for Shakespeare, began with Oscar Wilde and ended with Eugene O'Neill.

What, concretely, do I want in a given season?

1. The "Medea" of Euripides. Not as an experiment in stagecraft or archaeology but as a great human document and as a great poem.

2. Either the "Misanthrope" or the "Tartufe" of Molière. And neither in prose nor blank verse, but in the couplet of Dryden. Mere literacy demands that.

3. Congreve's "The Way of the World." What a Millamant Grace George would make!

4. A play of Sheridan or Goldsmith or Beaumarchais or Goldoni.

5. "The Cenci" or Shelley, the greatest English tragedy since Shakespeare, the greatest European play of the entire Romantic movement.

6. Hebbel's "Maria Magdalena."

7. An Ibsen cycle, varying from year to year. One season "An Enemy of the People," "The Master Builder," "Little Eyolf." Another season "Hedda Gabler," "The Wild Duck," "When We Dead Awaken."

8. One or two of the following: Becque's "Les Corbeaux," Porto-Riche's "Amoureuse," Hervieu's "Connais-toi," Hauptmann's "Lonely Lives," Hauptmann's "Weavers," Schnitzler's "Light o' Love," Schnitzler's "Professor Bernhardt."

9. One or two of these: W. B. Yeats's "The King's Threshold," "On Baile's Strand," "The Land of Heart's Desire," Synge's "The Tinker's Wedding," Hauptmann's "Henry of Aue"—with John Barrymore—and perhaps a revival of Stephen Phillips's "Paolo and Francesca" or "Herod." Perhaps.

10. A Shaw cycle similar to the Ibsen cycle. One year "Widowers' Houses," "Candida," "Arms and the Man"; another year "Mrs. Warren's Profession," "You Never Can Tell," "Man and Superman."

Do I seem to be asking for a great deal? But there are in the neighborhood of one hundred and seventy-five premières in a New York season. I ask for only about twenty plays to take the place of twenty productions of hopeless trash. If the managers, if a few managers, were to cooperate and to put on one of the plays of my choice each time that, in a despairing gamble, they are tempted to put on something particularly unpromising and trivial, we should soon have a great theater, and these cooperative managers would probably be in money at the end of the season.

CONFUSION

BY

JAMES GOULD COZZENS

No first novel has awakened the universal interest that welcomed the publication of this novel. An advanced review of the book comments: "Mr. Cozzens has provided in 'Confusion' a novel of unqualified excellence, rich in the maturity born of assured and patrician detachment and never lavish beyond the dictates of sound taste. It is a story for the judicious and is characterized by those attributes of depth and freedom which alone appeal to the discriminating reader. Written with a sincere regard for the canons of scholarly and polished creation the novel is more attractive than any so far appearing on this year's publication lists and is far and away the most successful first novel within the memory of the reviewer."

The above is a tribute to a novel written by a Harvard undergraduate in his nineteenth year. In a season of excellent fiction "Confusion" is certain to stand out as the conspicuous beginning of an extraordinary literary career.

404 pages, end leaves d'atree stag. Price $2.00.

LIGE GOLDEN, THE MAN WHO TWINKLED

By WILLIAM W. HARVEY

This story is full of the Vermont air President Coolidge breathed forty years ago. It is an absorbing new kind of psychological novel of a boy's interpretation of a modern Man of Sorrows whose eyes twinkled like "bubbles of light in a dark fountain." Illustrated by Thomas Hunt. $2.00

BY SANCTION OF LAW

By JOSHUA HENRY JONES, JR.

A novel of the Race Problem full of thrilling action. The story begins against the university background of a Northern city and shifts to South Carolina, where it ends on a highly dramatic note. The author is a well-known Boston newspaper man. 414 pages, $2.00

BACKROADS: MAINE NARRATIVES—With Lyrics by WINIFRED VIRGINIA JACKSON. With an Introduction by W. S. BRAITHWAITE.

An exceptional book of poems of New England life. $2.00

HIS BLUE SERGE SUIT, and other plays

By BELLE MACDIARMID RITCHIE

Contains four plays of exceptional interest. "His Blue Serge Suit," "Jethro," "The Portrait of Yolande" and "A Little Home of Their Own." $1.50

VERSE—ORIGINAL and TRANSLATED

By JOHN HEARD, JR.

A volume of verse of unusual interest. Besides his original verse Mr. Heard is well known for his translations from the French and German. An extensive traveler, his volume reflects the alluring and spontaneous charm of a cosmopolitan spirit. $2.00

Who Are the Reds?

Daugherty and Burns say there are 3,000,000 of them in America. So does the National Security League.

WHAT ARE THEY THINKING AND DOING?

Plotting agin the gov'ment? Bombs? Terror?

Or is it really true that there is a deep revolt growing in the masses of the farmers and workingmen?

Certainly, there is a great radical change taking place in America. In politics, in industry, in the Labor Movement, fundamental changes are taking place.

If there has ever been a need for a daily newspaper, fundamentally in opposition to the existing order, the need is now.

THE DAILY WORKER

is dedicated to fundamental change of the social order.

THE DAILY WORKER

TELLS WHO ARE THE REDS

What they are thinking and what they are doing.

THE DAILY WORKER

is the only daily newspaper in America that publishes the news and interprets the news in the interests of the rebellious workers and farmers.

With Benefit of Clergy

By FLORENCE HACKETT

A poem in prose has very often been the worst praise that could be given a good book. Yet there is almost no quality which so definitely stamps this book by the sister of Francis Hackett as its intimately poetic quality. "The principal character is reminiscent in the beauty of his simplicity of Wordsworth's Michael—and, in fact, the entire book seems tinged with the open, sad beauty of the poem."

—N. Y. Tribune

"TOLD BY AN IDIOT" is a novel of unusual distinction made almost unique in recent fiction by the fact that it is conceived entirely in the vein of pure comedy."

Lloyd Morris in the International Book Review thus gives an able summing of the essential spirit of this extraordinary fictional summing up of the last fifty years of civilization.

"An Ocean Hymn"

Translated in meter from the German of HEINRICH HEINE

By Howard Mumford Jones

With critical introduction on Heine as "a poet of the sea."

PRESS NOTICES

"Unquestionably brilliant and noble are many of the passages."—Hartford Courant.

"An interesting introduction which, in many ways, is the best part of the book."—Christian Science Monitor.

"The witchery of its imagery, and the music of its cadences."—Edinburgh Scotsman.

"No other version approaches it in its thorough attention to detail... there is an introduction that is, in itself, a fine piece of creative writing."—The New Republic.

"German English text makes the book of great value to students."—Review of Reviews.

"Any endeavor to make people read and understand Heine is commendable."—The New York Sun.

"A fine translation into English... of Heine's majestic poem of mighty waters... It is a worthy setting in English of one of the most impressive and beautiful apostrophes to nature enshrined in the literature of any land."—Philadelphia North American.

"A faithful study of the original."—New York World.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

"Howard Mumford Jones is head of general literature in the University of Texas. He is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin. He took his M.A. at the University of Chicago and was honored by being chosen to write the ode celebrating the quarter-centennial of the University of Chicago."

PERSONAL AND PRESS COMMENT

"I think it is the best of its kind I have ever seen. I have read it with great pleasure, and am commending it to my friends."—W. H. P. Faunce, President Brown University, Providence, R. I.

"It is clear and concise and written in an engaging style. It is ingenious in its manner of dealing with the materials and is the work of the mind of a genuine teacher."—G. S. Dickinson, Department of Music, Vassar College.

"The book is extraordinarily good. Few publications that have appeared in the last few years seem to me to promise to contribute so much to musical education as it does. The range of topics is all that it should be and only what it should be, the treatment is authoritative, and the style of writing, while clear and pointed, is yet easy and attractive."—Will Earhart, Director of Music, Pittsburgh Public Schools.

HOPE SHINES in the dispatches from Europe. Apparently the Allied governments are willing to discuss the Dawes report and even to modify it. The Reparation Commission, on which Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Italy are represented, and the German Government have accepted it "in principle." That means that it is to serve as a basis for discussion. If the Allies are willing to discuss open-mindedly instead of insisting, pistol in hand, that the Germans sign on the dotted line whether they believe it possible to do what they promise or not, then indeed a new era is dawning. We shall discuss the recommendations of the Dawes report later. In principle they are excellent, though we doubt the feasibility of many details. They include the all-important statement that it is "impossible to provide for the restoration" of Germany's credit until "the fiscal and economic unity of the Reich will be restored"—in other words, until the French get out of the Ruhr. The most objectionable passage is that ultimatum-like sentence: "We regard our report as an indivisible whole." But that take-it-or-leave-it attitude seems already to have been dropped.

PARIS IS FETING the Rumanian king and queen—the historic preliminary to a military alliance. The old game goes on, and part of it is to provide a humanitarian cloak for imperialistic actions. Rumania still holds Bessarabia as a relic of the days when all the world was fighting Soviet Russia, and she refuses to let the Bessarabians decide by plebiscite which flag they prefer to fly from their town halls. On that issue the Russo-Rumanian conference broke up, and the natural next step was to look for allies in case of trouble. Poincaré seems to have volunteered. The first evidence of his readiness to fight for Bessarabia was of course disguised: it was his telegram of protest to the Soviet authorities against the execution of twelve intellectuals at Kiev. As it happens, the twelve were not all "intellectuals," and they had not yet been sentenced. The Kiev court finally sentenced three men to death: they were convicted of correspondence with foreign white-guard groups, and one of selling Red army secrets to Poland. Poincaré's protest may irritate Russia, but none the less we expect her to commute these sentences. Death sentences are barbarous in any country, and death sentences for political offenses—even when later commuted—are discouraging to Russia's friends abroad.

MR. COOLIDGE'S SUPPORTERS regard the presidential primaries in Michigan, Illinois, and Nebraska as settling the Republican nomination. Hiram Johnson has run ahead of the President thus far only in South Dakota, and there, as William Hard interprets it in his letter this week, the success of the California Senator was due to the identification of his candidacy with local interests. There has never been any progressive enthusiasm for Hiram Johnson's candidacy, and Mr. Coolidge's victories in the primaries mean no ebb in the Western revolt. There was no opposition candidate worth supporting. Senator Norris's two-to-one victory over his "regular" opponent in Nebraska, where Coolidge won the presidential delegates, shows that the voters know a real liberal when they see him. At this writing President Coolidge has 530 of the 555 delegates necessary for a choice; his friends predict that he will get 1,000 of the 1,109 delegates on the first ballot in Cleveland on June 10 and will thereupon be nominated by acclamation. Mr. Coolidge is the logical standard bearer of a politically bankrupt organization of patronage and privilege such as the Republican Party has become. If the Democrats nominate a man equally symbolic of their equal incapacity and hopelessness there will then be an opportunity for an independent or third-party ticket to present a clear issue to the voters, with hope of a large measure of success in congressional and local contests and a lively probability of throwing the election of the President into the House of Representatives.

SENATOR B. K. WHEELER has been through fire; renewed persecution will not halt him. He has been indicted, by a Montana grand jury headed by a bitter political enemy, at the instigation of a federal district attorney whom Wheeler had refused to recommend for a judgeship; he is accused of receiving money, after his election to office, for influencing the issuance of oil and gas prospecting permits. Senator Wheeler adopted the course which an honest man would adopt under such circumstances: he asked an immediate, searching investigation, both of his acts and of the origin of the indictment. The charge he denied flatly; he received his money, he says, for defending an independent oil operator in open court, before his term of office began. We believe him. Something of the origin of the indictment has already come out. Mr. Daugherty jumped into the lime-light, when the indictment was announced, to say that the department of which he used to have charge had nothing to do with it. William J. Burns, however, speaking under oath, stated that he had discussed the matter with Mr. Daugherty, and had sent three men to Montana to investigate Senator Wheeler—after Senator Wheeler had begun the investigation which uncovered Mr. Daugherty's malpractices. For most people that will be enough, without the further evidence of dirty work in the dispatch of men to Montana by the Republican National Committee.

CONGRESS HAS ACTED like a group of silly school-boys or temperamental prima donnas in dealing with the clause in the Johnson bill which excludes Japanese immigration entirely. The Japanese Ambassador, after various previous protests, wrote a last-minute letter to Mr. Hughes in which he pointed out frankly the resentment which the policy would produce in his country, where there are statesmen as touchy as our own. The letter was in no sense a threat; it was an approach to that open diplomacy which the world must substitute for existing ridiculous subterfuges if nations are ever to understand one another. Congress, however, was ruffled; it saw our national sovereignty invaded. The House rushed the immigration bill through, 326 to 71. In the Senate special action on the Japanese clause was taken by reason of an amendment designed to continue the present "gentlemen's agreement" instead of total exclusion. Schoolboy Shortridge of California rose in dissent, while Prima Donna Lodge of Massachusetts inveighed against the Japanese protest as a "veiled threat." The amendment was lost, 76 to 2. The merits of the immigration bill as a whole, or of total Japanese exclusion, have been forgotten in a burst of congressional petulance. Incidentally, the "Japanese menace" in America is a myth. In our issue of February 27 we noted that under the "gentlemen's agreement" the net immigration in the fifteen years from 1909 to 1923 had been only 8,681. One of our readers has written to say that, despite this, our Japanese population increased more than that during the period. It did; the census shows an increase (due to births in this country) of 38,853 Japanese between 1910 and 1920. In a nation of 120,000,000 persons is that a cause for alarm?

THE LABOR CABINET of Mr. MacDonald is not a junta of Anglo-Saxons, we are reminded by Charles F. G. Masterman, but is composed largely of the "Celtic fringe" of the British Isles. Of the twenty men in the group probably fewer than eight are of undiluted English blood, says this former member of Mr. Asquith's Liberal ministry, in the Atlantic Monthly. Nor is there anything peculiar in this, he goes on to relate, "for—so far as I can remember—Mr. Asquith is the only Prime Minister of any party who had any claim to be an Englishman, for the last eighty years."

It is interesting, however [he adds], to note how much the energy and driving force of any new labor or progressive movement comes from Scotsmen, Welshmen, Irishmen, and Jews. How little the great mass of stolid Anglo-Saxons really care for the difficult problems of social organization! How content they are to put up with inequalities and injustices until such inequalities and injustices become intolerable! How much they prefer, in rather happy-go-lucky fashion, to enjoy the simple pleasures of the day—the race-course, the football field, the cinema entertainment, the happiness of home, rather than in fierce crusade to indulge in the impeachment of those more wealthy or more lucky than themselves, in a sustained effort to overturn present society and build something better upon its ruins.

Oh, la, la! And this from the very hearth of Anglo-Saxondom! How will the tradition survive that Anglo-Saxons have a special mandate from Providence to rule the world if members of the tribe give the show away from the inside like this?

MUSSOLINI'S victory in the Italian elections is even greater than was generally expected. The Fascisti have 374 of the 535 seats in the Chamber of Deputies. With the assistance of friendly parties they have a majority of more than 400. The moderate groups generally sustained heavy losses; the Communists, on the extreme left, made slight gains. Mussolini's prevision in rigging the election law in advance to assure himself of a working majority turns out to have been unnecessary. The new method provides that the party obtaining the most votes (providing they are 25 per cent of the total) shall be assigned two-thirds of the seats in the Chamber, or 356. Mussolini has several better than this without the aid of artificial respiration. As one of the newspaper dispatches suggests, he has now become a "constitutional dictator"—whatever that may be. Making all allowances for Fascist terrorization and suppression, the result nevertheless shows how completely the emotional strain of the past ten years has exhausted Italy (and other parts of Europe tell the same story), making the people willing to accept any despotism that promises a degree of stability and material assurance. Fascism will probably fall not by opposition from without but by quarrels from within. Its new-won security is likely to hasten such strife.

MUSCLE SHOALS will not go to Henry Ford if Senator Norris, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, can make the public and his colleagues in the Senate see what a stupendous gift this water-power is and how paltry a return is proffered. "No man in the world has ever received such a bounty from any government," he says, but he thinks Mr. Ford less responsible for the propaganda behind the proposal than the real-estate sharps who have staked out enormous profits. Says Senator Norris:

The magic name of Henry Ford seems to have dulled all the reasoning faculties of thousands of farmers. They have been deluded into thinking that Ford has promised to make fertilizer for them at half price. There is no such promise whatever in his offer. He has merely proposed to pay the Government a paltry $5,000,000. in annual instalments, for property that has already cost the taxpayers of the country $106,000,000. . . . He makes no agreement to supply power. He can keep it all for himself. Here is energy enough to furnish power to the entire South, to light every home. But Ford would not even be bound by the Alabama utility laws. He can refuse to sell this power or he can sell as much or as little as he wishes, and he can charge whatever prices he pleases, uncontrolled by the regulations that apply to all public utilities. What does Mr. Ford propose actually to do for the public good? He agrees under his offer to make 40,000 tons annually of fixed nitrogen and to sell it to the farmers for a profit not to exceed 8 per cent. Why, he could well afford to give it away a thousand times over for what he is to get in return.

OF THE CONSTRUCTIVE ACHIEVEMENTS of the Obregon Administration none is more conspicuous than that of José Vasconcelos, who is retiring from Mexico's Ministry of Education. With a deep faith in the inherent qualities of the Mexicans, with a larger vision of a cultural unity south of the Rio Grande, Vasconcelos has been an apostle and a prophet of a new kind of Latin-American solidarity. Under his direction, also, popular education received its greatest impetus in Mexico's history. Some of its results are visible throughout the capital in the new school-centers with their pink tezontle walls, while the education building with its gorgeous panorama of frescoes of Mexican history and contemporary life will remain his monument and a symbol of the new release of the native arts and crafts which he so greatly stimulated. From the start Vasconcelos was beset with difficulties beyond comprehension abroad. A vast heritage of ignorance, apathy, corruption; shortage of funds; the difficulty of finding trained and trustworthy subordinates; his own inexperience, errors of judgment, and lack of organizing ability—these were towering obstacles. And he marred the closing of his notable period of service, be it said regretfully, by neutrality in the face of open rebellion by De la Huerta, whose pilfering of the treasury was chiefly responsible for the hamstringing of the educational program. Yet despite this and other serious mistakes he has created in Mexico a hunger for education, inaugurated an indigenous renaissance, and brought to Mexico a new racial leadership of Hispano-Indian America. It will be a tragedy if he is not drafted in some capacity for his country's service.

CHARLES WARREN, the historian of the Supreme Court, recently made an interesting suggestion of a new way of exerting pressure upon a country refusing to abide by a judicial or arbitral decision. After dissenting from the conventional opinion that such a world court must have force to compel acceptance of its decisions, Mr. Warren reminded his audience that there were several ways short of war to enforce a decision, such as personal liability of offending or guilty officials and the requirement of a period of time to enable the dissenters to cool off. Mr. Warren also stressed the growing power of world opinion. But his original contribution, which gains strength from the fact that its author was the Assistant Attorney General charged with the enforcement of our neutrality laws from 1914 to 1917, is that the other nations be freed from any international obligations toward an offender. An economic boycott, it has been pointed out, might sometimes injure the boycotter more than the nation aimed at. Instead, therefore, of asking a country to assume an obligation to act against another, Mr. Warren would relieve it from any of the familiar obligations a neutral must today carry out, such as preventing enlistments, interning ships and crews or troops entering neutral territory, etc. The weakness of the proposal, it seems to us, is that if the offending nation were powerful enough it would probably make a neutral's abandonment of neutrality a ready excuse for war against that neutral. All of which only emphasizes the necessity of doing away with the legal status of war at one swoop—outlawing it.

IT IS NOT, we are told, an "opportune" moment for another disarmament conference. Scientists vie with one another to supply deadly radio-electrical weapons which will set airplanes aflame, blow up submarines, and wipe out cities by the pushing of a button miles away. Secretary Hoover glowingly outlines on a magnificent scale the proposed mobilization and control by one despotically endowed individual of all the country's resources—men, women, money, materials, industries—for the purpose of killing. The women who sailed across mined and submarined seas in 1915 determined to cry out for peace had scarcely a harder situation to meet than today confronts the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom which opens its fourth biennial congress in Washington. Delegates from the internationally minded women of thirty-six countries will gather there in the first week of May. Their theme will be a "new international order in its political, economic, and spiritual aspects"; both the European danger and the problems of Pan-America will be studied and remedies sought. Following the congress many of the foreign delegates will speak at the International Summer School to be held in Chicago May 17 to May 31.

JOURNALISM would be better, thinks the Visible Government League of Oklahoma, if it were made a profession. It proposes to do this by a law requiring journalists to take out a license which could be revoked for misbehavior. But can one set up a profession merely by requiring its practitioners to procure a license? Pawnbrokers are commonly licensed, but we are not aware that they have thereby obtained recognition for their calling as a profession. And how about dogs? Besides we are not sure that journalism would be benefited by constituting it a profession. Most of the professions have evolved ethical codes that doubtless help some of their practitioners to maintain worthy standards, but they have also developed an excess of dry rot and tradition that is discouraging to the layman. Journalism, with all its faults, is singularly free from pretense, hypocrisy, and humbug. A man may perhaps become a journalist too easily, but he cannot too easily remain one. In this journalism is like many of the callings that are most interesting and worthwhile. A good, even if probably apocryphal, story of the Emperor William has it that he once said scoffingly: "Bah! What diploma does a man require to become a journalist?" "Your Majesty," was the rejoinder, "what diploma does one need to become an emperor?"

EDWARD BOK SEEMS to have made prize contests the great American pastime—if they were not already that. At any rate, before William Hard has got around to awarding the famous lock of Senator Shipstead's Minnesota hair for the best answer to the riddle, What is a Progressive?, before Life has announced the winner of its prize for the best method of starting a new war, the Baltimore Evening Sun boldly enters the lists with a $100 reward for the best explanation of the difference between a Democrat and a Republican. "In a day when moral, physical, religious, and chemical sciences have been developed to a point where distinctions can be finely drawn it ought to be possible," thinks the genial Sun, "to isolate the germs of democracy and republicanism and definitely identify them." Well, we don't know. Greater minds than ours have given up the puzzle. Did not brothers Doheny and Sinclair decide that, after all, it was safer to give to both?

Land of the Noble Free

AMERICANS are all immigrants—all except the red Indians—and if the anthropologists be right, even they migrated from Asia. There is no American race; there is not even the established claim of centuries to plead the primary right of any one stock. Norsemen were the first whites to spy out our soil; an Italian, sailing under a Spanish flag, rediscovered the continent to which another Italian gave his name. Parts of our present coast-line were first settled by Spaniards, parts by Frenchmen, parts by Dutchmen, and parts by Englishmen; Germans and Scandinavians first developed great areas of the interior. Of all our State names only thirteen are of English origin; five are Spanish, three French, and the rest Indian. Whence comes this myth that our country is the private property of some one racial stock? Whence come the arrogant assumptions of those who, like the chairman of the House Committee on Immigration, want to preserve a "racial homogeneity" which has never existed? Some extraordinary figures recently presented to the House of Representatives by one of its ablest new members, Meyer Jacobstein of Rochester, N. Y., are worth quoting:

The percentage of foreign-born in the entire country today is exactly the same as it was in Lincoln's time. In 1860, the year Abraham Lincoln was elected, 47 per cent of the residents of New York City were foreign-born. Today only 36 per cent of that great city's population is foreign-born. When Lincoln took office 30 per cent of the residents of all American cities of 100,000 population and over were of alien birth; today only 24 per cent of the population of cities of 100,000 or over are not native-born. . . . You contend that the present foreign element is less desirable than that of forty, fifty, sixty years ago. I call your attention to a report made to the House by a select congressional committee in 1838. It charged that "the country is being flooded with the outcasts of the jails, almshouses, and slums of pauper-ridden Europe." It asserted that at the time the jails of the capital were filled with these foreign-born people. It described them as "the most idle and vicious classes, in personal appearance most offensive and loathsome." . . .

But who were these "offensive and loathsome paupers and criminals"? Why, they were the scrappy Irishmen and Germans and British whose children today fear the influx of new "foreign hordes."

The war roused nationalist passions and hates long forgotten in America. We had given up the unpleasant habit of denouncing all foreign stocks; we were too conscious that we were all foreigners a few generations back. We were proud of the welcoming gesture of the Statue of Liberty; we hailed the simile of the "melting-pot" and believed that out of the amalgam of the races and the cultures of the world we were building something new, something greater than any of the races or civilizations of Europe. Perhaps we may still win back to that traditional Americanism and away from the medieval exclusionism of the proposed immigration bill.

The old artificial difficulties in travel were rapidly vanishing before the war. One no longer had to procure a permit or pay a toll at every bridge or river-crossing, at every boundary-line and frontier. The amalgamating current of history and science—steamships and railroads, telegraph and telephone—seemed to be binding all the world together. In 1914 a man traveled without a passport from Punta Arenas to the Russian border. Only a few of the most backward countries on earth retained that anachronistic requirement. Today restrictions on free movement are everywhere; we are back in the Middle Ages, and the United States is leading the backward movement.

It is a tragic thing that this country, built on the sweat and aspirations of immigrants, should so soon be fencing itself about with a wall. We are becoming the great example of national selfishness in all the world. While we bar human beings from our shores we bully weaker countries into granting American capital privileges alien to their national interests. We force Mexico to revise its oil laws, tell China how to use its customs, ask Russia to reconsider its view of private property, and everywhere proclaim the "open door"—for American capital—as an American policy. "Equal rights and opportunities, for capital, all over the world"—what a bitter slogan for America when a hungry peasant from South Italy, a persecuted Jew from Rumania, an Armenian whose home is a heap of ashes finds the door to America slammed in his face!

Two years ago we adopted an "emergency" percentage-restriction law, which allows the admission in any one year from any country of only 3 per cent of the number of persons born in that country who were present in the United States in 1910. That bill was frankly an attempt to discourage South and East European immigration while permitting the Northwestern stocks—British, German, Scandinavian—to enter. This year an even worse bill has passed the House. It would admit only 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born persons present here in 1890. That virtually bars Jewish, Italian, and Slavic immigration. It is a forthright attempt to establish racial exclusion. The Senate may make the quotas lower still. If Americans had still the national ideals of pre-war days, instead of a second-hand version of Old World nationalism, the Senate would demand a forward move to the census of 1920, and raise, instead of lowering, the present quotas.

Even the original purpose of percentage restriction is lost. We are today excluding not merely Italians and Syrians and East Europeans, but Germans, Englishmen, and Scandinavians. In the current year 1923-1924 all quotas except those for France, Iceland, and Esthonia have been exhausted—yet they talk of still further exclusion! The snobbish standards of a country club or of a New England private-preparatory school are being established as America's. More than that, the new bill makes unnecessary discriminations against the Japanese which can serve no purpose except to irritate that people.

Is it too late to recall the Farewell Address of our first President?

It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas, is it rendered impossible by its vices?

La Follette's "Revolution"

"REVOLUTION" is the term applied to the Wisconsin La Follette platform by Cyrus Curtis's New York Evening Post, once the honest daily of Bryant, Bigelow, Schurz, and Godkin, now degraded to the lowest depths of stand-pattism. This platform, we are told, is "something more than populism; . . . it is reinforced with raw, red socialism, borrowed from the Red Dynasty of Sovietism." To Mr. Curtis's editorial hirelings this is "the way of the wild men who would pull down the heavens and upheave the earth and make for themselves a new heaven and a new earth."

Let us see just what this document really proposes in order to merit such a bitter outpouring by one of our richest men. It was adopted by the La Follette Republicans at their recent convention for presentation to the people of Wisconsin and also to the Republican National Convention, where it will doubtless be treated with the contumely which has invariably been bestowed upon similar suggestions from Wisconsin. It declares that the great issue of today is the control of government and industry by private monopoly—"big-business domination," Roosevelt and Wilson called it. "The equality of opportunity proclaimed by the Declaration of Independence and defended by Jefferson and Lincoln" it sees "displaced by special privilege for the few." That hardly sounds new or original or revolutionary, for every reformer since Grover Cleveland began attacking the tariff has used precisely this language.

There are twelve points in this platform—"twelve vials of radical wrath," the Evening Post calls them. The twelfth we give in full that all may see how abominable this particular vial is:

We favor a platform for the Republican Party embracing these principles and a candidate for President whose public record is a guaranty that he is in full accord therewith.

Equally radical and dangerous is number one:

We pledge a complete housecleaning in the Department of Justice, the Department of the Interior, and the other executive departments.

There you have it—the red hands of Trotsky and the late Lenin betray themselves at once. Who but sovietists could favor a housecleaning? The next vial pledges recovery of the illegally leased public domains, vigorous prosecution of the guilty, restoration of the national conservation policy, public ownership of the nation's water-power, a national superpower system, and permanent conservation of all the nation's resources, including coal, iron, and other ores, oil and timber lands, in the interest of the people. There you have it. If that does not lead directly to the nationalization of women, Mr. Curtis must be wondering what could? So, too, does the declaration for public ownership of railroads, "with definite safeguards against bureaucratic control." As if that were not red-revolutionary enough, the pacifist tendencies of La Folletteism are made plain by a demand for a reduction in the "eight hundred millions of dollars now annually expended in preparation for future wars."

What are we to think of the demand for drastic reduction of the protective tariff, prohibition of gambling in agricultural products, large inheritance taxes for such estates as Cyrus Curtis has piled up, and reconstruction of the federal-reserve and federal farm-loan systems? Only that advocacy of the bonus, abolition of the right of injunction in labor disputes, the direct nomination and election of the President, the initiative and referendum in the field of federal legislation, and a popular referendum for or against war (except in cases of actual invasion) must seem to all of the faithful—like Mr. Curtis—to indicate a deliberate purpose to pull down every pillar of the temple of American liberty—liberty for great capitalists and the holders of special privilege.

To us, being in Mr. Curtis's eye of the unfaithful, the La Follette program seems an admirable document upon which the coming third party may well base itself. Not that we should agree to every plank; some things which The Nation has long opposed are on the list. But here is a progressive and constructive document which goes to the root of things economic. La Follette now sees that one of the first steps is to take control of our transportation lines. For this alone The Nation would give profound thanks; but when we read the planks which call for outlawry of war and revision of the Treaty of Versailles, which denounce "the mercenary system of foreign policy in the interest of financial imperialists, oil monopolists, and international bankers which has at times degraded our State Department . . . to a trading outpost," we want to stand up and cheer.

Yes, poor old prostituted Evening Post, it is revolution which La Follette preaches, revolution back to the old America, a revolution which proposes not to enslave but to cut loose American initiative, energy, and enterprise from the bonds now put upon them.

Lights On or Off?

THE mountain has at last labored. Mr. Coolidge's indignation has been stirred. The President, who accepted Mr. Denby's resignation "with regret," assuring him that he would go "with the knowledge that [his] honesty and integrity have not been impugned," who assured the infamous Daugherty, even when asking his resignation, that he was "not questioning" his "fairness or integrity," is angry. He is angry because a Senate committee insists upon investigating Secretary Mellon's conduct of his office.

Doubtless, as the New York World suggests, Mr. Coolidge's anger is heightened because he has been obliged to bottle up his wrath at the investigations conducted by Senators Walsh and Wheeler. One of those investigations has uncovered the fact that Secretary Fall secretly gave away the nation's oil wealth, and then accepted large sums of money from the gentlemen who got it. The other has exposed Mr. Daugherty's intimate associations with a group of crooks, bootleggers, fight promoters, and general low-livers. One forced Mr. Denby out of office; the other ousted Mr. Daugherty—both in the face of Mr. Coolidge's expressed reluctance. The committee investigating the administration of the Internal Revenue Bureau having made what might be called a misstep, Mr. Coolidge flares forth in bitter invective against all Senate investigations.

The immediate occasion of Mr. Coolidge's wrath was the appointment, by the Senate committee, of the very able Mr. Francis J. Heney to assist it in investigating Mr. Mellon's bureau. The committee appointed Mr. Heney without pay, it being understood that Senator Couzens would privately foot the bill. This was, to be sure, a dangerous procedure; the proper method would have been to obtain the Senate's authority to hire counsel, and charge his fee to the Government. No private individual should be permitted to pay the Government's expenses, either in this form or in the classic manner of dollar-a-year men. But the President went too far in suggesting that this conflicted with Section 1764 of the Revised Statutes, which bars compensation by the Government for extra services unless authorized by law.

Mr. Coolidge went further; in fact, he ran wild:

Under a procedure of this kind [he says] the constitutional guaranty against unwarranted search and seizure breaks down, the department becomes the victim of vague, unformulated, and indefinite charges, and instead of a government of law we have a government of lawlessness.

One might, assuming that a President of the United States watches his words, believe that there was fire behind this smoke. In fact, as the pitiful debate between Mr. Coolidge's hot-headed defenders and the cooler senators showed, there had been nothing like "search and seizure." It had been charged that Mr. Mellon's department had favored certain companies in which he was interested. He had demanded that the "committee make an immediate investigation in order that you may thoroughly satisfy yourself and the public whether or not these companies have received any favor from the Government." The committee was investigating. The only documents which it had obtained had been obtained with Mr. Mellon's consent. Where is the "government of lawlessness" in that? What was wrong with the committee's desire to obtain expert help?

To judge by Senator Watson's defense of the President the worst aspect of Mr. Heney's appointment was the fact that Governor Pinchot had suggested it. We cannot discover the original sin in that. In fact, we like Governor Pinchot's explanation:

What I am after in this matter is to get the law enforced. . . . I have made no secret of what I think about the disgraceful breakdown of the enforcement service of the Treasury Department, of the debauchery, crime, suffering, and death it has brought to the people of my State and to many another. . . . I suggested, as others had done before, the name of Mr. Heney, a trusted friend of President Roosevelt, for whom he had conducted investigations, as that of a man whom Senator Couzens's committee would be fortunate to secure as counsel.

People are beginning to talk as if there were something wrong in investigating. They are using the phrase "muck-raking" as a term of opprobrium, and President Coolidge's message is plainly a part of that propaganda. But, as Senator Reed put it, "a muck-rake will not bring up any muck unless there is muck there. . . . The only man who fears investigation is a man who has done something he does not want the country to know about." In the words of that cautious old constitutional lawyer, Senator Walsh:

The President wants us to stop these investigations; and he ought to say so. He wants us to stop these investigations, and to take our chances as to the faithful discharge of the duties of every department and the officials in every department—the Veterans' Bureau, the Department of the Interior, the Department of Justice, and now the Department of the Treasury.

The President, if we are not mistaken, has provided the Democrats with a first-class campaign issue: Shall the light be turned on, or off? Shall scandal, when suspected, be investigated, or left to putrefy?

Are We Better than Starfish?

THE person who can keep his eyes fixed unwaveringly on the mechanical achievements of the age must get a dizzying sensation of speed in the progress of human affairs. Discoveries beget discoveries, and civilization, learning from its own inventions, progresses geometrically toward an almost discernible perfection, or, more alluring yet, toward an infinity of thrilling new horizons. To the person capable of this miracle of concentration the world, save for a few scandal-mongers and agitators, must offer a satisfactory, even an exciting, appearance. His eyes are on the future; he installs a radio in his sitting-room and begins to save up for a motorized lawn-mower.

And he is justified in his enthusiasms; for in science, if in no other field of thought or action, the world does move. The question is, can our wits be turned to other problems, or have the shaping of iron and steel, the delicate juggling with electrons and air waves, the patient fishing for bacilli, unfitted us for other sorts of work? Has our knowledge of the relations of matter made us unable to deal with the relations between human beings?

Of course, in spite of wars and the divorce rate life goes on. Yet life goes on, with more waste but less agony, among the starfish, and the biological ends of life are achieved with less interference and friction. We, with our customs and prejudices, our passions and our pains, have turned the simplest processes of living into vast complications of nervous uncertainties. Between individuals as between nations, we have reached a point where we can see and admit our difficulties; we are only beginning to understand or resolve them.

One reason for our situation is that until recently human relations, particularly personal relations, and most particularly the relations of the sexes, were under a rigid taboo. Science might not touch them; art could approach them only if it were equipped with pink glasses. Intelligence was commonly considered indecent. Especially in the United States religion and custom and William Jennings Bryan held the field. They still like to think they hold it, but the behavior of the world worries them more than they will admit. Women, for instance, do things and say things and think things that take little account of taboos. Writers of modern novels look love in the eye and find it, in all its various forms, strangely unlike the pictures drawn by the Ella Wheeler Wilcoxes of literature. Psychologists are making a mockery of the decent sentiments of decent men and women.

And so there has been a storm from the upholders of the old ways of moral locomotion against these new-fangled, un-Christian steam-engines of behavior. From pulpit and press we have warnings and angry outbursts and scorn for the fumbling efforts of the present generation to understand itself and its emotions. But if we are to find our way out of this dark age of human unhappiness and tension and misunderstanding we must watch the people who are trying the new paths. We must leave William Jennings Bryan with his failless ancestors and his sexless morals, and listen to the prophets of a newer age. In a series of articles to begin in our next issue, The Nation will print the opinions of a few intelligent observers on the shifting moral standards of our day and on the difficult problems of modern sex relations.

These United States—XLVI*

NEW YORK: II. State of Unwilling Progress

By CHARLES W. WOOD

NOBODY knows New York State. Very few, if any, have traveled through it. Konrad Bercovici discovers a different New York almost every time he turns around, but he hasn't yet got outside the New York City limits. Socially, psychologically, and physically the whole State contains about everything there is and lots of it. It is mountainous. It is flat. It seems to touch the sea only in one little corner, but it manages to have hundreds of miles of seashore just the same. It is agricultural. It is industrial. Great areas are so deserted that they seem like desert. Also it has its mining camps. And much of the State—very much of it—is physically, socially, and psychologically just plain backwoods.

People from "up-State," by the way, do not like to be taken for New Yorkers. A man from Santa Barbara is sure to let you know that he is a Californian, but the man from Syracuse is just from Syracuse. This holds all over the State. You have to get down below Poughkeepsie to discover any willingness on the part of the population to be mistaken for residents of the world's metropolis.

New York City contains something of almost all the world. The rest of the State contains something of almost all America. It is not from New York City that the most startling stories of modern miracles come. It is more apt to be from the laboratories of Schenectady. It was there that man first made and hurled the thunderbolt. It is there that radio is reaching its highest development. It was there that the dream of superpower originated. Nevertheless, one need travel but a few hours from Schenectady to find oneself in a civilization to which all progress is anathema and whose favorite term of opprobrium is "new-fangled."

Occasionally in some Catskill cabin or in the back counties of the Adirondack region the State police discover a nest of seemingly human animals described, for the purposes of journalism, as a "destitute family in a deplorable condition." Sometimes they are starving. Sometimes they are freezing. Usually, they are 100 per cent American but inbred to the point of intellectual extinction. Usually also they are Christians, with their fundamentalist theology preserved intact, but without spiritual force enough to go to church or to take part in any religious exercises excepting funerals. In one case a mother-pervert reigned over the nest, keeping her grown sons, thirty and thirty-five years of age, in bed for life by the exercise of her fierce animal will. In another a father and a gaunt crew of pregnant daughters constituted the "family." I do not mean that these are typical instances of life in the backward sections of the Empire State. They are extreme cases, no doubt, but they are significant.

One is inclined to associate the backwoods with the pioneer spirit. One might as well associate the Daughters of the American Revolution with revolutionary thought. These folk are not early settlers. They are the descendants of early settlers. The early settlers had spirit and initiative and daring. That is, until they got settled. The more adventurous of their offspring, of course, refused to stay settled. They ran away from the settlement and built cities and towns. But the timid remained. They stayed settled, in body, mind, and soul.

Resistance to change is their most sacred principle. Modern conveniences appear as signs of degeneracy to them; and the boy who leaves home to go to the city is still their most popular theme of tragedy. The girl who marries the "city chap" is looked upon as disloyal: for in a community where everybody is pretty much everybody else's cousin, such unions seem to partake of the nature of miscegenation. "Who knows," sighs Uncle Amos, as he hopes for the worst, "who knows but what he's got a wife already?" This is the cue for Aunt Mary Jane to reply, "Beats me why folks want to be so stuck up."

This is not the language of the American farmer. It is the language of inbred descendants of farmers who have largely abandoned agriculture. They may still grow potatoes and beans and corn for their own use. They may still keep a pig and a cow. But the land is worn out, the barns are falling in, the more adventurous of the young people have left home, while the old folks and all the young ones who can be induced to oppose change in any form stick miraculously. They manage to get a living some way. They manage to marry. They manage to breed. They are a hardy tribe, enduring much tribulation and proud of their endurance; and there is a certain shrewdness about them which passes for intelligence. They are economical in money matters, also in ideas and in speech. They use few words and indulge in few facial expressions. They do not open their lips to talk, but blow their syllables through a very narrow aperture.

Numerically, this backwoods element of New York State life may not be very great. But socially, politically, and spiritually they have a throttle-hold upon the State. They furnish the traditions to which the natives think they should be loyal, even though they have physically run away. New York State is notoriously "conservative." This is generally attributed by outsiders to the influence of Wall Street. It is more probably due to the traditions of the "Old Home." The native up-Stater is seldom able to free himself from the attitude of fear and suspicion which was a most important part of his bringing up. Actually he may be having his bathroom tiled, or be looking around for an eight-cylinder car; but theoretically, he is still prejudiced against new-fangled notions.

The pressure of modern life may not permit him to act upon these theories in his everyday pursuits. But he can act upon them on Sunday; and large areas of New York State are as conservative, religiously, as the Middle West or South. He can also act upon them at Albany, and "new-fangled notions" have slim chance of getting through the legislature.

The State lags, for instance, in prison reform. It is not as bad as Florida, to be sure; but in this as in most progressive legislation, the State which should in all logic march in the vanguard of American culture is anything but up to date. This is likewise true of the problem of the feeble-minded, which New York psychiatrists agree is almost desperate. Those who knew the situation placed the terrible facts before the legislature, year in and year out; but it took a scandalous fire in one of the institutions known to be antiquated and unsafe to get any considerable number of the people interested.

The richest and most populous State in the Union was slow to accept the automobile. New York State fruit-growers, with the finest apples in the world, surrendered their natural markets to California and Oregon three thousand miles away because the folk from "York State" could not bestir themselves to evolve new methods of marketing. The beautiful city of Syracuse, with nearly two hundred thousand population, still has the New York Central Railroad running through its business center at grade, for no other reason, apparently, than that it always did run that way; and it has a great and highly endowed university whose chief pride has been that it has never once shown a sign of hospitality toward a new idea.

I don't mean, understand, that Syracuse University is scandalously behind the times. It has striven faithfully to keep nearly up to date. But not once has it gone ahead of the times. Not once has it taken a position of leadership. Professor John R. Commons is the only nationally known leader of thought I can think of now who was ever connected with Syracuse; and he was ousted for his economic heresies so early in his career that the incident attracted almost no attention. Since the death of Chancellor Day, Syracuse seems to be recovering from this chronic dread of the new; and recently its faculty permitted a public discussion of birth control. This is hopeful. Discussing the problem of overpopulation may not seem radical elsewhere, but it was decidedly radical for Syracuse. The Syracuse Common Council, in fact, had just passed an ordinance forbidding any public reference to the problem. The ordinance was vetoed by the mayor and barely failed of passage over his veto.

I have lived in a dozen different sections of New York State and found them all dissimilar. There's a reason. There is no State pride and no common historic tradition.

New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey are the only States I know of which do not fall naturally into some particular group. Maine and Connecticut, no matter how different they are, look upon themselves and are uniformly looked upon as New England. Florida and Tennessee are South. From Ohio to Kansas is a long jump, but the jumper is still in the Middle West. The geographies used to put New York and Pennsylvania into a theoretical bunch known as Middle or Middle Atlantic States, but this classification never had any psychological meaning. In Pennsylvania the tradition of William Penn is still held in reverence; but the story of the Dutch settlers who bought Manhattan Island from the Indians for $24 is an item of foreign history as far as the school-children of New York State are concerned. They know nothing whatever about the Duke of York. He isn't even an item.

There is no song which these people sing which is in any way connected with the glorification, charm, or historic significance of the State. "The Sidewalks of New York" is the nearest attempt at such a song, and that couldn't possibly have any meaning outside the city limits. Ocean navigation was made possible here, but it is difficult to hymn the praises of a man named Robert Fulton or a boat called the Clermont. Finally, and most discouragingly, if one were to celebrate the event which really made New York State, one would have to write a hymn to the Erie Canal. Even that might have been done, I suppose, if the Erie Canal had made the State and then resigned with proper dignity, as the Prairie Schooner did after it had fulfilled its mission. But the Erie Canal evolved into a Barge Canal with a lot of Barge Canal scandals and nothing whatever in the way of either barges or canal that anyone has ever felt proud about.

New York State has glories a plenty, but they don't belong to the whole State and it is difficult to strike a common note in celebration of them. There's Binghamton, for instance. Probably no city in the modern world has had such an influence upon modern civilization. It was from Binghamton that Patent Medicines came. It was due to the enterprise of Binghamton that one hundred million people, naturally leaning toward total abstinence, suddenly rose as one man and began to rid themselves of all human ills at only one dollar per bottle. They not only began but they kept it up. Cure called for cure: the ills were often obstinate but the cures didn't feel bad; also one could be a prohibitionist and a convalescent at the same time. Eventually, after a chapter of newspaper corruption hardly equaled in history, the business of doping the gullible became somewhat restricted by law. Theoretically, at least, the patent medicines which can be purchased freely at all druggists are now non-alcoholic, and they are not supposed to contain any habit-forming drugs. But Binghamton is still great. The rewards of her enterprise have been harvested. The big, patent-medicine fortunes are intact, and there is no limit to the opportunities for philanthropy and bootlegging which the future holds in store.

Then there's Rochester. Rochester is the Art Center of the United States. No one can deny this. Rochester admits it freely. All over the world, in any discussion of art, you will be told that American art is photographic, and Rochester is the home of the Kodak industry. Rochester glories in this, and not without reason; but she never thinks of it as a New York State achievement. Rochester is Rochester. She has her own culture, her own ideals, and her own distinct sense of superiority. She knows exactly how people ought to live, and she is seeing to it that Rochester children are trained in the way that they should go.

Buffalo is different. One could write a song about Buffalo. In fact, one did. It was "Put me off at Buffalo." I could never be sure in Buffalo just where I did get off. It seems like Chicago, in a way, with a suggestion of arrested development. It reminds one at once of wharves and grain elevators and "Fingy" Connors. Steve Brody took a chance in Buffalo—and got away with it. He ran a "music hall" in which he himself was the main attraction; and his fame was built solely on the fact that he had jumped off the Brooklyn Bridge. Buffalo used to be like that. On each succeeding visit the thing that impresses me most about Buffalo is that it is so much as it used to be. Year by year it gets farther from the top of the list of America's greatest cities; but it manages, nevertheless, to be as big as it ever was.

The rural sections of New York are as varied as its cities. The dairy region in the vicinity of Binghamton, the peach belt between Buffalo and Rochester, the grape belt out near Dunkirk—each has a character of its own. The last is peculiarly interesting. Prohibition gave a decided boost to the grape industry. The grape-growers no longer have to sort out their grapes or pack them carefully for the market. They just jam them into barrels and express them to New York. They can't send them by freight or they would ferment and explode in transit; but they can express them, and do; and the Italian buyer simply puts the barrel in his cellar and takes off the head. Then he lets nature take its course. The ultimate mess may then be sold for "red ink," but no one in the grape belt has violated the law.

Saratoga is still in New York State—much greater, in fact, and far more beautiful than in the days when it was reckoned great. The automobile is supposed to have put the horse out of business, but it brings thousands to the horse races who could never have attended them before. It is still a "watering place," and the water is good, even if the word has lost the grand meaning it once held. Saratoga has lost nothing much except its exclusiveness, and it has gained a State park.

The "summer resort" business hasn't fared as well in other sections. The automobile has brought everybody into the country, but the country isn't the same kind of treat that it used to be. Mammoth wooden hotels, equipped according to the standards of elegance that obtained during the seventies and eighties, are not even places of interest any longer. They are not gay and they are not profitable. There aren't as many of them as there were ten years ago. Many have mysteriously burned down, and the insurance money has been put into other enterprises.

New York State may not be pushing ahead, but it is being pulled ahead quite noticeably. I have lived in rural New York when ox-teams were common. The folks preferred oxen in many cases to the more expeditious horse because, when the road was washed away (as it usually was in spring), the oxen would pull the rigs out with a steadier pull and with less danger of breaking expensive harness. The automobile and motor-truck have now supplanted them; and with the automobile came concrete highways, electric lights, telephones, and a thousand conveniences never dreamed of before. An external hand has been laid upon these people, dragging them almost against their will into a bigger world. In that world, thanks to the automobile, their children are going to real schools and are getting acquainted with all sorts of different people; and instead of looking upon these new acquaintances as queer and foreign, they have come to find them charming. They are having real adventures, real courtships, and real marriages now; and the eugenists tell us that they are having a smaller percentage of deformed and idiotic children. But still you can go into any number of these communities today and be told by the bearded sages thereof that "the ruination of this here kentry is the automobile." These people are giving voice to the inhibition from which New York State suffers most. It is our infant fixation. It isn't strong enough, let us hope, to forbid progress, but it is strong enough to keep us from being genuinely progressive.

It is commonly assumed that the beauties of nature have a refining influence upon human life. What can one expect, it is asked, of a child born in a tenement or in the man-made environment of a factory town? Well—New York State is altogether beautiful, wherever the landscape has not been so defiled by man. It hasn't the terrifying beauty of the Rockies, nor the languorous beauty of the South; nor is there anything in New York scenery or climate which beckons to adventure or lulls to calm. But the physical charm of the State simply cannot be shaken off. This is especially true of northern New York, where the sharp frosts of early autumn work like magic on the oaks and maples and produce a thousand gorgeous hues unknown in the southern section of the State. The crystal frosts of spring are equally intoxicating. One whose eyes have fed in childhood upon Lake George with its mountain background can almost be excused in later life if he refuses to thrill at the masterpieces of nature in other sections of the world. The prairies will be pretty sure to bore such a person. The wide open spaces will produce in him nothing much but uneasiness. The sea will seem too uncertain, the desert too empty, and southern California altogether too artificial and tame.

Lake George is only one of a hundred perfectly satisfying bits of homeland in New York State. The Adirondack wilderness is still a wilderness over wide stretches and still beautiful despite the invasion of "hard roads" and hitch hikers. The great range of mountains around Marcy is accessible only to persons who are willing to climb all day and sleep in the open at night; its chains of lakes can be traversed only by canoe and carry. Lake Ontario with its thousand inlets, and each of the little lakes, north, east, and west, has a color and a fascination of its own. There is no blue on earth like Skaneateles blue.

The casual traveler through the State may think of Herkimer as a tank station, Auburn as a place of punishment, and Geneva as nothing at all. But get off the train at any of these places, take to the open highway, and you'll get an eyeful. The splendors of the Mohawk Valley can not be appreciated from a car window, and you see practically nothing of the western chain of lakes. Did you ever hear, for instance, of Conesus? One of its charms is that you never did. The motorist in western New York has the privilege of discovering for himself ever so many beauty spots that are not famous at all. The local inhabitants, to be sure, will point them out with pride. But it won't be pride in New York. New York means nothing to him. A dreadful city chuck full of foreigners has monopolized that term. New York, to the up-Stater, exists primarily for the purpose of paying the State's taxes. No one from Utica or Elmira or Mechanicville would want you to suppose that he would live in a place like that.

Then, there is Long Island. One tip of it is metropolitan and one borough on this tip contains a population greater than Manhattan's. But the other tip lives a life of its own, less disturbed by visitors perhaps than any other section of the State, a stretch given over to moors and lakes and sharp sand cliffs dropping into the sea. In between is an area given over largely to great private estates, with palaces lying so far back in the forests that the passing motorist does not see them. Westchester County and the Catskills are equally magnificent. All that wealth can add to nature is added here, not to build up or to develop the territory but to keep it as excluded and unvisited as possible. It is customary to indict American millionaires for their lack of refinement and discrimination. I can't join in this indictment. It seems to me, whenever I visit these estates, that they have done well. They may muss up the scenery which the rest of us have got to look at; but they keep their own premises free from billboards and noise and smoke.

And while I am at it, I want to give voice to one more heresy. It is a popular sport among intellectuals to sneer at mere industrial advance. Its main contribution to society, it would seem, is to smear the landscape and turn our natural beauties into piles of filthy lucre. The despoiling of Niagara Falls is their classical example. One-twentieth of the water has already been diverted into mere channels of usefulness. Too bad—perhaps. But the discovery by scientists that Niagara can be enslaved is producing a dream of human freedom which is mightily affecting New York State today. Syracuse, Rochester, and Buffalo are sharing in this dream of superpower. (Although Rochester, to be sure, prefers its own superb falls.) A hundred smaller cities and villages are beginning to thrill to it. Niagara may be doomed; but on the other side of the ledger millions of people are breaking from the past.

It is too much to expect that they will become suddenly progressive. Only recently New York established a moving-picture censorship for fear their young folks might get some suggestion out of harmony with the permanent and fixed morality of "back home." Strenuous efforts are being made to extend this censorship to books and publications. Laws forbidding this and that are as common in New York as they are in Kansas. Free speech does not exist. It is still a crime to make public those discoveries of modern science which make it possible for women to bear children when children are wanted. The notorious Lusk laws, which made it a crime for school-teachers to teach, have been repealed; but this only after a hard fight in the legislature and because of the insistence of a Tammany Hall governor rather than because of any awakened public opinion throughout the State.

Still, New York State is changing. It is becoming American, due very largely to the influx of so many foreigners. New pioneers are supplanting the descendants of pioneers and are keeping the pioneer spirit alive. There is nothing much doing in politics, but electricity is marching on and leading New York State into a different civilization. The "halls of learning" in Syracuse and elsewhere may still echo and reecho the dogmas of the past; but in the laboratories of Schenectady there is no intellectual inbreeding. Foreigners, even Socialists like the late Dr. Steinmetz, may seem to be in charge; but what they discover leaves no room for argument; New York State will have to use it; and having used it, cannot be what it was before.

The End of the Turkish Caliphate

By WILLIAM JOURDAN RAPP

IN 1517 Selim I, the ninth Sultan of the House of Othman, conquered Egypt. The various prizes of war which he brought back with him from Cairo to Constantinople included the title "Caliph (successor) of the Prophet Mohammed, commander of the faithful (émir ul mulminin), and guardian of the holy places (khadim ul Haramen ul Cherifein)."

This title was retained by the descendants of Selim until March 3, 1924, when Abdul Medjid, the thirty-sixth successor of Othman, was deprived of his prerogatives as Caliph (he never possessed those of Sultan) and the Caliphate abolished by vote of the Grand National Assembly of Turkey. What are the reasons for this action of the Turkish Parliament? What does it mean for the future of Mohammedanism in Turkey? What will be its effect on the Moslem world?

The decision of the Grand National Assembly to abolish the Caliphate was precipitated out of the discussion of the national budget. The deputies couldn't see why Republican Turkey should support the Caliph and about a hundred princes and princesses of the House of Othman, especially when the Caliphate was an institution in whose maintenance the whole of orthodox Islam was interested. The question once posed the deputies were quick to find reasons for ridding Turkey of the whole institution and all its trappings. It was claimed that the presence of the Caliph and the royal princes was a continual danger to the republic, that around them would gather all the reactionaries, and that as soon as they felt themselves strong enough they would engineer a coup d'état and reinvest the Caliph with the temporal powers of Sultan. It was also argued that the existence of the Caliphate offered an excuse for foreigners to interfere in the internal affairs of Turkey, and the case of the letter of the Aga Khan and Ameer Ali, two Moslem leaders of India, to Ismet Pasha was cited. This letter and the incidents resulting from its publication really set the stage for the abolition of the Caliphate.

In their letter the Indian leaders expressed the anxiety of Indian Moslems as to the fate of the Caliphate at the hands of Angora. Copies of the letter were sent to various newspapers in Stambul, which published it before Ismet Pasha, so he claims, received the original. The Assembly, waiting for just such an opportunity, believed it saw in the publication of this letter a plot against the republic. It immediately sent to Constantinople a "Tribunal of Independence," with power of proclaiming the death sentence, to try on the charge of high treason the editors who published the letter. The editors were acquitted, but Lutfi Fikri Bey, president of the Turkish bar, who was also tried on the different charge of publishing an article in favor of a constitutional monarchy and of writing a letter to the Caliph urging him under no conditions to abdicate, was condemned to five years' hard labor. The public interest in these trials was very great and they served to prepare the people for what was to come.

It may be asked why Turkey should willingly relinquish an institution that gives her such apparent authority and prestige throughout the Moslem world. The present rulers of Turkey vehemently deny that the Caliphate has any such attributes and they point to the miserable failure of the "Jihad" or Holy War proclaimed by Mohammed V in 1915 and to the fact that Arab and Indian Moslems fought against Turkey in the Great War. There is no doubt that Pan-Islam and its well-advertised dangers to the Western world are largely the creation of the foreign offices of France and Great Britain. Both of these countries have under their jurisdiction large Mohammedan populations, and they find it convenient to explain to their own people that unpopular changes of policy toward independent Moslem countries are forced upon them by the necessity of placating Pan-Islamic sentiment. Both the French and British were guilty of these tactics when they deserted Greece in her recent disastrous struggle with Turkey after first encouraging and subsidizing her. They also made use of this bugaboo in fighting the strong sentiment among the people of the Allied countries immediately after the war for the expulsion of the then Sultan-Caliph from Constantinople.

The truth is that the Caliphate has an imponderable prestige as the most important link with the Islamic past and as the principal unifying institution of Islam after the "haj" (pilgrimage). Western statesmen tend to exaggerate its power and the associates of Kemal Pasha go to extremes in belittling it in their public statements. The real convictions of the Kemalists, however, were shown by their haste, after abolishing the Caliphate, in arranging for tribunals of independence to be sent throughout the entire country to handle any cases of open disaffection, and in prohibiting Turks from going on the pilgrimage to Mecca, where, in contact with the devout from other lands, they might be inspired to revolt against the republic.

The Caliphate is an institution absolutely incompatible with a lay republican regime and the Western conception of the state to which Mustapha Kemal and his followers are dedicated. Islam has always been a political system as well as a religion. Mohammed saw the world as a great Islamic empire. His followers could at best only be temporarily at truce with non-Moslem countries. It was their duty to bring them all under the sway of Islam. The infidel world was regarded as daru'l harb or a "zone of war." In this unending struggle the Caliph was the leader of the forces of Islam and according to unbroken tradition had to be an independent ruler, commanding an army, and capable of making war and truce. Thus when the Turkish Parliament on November 2, 1922, deposed the Sultan-Caliph Mohammed VI, abolished the Sultanate, and named Abdul Medjid as Caliph with spiritual powers only, they broke the tradition of more than 1,300 years, a tradition that goes directly back to Mohammed and is the very heart of the Moslem faith.

It is now more than two hundred years since the greater strength of the Christian Powers forced most Moslem countries to abandon their attitude of open hostility and to come to a political understanding; however, the moral division has continued. The Government of Turkey is intent on constructing a modern nationalistic state which shall take its proper place among the nations of the world and it realizes the necessity of breaking down this moral barrier against the West. The Caliphate stood in the way and therefore had to go.

One naturally wonders how long Mohammedanism in Turkey can survive the passion for westernization of the Turkish leaders. One sacred institution rapidly follows another into the discard. The Evkaf or organization administering church property is done away with and the property and its revenue appropriated by the state. The civil and religious courts are fused, which practically means the abandonment of the religious law. Education is secularized. These changes were preceded by many others and still more are to follow. It is reported that the commission of the Assembly which is drawing up the constitution has written into it the principle that all inhabitants of Turkey regardless of race or religion are Turks and equal before the law. Apparently the giaour (infidel) is also to be abolished.

Thus far the governing party has made some effort to placate the devout Mohammedans throughout the country. The rulers realize that they form only a minority of the intellectual class, which in its turn is but a small minority of the entire population, and that they rule largely by virtue of their control of the army. Before passing any reform they usually have some authority on religious law argue that it is according to the dictates of the faith. Thus in regard to the more recent reforms, including that of the abolition of the Caliphate, Seid Bey, Commissar of Justice, who is the leading authority in Turkey on the Fikih or Moslem law, presented to the Assembly a long argument in which he endeavored to prove that in no way were the proposed reforms incompatible with Mohammedanism. These arguments remind one a bit of those used by the pastors of wealthy Christian churches in harmonizing the stern moralities of the Sermon on the Mount with the mode of living of their parishioners. It is doubtful if this casuistry satisfies any real Moslems and it hardly adds to the moral dignity of those who sponsor it. As Turkey becomes more and more westernized it will naturally come about that scientific methods, which the Turks are so anxious to adopt now in government, industry, and agriculture, will be used in studying their religion. It is doubtful if Mohammedanism can long survive any such ordeal. Most of the leaders of the present ruling party in Turkey are merely nominal Mohammedans. Their real religion is nationalism.

Because Angora has abolished the Caliphate it does not follow that the orthodox Moslem world will remain without a Caliph. It is already reported that King Hussein of the Hedjaz has been proclaimed Caliph by his two sons Feisal, King of Irak, and Abdullah, King of Transjordan. Hussein is regarded as the British candidate. The French insist that he is not eligible, asserting that the treaty he signed with Great Britain in 1915 makes the Hedjaz a British protectorate and that therefore Hussein is not an independent sovereign, a status absolutely essential to a Caliph. Claude Farrère, the well-known French novelist, suggests that the French Government offer the expelled Caliph Abdul Medjid one of the islands off the coast of Tunis, where he can be absolute sovereign and thus be in a position to retain his high office and incidentally undermine the authority of the English candidate. This plan is receiving a great deal of favorable comment in the extreme nationalistic press of France.

Other candidates for the Caliphate are the King of Egypt and the Emir of Afghanistan. However, as British influence in these countries predominates, it is doubtful if France will favor either. Orthodox Islam will probably be faced for some years to come with this problem of the Caliphate; the great Moslem colonial Powers, France and Great Britain, are likely to engage in a long struggle for the control of the institution. Italy may also join because of her interests in Tripoli. No matter which Power is victorious, Islam cannot help but be the loser.

Is Canada Solving the Railroad Riddle?

By D. M. LEBOURDAIS

SOONER or later the railroad situation in the United States must be faced. And when that time comes there is little doubt that the result of Canada's railroad experiment will influence the decision then to be made. It will either give the principle of national ownership a tremendous impetus or discredit the idea for a generation, at least.

Canada is conducting the greatest state-owned railroad experiment that has ever been tried—if one except government control in various countries during the war. Canada's system consists of over 22,000 miles of road, comprising two complete transcontinentals besides a network of branch lines reaching every seaport on both the Atlantic and the Pacific and practically every city or town in the Dominion. In addition, this huge system controls its own hotels, commercial telegraph lines, express service, and lines of ocean and lake passenger ships. Some idea of the size of this system may be obtained by a comparison with other large railroads. The Pennsylvania and Santa Fe each operate only about 12,000 miles of road—although the Pennsylvania's trackage, counting second, third, and fourth tracks, aggregates much more actual mileage. All the railroads in Great Britain and Ireland total only about 23,000 miles. France, Russia, Germany, and India are the only countries excepting the United States that have a greater mileage than the Canadian National Railways.

Canada not only has the largest nationally owned railroad in the world but also the greatest privately owned transportation system—the Canadian Pacific—which controls about 19,000 miles of lines, including about 5,000 miles in the United States. Its lines connect the Atlantic with the Pacific and its branches tap practically every section of the Dominion. It serves generally, however, the better settled portion of the country, and in this respect has a present advantage over its state-owned rival. The C. P. R.—as it is familiarly known—has also its own chain of hotels, commercial telegraph system, and lines of lake and ocean steamships; in fact one may travel around the world under the auspices of the C. P. R. The "Soo" Line is perhaps the best known of its subsidiaries in the United States. For nearly forty years the record of the C. P. R. has been one of unbroken success; year after year, in times of depression and in times of prosperity, the Canadian Pacific has given consistently good service. Unlike most of the railroads on the continent, it has never been in the hands of a receiver nor has it ever been reorganized.

Canada is larger in area than, but contains only about one-fourteenth the population of, the United States. On the other hand, the Dominion's railroad mileage is one-sixth that of the United States, aggregating more than 39,000 miles. Canada has, in fact, more railroads per capita than any other country in the world. Except for a few unimportant lines, the railroad mileage of Canada is practically divided between the C. P. R. and the Canadian National Railways.

During the next few years an interesting railroad duel will be fought out across the broad expanse of the Dominion. Both systems are well officered and equipped; they are fairly matched in every way. The Canadian National has the disadvantage, if there be such, in that its mileage is, and probably will be for some time to come, greater than the requirements of its territory; and also in that it lacks the background of continued successful operation possessed by its competitor. On the other hand, these drawbacks might possibly be offset by the natural favor which the public generally may be expected to show toward the nationally owned road.

Those mainly responsible for the initiation of Canada's experiment had not previously been conspicuous for their advocacy of the theory of national ownership. But private ownership and operation (in so far as two out of the three great systems in Canada at that time were concerned) had failed absolutely to supply the transportation needs of the Dominion. Then, with the war in progress, was no time to theorize. Ex-Premier Arthur Meighen, to whose initiative probably more than any other one man's the Dominion's railroad experiment is due, has said: "We would have had to face either an utterly demoralized service given to the people of Canada by the roads, or vastly greater sums [would have had] to be provided by the Parliament of Canada to hold the roads in private hands."

The Canadian Northern, one of the two transcontinentals now forming the bulk of Canada's national system, was originally a grain-carrier serving the great wheat lands of the Northwest with its Eastern terminals at the head of the Great Lakes. Continued as such, no doubt much of its later difficulties would have been avoided, and it probably would still be in the hands of its builders (Sir William) Mackenzie and Mann (Sir Donald), to whose vision, energy, and resourcefulness its marvelous growth was entirely due. Beginning with a couple of short streaks of rust on the prairie in 1896, they developed the Canadian Northern within less than a dozen years into a veritable network of steel covering the wheat lands of the Dominion. There is a limit to ambition, however; and Mackenzie and Mann overstepped it. They would be satisfied with nothing less than a transcontinental.

Governments, both federal and provincial, had freely encouraged railroad building by generous grants of land and cash. But Mackenzie and Mann were insatiable. The more they got the more they seemed to require. Not content with their railway enterprises, Mackenzie and Mann sought to extend their sway over many of the basic industries of the country. These schemes required greater and greater financial outlays. Their affairs finally became so inextricably interwoven with the financial fabric of the Dominion that the federal Government was more than once forced to come to their assistance with huge sums of money in order to preserve the credit of the nation itself. Eventually the time came when the Government's patience was exhausted, and the Canadian Northern's 9,000-odd miles of lines were taken over. That was in 1917. Canada's great experiment had begun.

The experience of the Grand Trunk, whose acquisition finally rounded out the national system, was somewhat similar in its essentials. At the beginning of the present century its Canadian management (it was owned in England) was in the hands of an energetic American rail-roader, the late Charles M. Hays, whose ambition was likewise fired by the thought of expanding his road—then centered in Ontario, Quebec, and certain of the Northeastern States—into a transcontinental.

His aspirations coincided with the optimistic views of the federal government of the day. As a result, government money and credit were forthcoming to extend the Grand Trunk from coast to coast. But the greater part of the new line traversed a territory largely unsettled, even now sparsely occupied. And these ambitious undertakings saddled a load of debt upon the back of the Grand Trunk from which it never recovered. Its difficulties came to a head in 1919, but it was not until 1921 that it, too, passed completely over to the Canadian people.

When the Canadian Northern was taken over the Government was faced with the problem of devising some form of control which should be measurably free from the evils of political interference. For nearly fifty years previously the Government had owned and operated the Intercolonial, connecting Montreal with Halifax. It had been built as part of the federal compact and no serious attempt had ever been made to run it at a profit. But with the addition of the Canadian Northern lines some other method of operation became necessary.

A holding company was therefore incorporated in which was vested the control of all the lines then owned by the Government. Its management, like that of any other corporation, was placed in the hands of a president and board of directors, in this case appointed by the Government. Once appointed, the management was given full responsibility for the operation of the system free from political or other interference—at any rate that was the intent. (And so far, it may be said, that policy has continued.)

Little more than a year ago the Grand Trunk (which had been operated separately up to that time) was amalgamated with the other government roads and the whole system placed under the management of a newly appointed board of directors. One consideration in making the appointments was that the management should consist of men having no past affiliations with those held responsible for the failure of the constituent roads under private operation. Sir Henry Thornton became president and chairman of the board.

Sir Henry Thornton seems to have been an ideal choice. He was born at Logansport, Indiana, in 1871, entered the service of the Pennsylvania Railroad as draftsman in 1894, and quickly rose to the post of general superintendent of the Long Island Railroad. From there he went to England in 1914 as general manager of the Great Eastern Railway. He was one of the war-time directors of the unified British roads, and also served with distinction in connection with military transportation in France. So it was fortunate, indeed, for the Canadian National Railways that such a man was available. His American training qualifies him to understand the requirements of railroading on this continent, while his acquired British citizenship and affiliations render him more acceptable to certain sections of the Canadian public. Sir Henry Thornton has already won a large measure of popular confidence in Canada. He has met the multitudinous problems and difficulties of the past year with such energy and enthusiasm that appreciable results are already apparent, and he declares that the Canadian National Railways can be made a profitable asset for the people of the Dominion, given proper management and continued freedom from political interference.

During the first years of national control there were heavy annual deficits, owing to the wretched physical condition of the roads necessitating replacements and improvements of all kinds. But these deficits have been steadily reduced until for the year ended December 31, 1922, an operating profit was shown for the first time, while for the year ended December 23, 1923, the operating profit was $20,127,447. Most authorities in Canada, not altogether blinded by prejudice, now look confidently forward to the day when the national system will not only show a profit over operating costs but will also earn fixed charges on a reasonable valuation. Furthermore, there is no comparison between the present service and that given previously; a new spirit is noticeable among the employees, a new courtesy and interest.

Opponents of national ownership claim that it destroys personal initiative. Canada's experiment may perhaps have destroyed the initiative of a number of unessential vice-presidents and directors, to say nothing of a crew of promoters whose initiative has cost the country a pretty penny in the past. But it has undoubtedly provided a higher degree of enthusiasm in the hearts of some 100,000 railroad employees who now take a noticeable pride in their work, notoriously absent under the old order.

The political corruption produced by the railroad lobby of old was responsible for many of the most unpleasant pages in the political history of the Dominion. That, at least, has largely ceased.

Regional jealousies are likewise referred to as obstacles in the path of nationalization. Canadian experience is not altogether free from this complaint. With the Grand Trunk the Government gained control of important lines in the United States forming connections with Chicago, Portland, Maine, and other points. With regard to Portland, the Canadian National management has had a certain amount of trouble. It competes successfully with the Canadian ports of Halifax and St. John for traffic originating in Canada, and the people of those cities complain bitterly that a road operated by the Canadian people should not be used to advance the interests of a foreign port—particularly to their disadvantage. But so far, at any rate, the management has refused to be influenced by their objections. It takes the stand that it has been asked to operate the system in the best interests of the Canadian people as a whole and that it cannot afford to haul goods a longer distance than necessary for purely sentimental reasons.

One thing more must be mentioned: the attitude of organized labor. The Government, in a measure, took cognizance of the rights of labor by appointing Tom Moore, official head of trade unionism in Canada, to a place on the board of directors; but otherwise the relationship between organized labor and the national system is about the same as it would have been under private operation. There is always the possibility of friction, but it at least has not been increased by nationalization. On the other hand, if the policy inaugurated by Sir Henry Thornton continues, there should be a minimum of labor troubles on the Canadian National Railways. He realizes that the system of which he is the head belongs to the people, and he has from the beginning taken both the public and the employees into his confidence. And this policy has undoubtedly been justified by the results.

How to Become President

By WILLIAM HARD

A RAMBLE through presidential primaries and presidential State conventions brings home to the traveler's mind the truth that presidential ambitions are likely to fulfil themselves only if linked to a multitude of local personal ambitions, and that indeed to great masses of voters and to most local political managers the Presidency is often a remote excrescence upon politics rather than the glorious center of the revolving American political system.

The earnest Mr. James W. Good, seated in Coolidge national headquarters in Chicago, dispatched to leading Republicans in every county in Illinois a stern inquiry as to "Watchman, what of the night?" in the great combat between Coolidge and Johnson for the support of the voters of Illinois in the Republican National Convention. Would the nation be saved by Illinois through the nominating of Coolidge? Or would it be shocked and shattered by witnessing a union between Illinois and the ambitions of Johnson? Where was Illinois and where the ambitions of Johnson? Where was Illinois standing in the matter of the high office of President of the United States?

To this inquiry there came a certain realistic answer from an Edgar Lee Masters of local American political life. Writing from an Illinois country-side county, where undoubtedly the inquisitive geographer could readily find the immortal community of Spoon River, this Mr. Masters, whose true name is here considerably suppressed, said:

DEAR MR. GOOD:

I am chairman of the Board of Election Commissioners of this county. We need funds to work with. Send funds to the chairman of the County Central Committee. We cannot pay any attention to the Presidency. We stand for our friends. It takes money in this county and nobody is giving the Presidency a thought. I am working all over the county and this is true. If you care to have the Presidency taken care of, send money to the chairman of the County Central Committee. I think this answers your letter completely and briefly. Answer soon or we cannot take care of the President.

Perhaps Mr. Coolidge, seated in the White House, and at a distance now from Northampton, imagines that the first political thought of the American electorate is as to whether or not he will continue to sit in the White House after March 4 of next year. Certainly Hiram Johnson has imagined that the choice of an occupant for the White House could be made for the American electorate a first thought, absorbing and exclusive. The fate of his candidacy is to be attributed principally to that erroneous attribution of national thinking to local voting groups.

Johnson has been running for the Republican presidential nomination in virtually complete disentanglement from all local organization ties. An exception to this rule was revealed in South Dakota. There the presidential ambitions of Johnson were linked by ties of mutual helpfulness to the senatorial ambitions of Governor McMaster and to the general local organization ambitions of Senator Norbeck and of Representative Johnson. In South Dakota accordingly Hiram Johnson won.

In North Dakota there was no such firm linking between local political forces and the national aspirations of the senior Senator from California. In North Dakota accordingly he lost.

In Illinois accordingly he also lost.

Johnson on the whole has been playing solitaire for the Presidency. He proved in South Dakota that when hitched to a local wagon he could successfully, along with the local horses, pull the wagon to the top of the hill. His true handicap has not been any of his acts, or failures to act, in the Senate. His true handicap has been the fewness of the local wagons which his managers have been willing to allow him to help pull.

An illustrative proof of this observation is to be found in the strikingly different record achieved by the candidacy of William Gibbs McAdoo. Nothing done, or not done, at Washington by Hiram Johnson ever gave him the blow that was given to McAdoo by the disclosure of McAdoo's employment as a lawyer by Doheny. Yet McAdoo in State after State is triumphantly putting delegates into his pocket and will go to the New York convention bulging with delegates and able, if he cannot get the nomination for himself, to be powerfully influential in selecting the person to whom the nomination will be given.

Is it because the voters in primaries and in caucuses for State conventions aroused themselves in embattled anger to rebuke the attack upon McAdoo and to vindicate his name? Mr. McAdoo may think so. This writer thinks otherwise. He thinks that it was, and is, because Mr. McAdoo had sagaciously equipped himself in State after State with local professional political supporters whose affections were engaged to him and whose local fates had become almost inextricably intertwined with his national destiny.

These ladies and gentlemen, maintaining local political organizations and aspiring to local political honors, remained for the most part loyally true to McAdoo. They made the journey to Chicago to the McAdoo rehabilitation conference, in every instance paying their own expenses, even when they came from as far away as the Pacific Coast, and they decided to continue to fight for themselves and for McAdoo.

They then returned home and continued to blow the bugles and beat the drums and clash the cymbals for McAdoo and continued also to put themselves forward for this and that and the other local honor and office. Where they won, McAdoo won. Where McAdoo is not in right with the right local candidates for governor and national committeeman and drainage-board trustee and coroner and constable he tends to lose. Sometimes indeed his own local managers get so interested in their local contests that it is they who win primarily while McAdoo wins, but wins almost as an afterthought.

In Iowa, for instance, where this writer happened to be an eye-witness of it, Mr. Clyde W. Herring of Des Moines was running for Democratic national committeeman against Mr. Wilbur W. Marsh of Waterloo. Mr. Herring was devoted to McAdoo. Mr. Marsh was devoted to Al Smith. The State convention met. It chose delegates to the Democratic National Convention. These delegates would choose the national committeeman. They would also help to choose the next Democratic presidential nominee. Observe now!

At the moment when those delegates were chosen everybody in the whole convention knew exactly which ones of them were pro-Herring and which ones of them were pro-Marsh. It took three hours subsequently, however, to determine positively which ones of them were pro-McAdoo and which ones of them were anti-McAdoo or pro-Smith. It then appeared that because of Herring a majority of the delegation would be not only for Herring but also for McAdoo. McAdoo got that delegation by a really safe margin precisely because he was in right with the right candidate for national committeeman from Iowa.

If you wish to be President, be sure that you are on good terms with local people whose neighbors will go to the polls to vote for them and will thereupon incidentally—and even perhaps unawares—vote for you.

Laughing Diplomacy

By WITTER BYNNER

I MET a while ago in Shanghai a young Chinese student. Shortly after the meeting he wrote me: "Now that I find favor in your eyes, I ask you to furnish me with some world-knowledge and learning by which I can see everything with half an eye."

He was a very sober-minded youth, but has apparently relaxed, for I lately received from a Chinese friend of his and mine this report: "He is much happier now in doing business than he was in studying at school. After entered door of society, I think his mind must be changed, knowing what is the need of laugh."

As we Americans enter willy-nilly into the society of nations, our minds likewise ought to change, and we ought to learn in important respects "the need of laugh." We pride ourselves just a little too much on our humor. It needs to develop, to mature, to be as wise as it is young. We have been accustomed, for instance, to think of the Chinese as a race remote and different and inferior to ourselves. They have been accustomed to think similarly of us.

All the time we are fundamentally the same human beings, with only superficial differences. We are just as strange as they are. During my year in China I was often asked why all Americans look exactly alike; why all American women have frog eyes and hawk noses. When I hesitated at eating raw fish, I was reminded that at least the fish was clean; whereas we Americans eat raw oysters, entrails and all. I was asked in Japan how I could consider myself civilized and yet carry the dirt of the street into my home, instead of changing my shoes at the door, as they do. I was told about the Chinese and the Englishman who met each other on the way to their respective cemeteries, the Chinese carrying a bowl of rice, the Englishman a handful of flowers. The Englishman asked the Chinese: "I suppose you think the dead person will come out of the grave and eat that rice?" The Chinese answered: "Yes; same time other dead person come smell flowers." As to civilization, the Chinese masses, uneducated as they are, have a kind of horse sense which no school can teach, and a happiness which few Americans have time for.

A young Chinese friend of mine said one day: "I have been thinking about the Golden Rule, the two versions, the first one by Confucius: 'Do not do unto others as you would not have them do unto you'; the second one by Christ: 'Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.' Foreign teachers tell us that the Christian way is better because it is positive, just as Western civilization is better for the same reason. But I have been thinking about it. If I were in the room with a girl and wanted to kiss her and she did not want me to kiss her, Christ would tell me to go ahead and kiss her, and Confucius would tell me not to. And don't you think Confucius would be wiser?" My friend smiled when he asked me that question; but it has a good deal of point in connection with the treatment of Oriental nations by the nations of the West.

We have been doing to them as we unthinkingly think we should like to be done by. We have interfered with them, imposed our ways upon them, and translated the Golden Rule into the slogan: "You shall do what we think right." The Oriental way would be to refrain from interference at all, except as it might be honestly requested.

Not long ago we Anglo-Saxons opposed the intention of Germany to fasten upon the world a Prussian system. Today we are engaged in trying to fasten upon the world an Anglo-Saxon system, without seeing the joke, without seeing that imperialism, under whatever name, is imperialism.

Japan is the one Eastern nation which has maintained her integrity and independence. She has done it by opposing imperialism with imperialism and is the only nation whose imperialism can honestly be said to be a policy of self-defense. As Rabindranath Tagore put it: "You have made Japan over in your own image and are now afraid of her." Until Anglo-Saxon policy changes, Japanese policy cannot change. China, all this time, has let herself be robbed, rather than largely accept and imitate materialistic Western culture, rather than arm and fortify herself as a nation. Japan has imitated our worst side and we take off our new hats to her. China has tried to imitate and share our best, and we have responded with fair words and empty actions.

To be sure, the American tradition in the Orient is cleaner than that of the other Western nations. For this reason the Chinese have remained our friends. But we are only dimly aware of the great opportunity for cooperation of the best elements in the East and the West. Too much of what goes from us to China is mere materialism under the name of progress or religion; but as our shallow philosophy crosses the Pacific one way, their deeper philosophy crosses it another. And it remains to be seen whether the principles of serenity, tolerance, and patient wisdom, coming from the apparent disorder of China, will convert us of the West before the principles of fear, intolerance, and nervous efficiency, coming from the pretended orderliness of Christendom, will pervert the Chinese to imitate us, as the Japanese have so effectively done, and once more confound the world.

The Oriental has a silent, deep contempt for the Occidental. The Occidental has for the Oriental a contempt not so silent. Fortunately Chinese and Americans have a sense of humor very much akin. Proud as the Chinese are of their traditions and proud as we are of ours, we know instinctively in both countries that if we can only laugh ourselves out of our conceit, out of our prejudice, out of our sense of superiority and assumption of ultimate wisdom, the joke will not be on us.

In the Driftway

A positive sensation. Universally admitted to be the most remarkable animal act ever seen anywhere. . . . Positively the greatest and most thrilling trained wild animal acts ever offered in this or any other country, introducing the most formidable types of ferocious Bengal, Siberian, and Sumatran tigers. . . . A dazzlingly beautiful equestrian melange. . . . Introducing sensational and unique feats of horsemanship beyond compare. . . . The debut of a fiercely beautiful troupe of supposedly untractable Tartarian stallions. . . . The world's biggest herd of elephants. . . . Positively and obviously the most sensational. . . .

You are right, esteemed reader. The Drifter has been to the Circus.

IT would be folly to attempt a description of the event after these winged words. Moreover, the Drifter was left flat and breathless when the huge rollers of magniloquence in the program and magnificence in the arena had passed over him. His impressions were few and scattering, but they had mostly to do with practical matters. If allowed to choose from all the animal kingdom the beast he would most like to be, the Drifter would become a seal. The seal combines with a preposterously comic appearance a muscular competence that ought to make an eel stop wriggling in shame; he has flippers which when clapped together make the most satisfying noise ever heard. And on top of all these gifts, enough to endow a dozen animals, he carries, inside of his shiny, undulating hide, a joyful spirit. Eagerly he balances a ball on his nose; he leaps with delight at a burning stick because he can fling it in the air and catch it in his mouth; his expression as he snatches a bit of fish that a careless trainer throws is angelically sweet—he is, in short, a beguiling creature. Well, the Drifter would be a slithering seal; and he would not, for anything, be a little white dog, for these poor creatures, with the chalked horse and the snowy dove, are compelled to pose and posture with coated white females in the "Statue" acts. A brown dog need suffer no such indignity; nor need he become part of the ensemble when a white-clad goddess decides to parade around the ring, accompanied by beasts so unfortunate as to be colorless. Only the lumbering, patient bear, foolishly going round and round the ring on roller skates or a bicycle, is a more pitiable object.

* * * * *

THE Circus, of course, is unalterably conservative. The acrobats still wear bright pink tights, the lady performers, in spite of the bewildering skill at gymnastics, are adorned with long curls, the bucket of water still falls from above on the clowns, the hair grower still produces luxuriant herbage on a bare head. If the Circus should change it would no longer be the Circus—and yet, in one respect it is thoroughly modern. There are two performers only who are permitted the whole expanse of the five rings to themselves; when they are graciously pleased to perform their heroic feats, unrivaled, world-heralded, unique, the lights go out except on the spot where they happen to be, the band plays softly, the vast audience is drawn together. One of these persons is a bareback rider, the other a trapeze performer—nothing new or radical about that, you say. Yet they are both women; feminism has entered the sawdust ring, and mere males are allowed to lead in the horse, or hand the lady the proper rope.

On the Price of Foreign Books

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of Mr. Herbert W. Horwill's inquiry as to the discrepancy between the price of books in England and in America, "Is it tariff, or carriage, or what?" let me remark that it is, as might be expected, the last of these three. May I cite an actual instance? I have recently purchased, through my London bookseller, an edition of Pepys's "Diary." This sells in our bookshops here at $15, but it cost me in London 42 shillings; the duty was $1.15; and the postage 1 shilling 4 pence. This, as you will readily figure with the pound at something like the present discount, amounts to around $10.50. Naturally, my bookseller in London made his legitimate profit from the transaction, but our American dealers feel that they must have more of the "what" to which Mr. Horwill refers.

Another View

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of April 9 there is a letter from Herbert W. Horwill which speaks of the fact that the price of the 1924 edition of the English "Who's Who" sells for $15 in our shops, as against a price, in England, of, approximately, $9. Mr. Horwill, distressed by this discrepancy, asks an explanation and rather intimates that our price for this book is excessively high.

As a matter of fact, the $15 retail price on this book is set by the Macmillan Company, the authorized American agents. If any American book-dealer attempted to buy this book direct from the London publisher, the London publisher would reject the order and direct it to Macmillan's, who would then supply the American dealer at a discount from the retail price of $15.

The only possible alternative left Mr. Horwill would be to go through all the red tape necessary in ordering a book direct, pay duty and transportation charges, and run the chance of his copy arriving in damaged condition. The price, however, in American bookshops is uniform throughout the country.

Who Is White?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial in the issue of March 26 raises a most interesting inquiry as to legal and ethnological definition. Already the East Indian and the Japanese have been adjudged as not belonging to the white or Caucasian race, and now we learn that the Armenian is undergoing the same test.

To become an American citizen by naturalization one must be a Caucasian or an African. This is the most curious inconsistency to be found in American law. The race most deeply despised is a yoke-fellow in privilege when it comes to citizenship eligibility. But in apportioning the privileges and advantages of citizenship the Negro is set apart in a separate class. A majority of our States carry some form of legal distinction or discrimination on account of race or color. If legal action is based on race there must needs be some legal determination of racial status. If a colored man may not ride in the same coach with a white man, or if white and colored persons may not marry, then it should be known by sharp and unmistakable marks who is white and who is colored. The federal Government has studiously avoided establishing such a definition. There is no racial distinction in the Constitution. The Fifteenth Amendment mentions race and color merely to forbid basing distinction on such grounds.

The Southern States which regulate the racial regime according to their own unregulated notions attempt to separate the races by the proportion of Negro blood, without once attempting to define what is Negro blood. There has nowhere been established a color scheme by which an individual can be given an exact chromatic rating. In many States one-fifteenth Negro blood serves to determine the racial status. A college of the wisest ethnologists in the world cannot isolate Negro blood to the sixteenth of a fraction. In such cases legal records of marriage do not exist. The evidence is wholly hearsay. Frederick Douglass and Booker T. Washington heard it whispered that their fathers were white men. Such evidence would not be taken in any court in Christendom. It is impossible to tell by superficial appearance. A mulatto may be lighter than an octoroon or as dark as a full-blooded Negro. Science has established no blood test.

In a democracy like ours the only consistent procedure is to permit no distinction among citizens. There can be no democracy where there exists racial difference recognized by law. Distinction in race should never be recognized in our federal statutes. Even if the States with an overwhelming Negro population feel that they must adopt some working formula of distinction, this furnishes no excuse for the national Government, which must deal with the people as a whole, and not according to local arrangements and provincial divisions. The non-white element constitutes only one-tenth of the total population and gives no color of excuse for a federal formula of racial distinction.

There are now passing through the Supreme Court numerous cases which involve the equal rights of the non-white element of American citizenship. This august body prudently strives to dodge the disagreeable task of establishing a definition of race. The day that it is forced to do so will strike the most serious blow at democratic government that has been inflicted since the Dred Scott decision.

The Breakdown of the Press

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: No journal in the country is doing the important work today that has fallen to the lot of The Nation. What you say about the reactionary character of the New York newspapers is so true that one wishes that your praise of the World were more justified.

The Evening World does speak with courage, but the morning World's editorial page has been at times as reactionary as that of the Times, the Munsey group, or Mr. Hearst's newspapers. Recently it seems to have caught up with its party, but for months it was criticizing the Democratic leaders for daring to assume that taxation was less important than honest government. Even today, while it urges very properly that the investigation in Washington should go on, it speaks forbiddingly of "harrying Secretary Mellon" as if that august personage was something sacred. Was there ever such worship of mere money! Both Gifford Pinchot and E. A. Van Valkenberg of Philadelphia have gone pretty near the limit in denouncing Secretary Mellon's inactivities in the enforcement of the prohibition law and the Evening World has shown that another division of his department, that dealing with the income tax, was as corrupt as the law-enforcement bureau.

It is true that the World has not gone as far as the Times in insinuating that nothing mattered so long as the surtaxes were reduced, but it has helped a corrupt Administration in its abuse of Congress when, God knows, if it were not for Congress, and particularly the Senate, the country would be in a sad plight indeed.

Even more discouraging than the revelation of corruption is this moral breakdown of our newspaper press.

Henry Ford and the Farmers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In Mr. William Hard's article on Muscle Shoals in your last issue he refers to the indorsement of the Ford Muscle Shoals offer by the farm organizations. For once Bill Hard missed a trick. The Farmers' National Council opposes the Ford offer. I appeared before the House Committee in opposition to the McKenzie bill and a letter was sent to members of Congress protesting against Ford's graft. Your readers will be interested to know that nearly one-half of the members of the farm organizations are in the South, and have not been hoodwinked by Ford.

Mr. Gorki and the Female Sex

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Please accept my thanks for the article in your issue of March 26, setting forth the interview of Mr. Louis Lochner with Mr. Maxim Gorki. It has contributed much to my hilarity, and we should always thank the gods for a chance to laugh, shouldn't we? It delights me to hear the famous revolutionary and modernist writer talk like a mid-Victorian poet.

I am somewhat at a loss, however, to understand why Mr. Lochner went all the way to Europe and sought out Alfred Tennyson Gorki for the sake of discovering that "the highest task of woman is to inspire man." He could have stayed right here in America and learned as much from Alfred Tennyson Smith or Alfred Tennyson Jones or Alfred Tennyson Babbitt, or the first man he met on the street. If he had gone to China, he could have heard the same old platitude from the lips of Alfred Tennyson Fun Low; or if he had journeyed to the South Seas, the poet laureate of the head-hunters of Borneo would have echoed the same immortal sentiment for his edification.

And why not? This is a man's world, and man ought to know what role he has assigned to his little female playmate since the early dawn of creation. And in a world of, for, and by men, the woman inevitably accepts that role—and tries to save her face by agreeing with man that it is a part of the divine order of things. To be sure, she sometimes finds the sublimity of the role a little in need of repairs, and is forced to conclude that anything a degree or two higher than the vegetable will serve to inspire masculine genius. Still, as a role in a man-made world it is not to be sneezed at; nor does she sneeze at it. A woman cannot afford to be fastidious!

"She will not pass beyond the boundaries of her own sphere," says Friend Tennyson Gorki. Now the irony of it all is that never since the world began has any woman lived the full, free life of a human being. Such a thing has never been possible, nor is it possible today in our androcentric society. All fields of intellectual development and achievement are open to woman as a female, but not as a human being. Friend Gorki observes her lack of creative ability and marvels that "there is no great feminine figure in the plastic arts." Won't some good kind Samaritan point out to him that creative genius does not flower in a mind narrowed and smothered and hedged about by the artificial barriers and conventions of sex? Only human beings can create the great things of the intellect.

Some day possibly, several thousand years after we of the present generation are dead and gone, the world may be so arranged that women may live in it as human beings, unchallenged and unafraid. After a few hundred years of this life, the time may be ripe for some future Gorki to rise in his majesty and decide whether woman is really capable of high creative achievement in such fields as philosophy, the arts, and the sciences.

The Adventures of H. W. Nevinson

Changes and Chances. By Henry W. Nevinson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.50.

POET and troubadour, traveler and soldier of humanity, man of letters and of Fleet Street, what country but England could have produced H. W. Nevinson? You can give him no definite, certainly no party, label. He is neither Liberal nor Tory, neither Socialist nor Individualist. He is simply the romantic Englishman, like Byron, or Shelley, or Colonel Lawrence, fighting devils or windmills, tenderly amorous of the old, and desperately eager to give the new a chance. Shrewsbury made him, and Oxford, and Whitechapel; our wars hammered and our sentimentalities softened him; while our occasional crimes drove him mad. America, which has seen Mr. Nevinson and I doubt not greatly wondered at him, will never understand how a man can be so fond of his country and speak with such violent disrespect of her, and in one singularly attractive make-up combine the (to us) perfectly compatible creeds of anarchy and conservatism. Mr. Nevinson has, indeed, suffered a little for some of his opinions. He has been half-killed by a war-mob in Piccadilly, and his soul-stirring battle-pieces have given much offense in pacifist circles. But I doubt whether his countrymen and countrywomen have finally misunderstood him. He is too like a great many of them. England may not have been all in all to him, for does he not record, in these fascinating memoirs, that, having failed to find God in Oxford, he went to look for Him at Jena? But it is to be doubted whether there or elsewhere the great Mother of Men quite lost her hold on her wayward and interesting child.

What is specially interesting in Mr. Nevinson's book is the great variety of encounters and experiences it records, and the stimulus they gave to a brilliant pen and a vivid and tender imagination. To have seen Pusey in "Tom Quad," walking, a scarlet-robed figure, to St. Mary's; to have heard George Meredith talk and Ruskin and Haeckel lecture; to have stood the siege of Ladysmith, and seen the Vale of Tempe in war; to have interviewed Paul Kruger, "his heart bloody with sorrow" over his country's fate, and watched the Boer commandos falling in for the struggle; to have been good friends with most of Ireland's rebels, and a comrade in arms with England's—such things are not given to most adventurers, and when they are rarely yield the rich harvest of spiritual discovery that Mr. Nevinson reaped from them.

In the business of mere "news-getting" Mr. Nevinson's war and foreign correspondence was nothing very remarkable, but in the art of imparting knowledge and creating sympathy their best passages would be hard to beat. A great deal of journalism does little more than to lay out a great extent of flat, featureless country for curious eyes to gaze at and pass over. Nevinson's gift was to light up the scene so that imaginative people never forgot it. His book is full of little pictures that live in one's memory because his own imagination has caught their true imprint: Of Kropotkin, with his "battered and crinkled face" and his "mind going full-gallop like a horse that stumbles in its eagerness"; of Olive Schreiner, with "quick-moving eyes," speaking rapidly, with outbursts of "frank and pretty laughter" (at times not pretty but wild and sad); of Ellen Terry, calling everybody "dear," and scattering love and money on all who seemed to want either; of the crabbed Butler, his "satyr eyes" bluish or gray, but very bright, gleaming with a genial malice or a malicious cheerfulness, his appearance of "attractive wild beast" increased by the "short white beard and thickets of black eyebrow"; of Thomas Hardy, his fine old countryman's face "fringed with thin and soft light hair," talking shyly and simply of the old days in Wessex; of Æ (George Russell), poet, painter, journalist, philosophic dreamer, and agricultural expert—of most of the fine people of his time, with red blood in their veins.

What Mr. Nevinson thinks of the age in which he has played his part is not fully set down here, and, as he is more of a painter than a philosopher, the invitation is for his readers to find out for themselves. The earlier period was undoubtedly one of revolt from Victorian idealism, of which, with many reserves and protests, he would call himself a disciple; the following middle period, that of the twelve years between the Boer War and the Great War, he considers to be one of "hopeful effort and emancipation"; the closing decade (with which this book does not deal), he would doubtless declare to be a descent into hell, with a doubtful recovery. What is evident is that it is not a Nevinsonian era. Nevinson is full of feeling, and the age seems to have lost feeling. He was an enthusiast of nationalism and every nationalist experiment has failed. He is a hero-worshiper, and, as Tolstoi said, there are no heroes now, "only people." As for the adventures left to a war-weary world they seem at once so terrible and so obscure that a romantic temperament may well seek relief in ironic or interrogative comment, in which Mr. Nevinson is well skilled. But we imagine that even when this coming age has thought and done its worst, it may like to read that once upon a time there were such beings as knights-errant, and that H. W. Nevinson was one of them.

H. W. MASSINGHAM

The Function of the Constitution

The American Constitution. By Frederic Jesup Stimson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

A BOOK of legal exposition from the pen of Mr. Stimson commands at once a respectful hearing. Many will find this revision of an earlier work, first published in 1908, an interesting restatement of his well-known attitude toward constitutional progress.

This book is much more than a revision of the earlier work of the same title, for, as Mr. Stimson states in his preface, "the vitality of our national Constitution is in nothing better shown than in the fact that the problems controlled and interpreted by it at one time are quite different from those being submitted only fifteen years later to its test." The major portion of the book has been rewritten with the addition of a chapter dealing with the process of amendment, and it is especially refreshing to discover the preponderant use of current decisions of the Supreme Court as illustrations of Mr. Stimson's points.

The subtitle, "[The Constitution], as it protects private rights," indicates the author's approach to the ramifying implications which new conditions are forcing within the perimeter of constitutional interpretation. His is the ablest contribution to that literature of protest which, especially during the past two or three years, has been calling the unfaithful back to the straight and narrow way of strict construction. As such, it is essentially in the nature of a brief. But it is the brief of a judiciously minded advocate who uses discrimination in the selection of his arguments and candor and fairness in their presentation. States' Rights, the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, along with other clauses of the Bill of Rights, the growth of military and administrative law are treated as various aspects of the Constitution "on its human side."

Mr. Stimson, along with the constitutions of Washington and Utah, finds the "object of government is to protect and maintain individual rights." This "living gospel of the liberties of the people" must not be allowed to suffer desecration at the hands of new and untried concepts of socialistic or, perish the thought, communistic statecraft.

A sample from almost any chapter reveals the general tenor of Mr. Stimson's logic. For example, his discussion of the injunction, admirably independent and critical so far as it deals with strictly legal problems, does not come to close grips with the central problem of its use to protect an immaterial property or individual right (often only prospectively infringed by the acts enjoined) at the expense of the equal property or individual rights of those enjoined.

The growth of administrative law is summed up in a phrase—"mandarin government." The discussion of this problem is one of the most lucid and concise in the book, one of the best summaries to be found of recent tendencies in this increasingly significant area of law. As Mr. Stimson suggests, "it will not escape notice that in all these decisions the Supreme Court has interfered in favor of the more radical view (in regard to the limits of the powers and final authority of the administrative boards and officials)—a fair reply to its enemy's charge of undue conservatism."

Quite naturally, Mr. Stimson disapproves of the extension of federal power by indirection through "fifty-fifty" appropriations for roads, welfare, education, and the like. This particular aspect of the doctrine of States' Rights was argued before the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in a recent case, against the "most centralizing tendency of all—and the most dangerous"; the case was disposed of by the court—for want of jurisdiction.

Mr. Stimson is critical of the "mass of amendments" introduced in the last Congress to tinker with the machinery of the Constitution. Many of them are perhaps ill-advised, but there is after all something to be said for Jefferson's theory of terminable constitutional prescriptions. The best of documents may be as open to criticism as laudation by its very venerability. And one may well doubt the dictum that "the public approval of history has come in almost if not quite all cases" of the Supreme Court's decisions of the unconstitutionality of a federal or State statute—as a basis for defending five-to-four decisions against recent proposed amendments.

Even majority opinions have their great value and use. The very disagreement calls popular attention . . . informs legislatures, arouses public opinion; while the frank expression of the minority opinions encourages the losing side and emboldens future courts to a refusal; in three or four great instances this has happened.

An argument more ingenious than persuasive.

A tract for the times—in these "dangerous days" for the Constitution as a bulwark of private rights. Whether one agrees or no with his narrow interpretation of the function of the Constitution and with many of his minor premises and conclusions, there will be general appreciation of Mr. Stimson's skill in putting a well-reasoned and legally accurate argument into readable, even popular terms.

PHILLIPS BRADLEY

Two Actors and a Tragedy

The Failure. By Giovanni Papini. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Echo de Paris. By Laurence Housman. D. Appleton and Company. $1.

WITH the "Life of Christ" Giovanni Papini first swam into the ken of the vast public which is now acclaiming him with that unanimous and whole-hearted enthusiasm it reserves for the authors of those books which it accepts, not because they are forced upon it by clamor of some sort or other, but because it finds them truly congenial. Those who knew before something of this spectacular enfant terrible of ideas were few, but the rest are no doubt anxious to learn more of their idol, and "The Failure," his autobiographical novel, will tell them much—though hardly of the sort of thing likely to assure any but the most uncritical. The book clearly reveals the character of the man, but it is less the character of a philosopher than of a romanticist, and a romanticist of a somewhat old-fashioned Byronic sort. With a most remarkable if not altogether intentional frankness he gives himself completely away, proudly parading both his uninterrupted search for the sensational and that boundless ambition of his which, at times, looks disconcertingly like Ambition's idiot sister, Vanity.

"Byronic" is the only word that describes fitly his grandiose dramatization of his character and of his actions from the moment when, as a child, he realized with a gloomy exaltation that he was "different," through his violent championships of all the most spectacular philosophies, to the moment when, at the end of the present book, he has exhausted the possibilities of the more startling heresies and is ready to assume his present role of Catholic conservative and vitriolic denouncer of everything which has appeared in the world since the Renaissance. "It is not hard to see that these eyes were never intended to reflect the blue of the heavens," he says in describing himself as a child. "And these lips, so tightly, so wilfully closed, were never made to be parted in a smile. They are the lips of a man who will suffer pain, but never betray it with a cry. They are lips that will be kissed too late in life." This passage sets the key, and Childe Harold and Manfred seem to live again. Papini's eye is fixed always on himself, and no human task is great enough to express his sense of his own importance. As a child he dreamed of composing an encyclopedia of encyclopedias which should include all knowledge, as a youth he planned a radical review which should set all Italy aflame, and then later he imagined himself the leader of some band of revolutionary doers who should upset and then remold the world. But he never knew for long at a time what it was that he was going to do; only the thirst for notoriety was constant, for, as he frankly confesses, he was determined to be "founder of a school, leader of a faction, prophet of a religion, redeemer of souls, author of a best seller, anything so long as I was first, foremost, greatest in Something."

I do not wish to imply that Papini has no brain or even that he has not in the past expressed some interesting ideas, but in any estimate of his work it is necessary to remember that he is first of all a romantic egoist to whom truth cannot seem for long more important in itself than as a means of self-exploitation. Often he is violent and vulgar, occasionally he is brilliant, but his dominant manner is excited, nervous, declamatory, florid—in a word, operatic, with bravura arias taking the place of passion. Sometimes, perhaps, he suggests the philosopher but far more often the tenor.

Once more, it seems, the super-subtle Italian has proved himself too much for the honest Saxon. Thousands of pious souls have accepted the "Life of Christ" in all simplicity and, entirely ignorant of the past of this matinee idol among philosophers, have been completely unaware of the sizzle of the spotlight and the smell of the grease paint which betray the theatrical character of the book. God works in a mysterious way and it will not do to question too closely the motive of a conversion, but when a man puts himself at the foot of the cross chiefly for the purpose of holding the center of the stage the joy in heaven over a sinner saved may well be tempered with a little skepticism. Papini was Atheist, Positivist, Pragmatist, Pyrrhonist, Nietzschean, and Theosophist before assuming the part of Medieval Catholic. This latest has been announced as positively his final appearance in his last and greatest role, but actors have a way of giving many farewell tours, and a wise public will always ask, What next?

Though it is not possible for me to take Papini, the Titan, more seriously than I take Gounod's Faust, it has always seemed to me that Oscar Wilde, the subject of Mr. Housman's drama, did, on the other hand, achieve real tragedy and that the story of his exile from the brilliant stage which was life to him has a genuine poignancy. I think of him as I think, for example, of the most capricious Ovid among the Goths, and that thought is more poignant than the thought of Dante exiled from Florence, for the latter had the support and consolation of his unconquered pride, whereas poor amiable Ovid could only sicken for the gay world where alone he could live. And so it was with Wilde. No doubt he should have been able to find peace in repentance and reform, but he couldn't, and exile was for him simply a hell with a memory of heaven. In "Echo de Paris" Mr. Housman has caught completely the spirit of this tragedy. At a last supper in a Parisian cafe, Wilde talks with a characteristic brilliance which can only be the author's memory of some real conversation and then, for a moment, when an old intimate passes without a sign of recognition, the shadow falls. Wilde squares his shoulders and continues his talk but in a single instant the tragedy is revealed. In choosing to make his foreground bright and the tragedy only by implication Mr. Housman has shown an exquisite sense of dramatic fitness and his little play is nearly perfect.

J. W. KRUTCH

The Generation of Fire

La Génération du Feu: Bio-Bibliographie des Ecrivains combattants français de 1914-1919. By Maurice d'Hartoy, with preface by José Germain. Paris: Berger-Levrault, éditeurs. 10 francs.

THERE would be little more to say about this work than that it is carefully edited and sure to be of interest and value to many persons, since it gives a brief account of the life, works, and war records of all living French writers who actually fought at the front, if it were not for the fact that M. d'Hartoy prints also the motto, devise, or formule d'idéal of each of the writers cited. The inclusion of this additional information makes the book very interesting humanly, for who is not concerned to know the ideals of contemporary French men of letters?

M. José Germain, president of the Association des Ecrivains combattants, under the patronage of which the work appears, says in his preface:

If tomorrow France were attacked again, we should again know how to defend her; but let us not allow ourselves to be regarded, in the criminal language of most criminal judges, as so much "human material," which one destroys and throws away. . . . Let us be the artisans of the future. . . . France, desiring to live once more, calls us.

As I turned the pages, wondering how many of these writers shared M. Germain's hatred of militarism and of profiteers, I was struck by the predominating number who followed ideals which, in no disparaging sense whatever, may be regarded as standard currency in every age. Such ideals are, for example, expressed in the following: "Aimons-nous les uns les autres;" "Rester modeste, pour rester honnête;" "Toujours plus haut;" "Crée du bonheur autour de toi;" "Compter sur soi-même persévérer;" and "Simplex et rectus." But these were not the ideas I was looking for. Such mottoes might belong to men who never saw a gun; they would ornament a civilization where war was inconceivable. Then I noted the comparative absence of the flippant or cynical. True, M. Charles Hennebois bears imperturbably the crest "A quoi bon?;" and M. Maurice Constantin-Weyer, asked for his motto, replies: "Lequel? J'en change comme de chemise, le plus souvent possible, dès qu'il est fripé." But apparently few wits and skeptics have survived Verdun.

What struck me most of all was the continued opposition of two views of war and patriotism, the holders of these views being about equal in number. M. Frédéric Lagrange, for instance, takes as his ideal, "To believe in, and to fight for, God, my country, and my children;" Professor Charles Delvert, "To live and die for the fatherland is the whole duty of man;" and M. André Dezarrois, "For Glory often, for the Fatherland always." It is a commentary on human nature that after four years in the trenches, men can still hold to ideals the blind acceptance of which profits the militarist only, whether in France or in the United States.

On the other hand, there is M. Holl, art critic and novelist, and from his record a brave soldier, who adopts the phrase of the Greek sophist: "Patriotism is the first illusion of the fool and the last refuge of the knave." And M. Marcel Périn, journalist, who gives his rule of conduct as "the widest tolerance," and his ideal "the maximum of brotherhood." And M. Henri Regnault, who says: "All for and by solidarity." The dream of M. Pierre Andrieu is, "Union among the peoples; the largest liberty under all forms of government; the doing away of prejudices; the brotherhood of the classes—and this goal for all: To work together to soften the fate of humanity." To make an end, there is M. Henri Barbusse, who aims "To replace the social formula as it stands, which produces war automatically, by an international statute based on respect for life and the general interest."

"Let us be artisans of the future," wrote M. Germain. When it comes to that I wonder whether a single Barbusse will not prove as influential as scores of his less perceptive brothers? Most men of conventional patriotism are what they are because they believe war to be inevitable. Such an attitude is chiefly one of resignation; whereas the writer who is heart and soul against bloodshed is commonly driven into activity by his belief. There is that fact to consider.

One formule d'idéal among the rest, that of M. Henri Davoust, while not strictly in point, is worth quoting:

All good is in the people, but it should be sought for with as much system and thought of the future as is practiced commercially in the extraction of precious metals and gems. Today, under the regime of empiricism, it is only by chance that men who are worthy arrive at the surface.

"The Generation of Fire" is to be followed by an "Anthologie des Ecrivains morts au champ d'honneur," under the patronage of the same association. In the present volume, incidentally, I wish to call the attention of M. d'Hartoy to the omission of the name of M. Justin-Frantz Simon from the table "Morts sous les drapeaux."

HANIEL LONG

A Hymn of Hate

An Outlaw's Diary. II. The Commune. By Cécile Tormay. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.

MISS TORMAY'S second volume presents the spectacle of an otherwise talented woman novelist writhing hysterically under imaginary wrongs which she thought the revolutionaries, the objects of her contemptuous hatred, were about to inflict upon her. Like the first volume of the diaries, which was devoted to the events of the Karolyi revolution, the second is written in superlatives characterizing the irreconcilable spirit of the Hungarian feudal lords whose literary bodyguard she is. In her opinion, the Commune in Hungary was a desperate attempt of the Jews to get a foothold in Europe which they could have used as a basis for their attacks upon neighboring countries, the successful termination of which would have been the "conquest of the world by Juda."

Obviously, the author chose the form of a diary for her description of the Commune because it afforded an unparalleled opportunity to record rumors and absurd phantasmagorias of her imagination without being subject to the charge of knowingly falsifying history. This liberty she misused to present mere fiction in the guise of experience. Consideration for those who expect from this book information about the Commune in Hungary requires therefore that at least the most outstanding distortions should be pointed out.

Miss Tormay, for example, repeatedly speaks of the Commune as if it had been one of the most bloody events human history has ever recorded. In reality, Bolshevism in Hungary, although undoubtedly it heaped blunder upon blunder, more by its eternal threats than by its sporadic practice of terrorism, was child's play in comparison with the Hungarian white terror later. On several occasions Miss Tormay describes with much detail the events which she alleges took place in the Hungarian capital during the Bolshevik regime, notwithstanding the fact that being absent from Budapest she hardly had means of knowing exactly what was going on there. In her overwrought imagination she saw frequent executions in the cellar of the Hungarian Parliament and heard mysterious splashes in the nearby Danube followed invariably by the disappearance of a political prisoner. I was in Budapest during the Bolshevik rule and during a considerable period of the ensuing white terror, and I can testify that life was incomparably more secure in the Hungarian metropolis in the time of Bela Kun than it was during the regime of Admiral Horthy, the idol of Miss Tormay.

Miss Tormay tells with great eloquence how Count and Countess Karolyi were reveling in the luxurious palace of the People's Commissaries while Budapest was starving. She represents Karolyi as in the pay of the Bolsheviks and says that he "stood as an invisible power behind the revolutionary government." The fact is that Karolyi, who yielded only to the threat of force in surrendering the power to the Soviets, was utterly averse to the methods of government of the Hungarian Communists. He expressed his aversion by leaving the country at a time when, it would follow from what Miss Tormay says, the Soviet Republic needed his services urgently.

If Miss Tormay wishes to publish an account of terroristic acts and massacres she should write a diary of post-communistic times. Against approximately sixty victims of the Commune, conservative estimates put the number of those who lost their lives during the white terror at 6,000 to 7,000. However, Miss Tormay is an enthusiastic counter-revolutionary, and Horthy is for her the "legendary hero of Navarra."

Bernhardt

The Real Sarah Bernhardt (Whom Her Audiences Never Knew). Told to her friend Mme Pierre Berton, and translated into English by Basil Woon. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

AS Sarah Bernhardt, the woman, fades from the mortal scene it becomes the task of her surviving friends to isolate among her effects the gossip, slanders, and anecdotes of which she died seized and possessed and sift the authentic from the spurious. A bit of old lace here, with the waning fragrance of romance still clinging to it; a pale brown tintype there, with features calling out of the past the faint memory of an engrossing passion. In the case of Sarah Bernhardt it is not a matter of removing from the portrait what might be considered blemishes according to Victorian standards, but rather of determining which of the numerous acts ascribed to her really took place; which was a slander and which a boast.

The logical writer for this task is Lytton Strachey, for Mme Sarah Bernhardt was the antithesis of Queen Victoria during that period of the nineteenth century when the Queen spoke authoritatively for morality and decorum. And one of the very first documents which Mr. Strachey must consult is this book called "The Real Sarah Bernhardt" by Mme Pierre Berton, a confidential friend of the actress and formerly a member of her supporting company. With a naivete possible only to the French Mme Berton has here suggested rich sources of material for an ironical commentator. Mme Sarah, we read from her pages, was a break in normality, an individual who, every moment of her life, reminded her contemporaries that social conventions were not for her. She was born illegitimate, the daughter of a law student from Havre and a Flemish Jewess from Berlin, and was able, when sixteen, to put the world, that is, la famille, to flight with a tart summary of the situation, when marriage was proposed to her: "My mother is not married, yet she wants me to be a wife! My mother is a Jewess and she does not want her daughter to become a nun!" In later life she was able by word and act to violate just as sharply all ordinary expectations. She went up in a balloon at a day when that was scandalous; she served tea over her coffin; she modeled the Baron de Rothschild and, when he disapproved of her art, broke the bust into a thousand pieces and sent the fragments to him with her compliments. She humbled her most uncompromising critic, Francisque Sarcey, by taking him for a lover and casting him off after he had eulogized her; she exhibited her primitive rage so openly that even the Prince Napoleon was led to describe her as "a madonna who acts like the devil." Mme Berton tells these and many other stories, and brings in many famous names—Sardou, Dumas, Richepin, Mounet-Sully, Coquelin, Rostand—but hers remains solely a narrative of anecdote. The larger social implications are there, but we must leave them for a Lytton Strachey to ferret out. Only one example may suffice to show the trend: The acts that shocked Paris were not necessarily breaches of morals, but the acts that aroused all England were solely that. It was twenty years before the Prince of Wales could persuade his mother to command Mme Bernhardt to give a performance at Windsor Castle. On another occasion Bernhardt had been invited to attend a reception at the home of Lady R. She had brought her little son Maurice to England—he always accompanied her in France—and now she arrived at this English home with him. The English knew about the boy, but when he appeared Lady R. blushed for the conventions. She quietly gave certain instructions to her butler, and when Madame entered leading the little lad he announced to the assembled company: "Mademoiselle Sarah Bernhardt and her son." After that she was quickly snubbed and left the house in a rage ten minutes later. Truly here is material for social comedy, for an ironist who can appreciate the flimsy basis of our most cherished conventions.

Books in Brief

A Manual of Cultivated Plants. By L. H. Bailey. The Macmillan Company. $7.

Many an amateur botanist who has been disturbed by strange roadside plants that did not fit into the pages of his Gray or of his Britton and Brown will welcome this careful manual of cultivated plants. Here he can identify the hot-house ferns that come from the florist, and learn from what mysterious part of the world they derive. Here he can trace the relationships of the famous plants of greenhouse and history—the English yew, the cedar of Lebanon, the primrose and the cowslip, Socrates's hemlock, Boston ivy and Kenilworth ivy—with the similarly named but very different plants of native growth. He need no longer toss aside his tree-book in disgust because, while it describes in detail all the native trees of the Carolinas, it omits the exotic trees which line the streets of our cities and ornament almost every country estate. Hitherto, if he wanted to identify these strangers in our midst, he had to consult the impossibly large "Standard Cyclopedia of Horticulture," with its 20,602 species and 6,715 varieties. Mr. Bailey covers only 3,665 species, which is quite enough; and while he does not go into the curly petaled varieties which are the pride of the seedsmen and florists he has provided an indispensable aid to the amateur.

Poems. By Katherine Mansfield. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Katherine Mansfield was a better poet in her short stories, which she said she wrote "in a kind of special prose." But it was no mistake to print these poems after her death, any more than it was a mistake to print the fragments of fiction which so brilliant a woman left. The poems had little or no success during her lifetime, the few which were published appearing under the pseudonyms Boris Petrovsky and Elizabeth Stanley. Many of them are adolescent in their impulse—either for children or by a child. Others seem to be notes for stories; some are stories, told in a free verse which might when read aloud be taken for the intense, quick prose of "The Garden Party," "Bliss," or "The Dove's Nest." Incidentally, this free verse of 1910-1911 was ahead of its time in England. Through it Katherine Mansfield aimed at the effect which she was uniquely qualified to achieve—the effect of clear, distinct, and dancing reality, the effect of an evanescent mood caught by an adroit hand and delicately particularized.

Mince Collop Close. By George Blake. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

The ability to set down impressions in one swift, direct stroke—a power of immediate communication—is the most arresting thing about this novel of life in the underworld of Glasgow. Mr. Blake writes a vigorous prose, well suited to the stuff out of which he has cut his narrative. Here is melodrama, but melodrama which has taken on the glow of life.

Thy Neighbor's Wife. By Liam O'Flaherty. Boni and Liveright. $2.

The path which this novel travels has been worn by many predecessors, and consequently one is not surprised to find that—while it possesses a measure of durable interest—it opens no new vistas for the imagination. Some of the character drawing is excellent, however, in its Irish intuitiveness.

Caesar Remembers and Other Poems. By William Kean Seymour. Thomas Seltzer. $1.50.

English poems of varying skill and charm by a twentieth-century Marvell. The virtues of the seventeenth century are conspicuously present—delicacy of mind, clarity of phrase, and balance between the abstract and the concrete. So is the prevailing vice—inability to point a poem and really end it. The stanzas keep on repeating the theme until the poet is tired; they make a daisy-chain of ingenious rhyme more often than they make a composition. But the title-piece, and at least three others—To One Who Eats Larks, If Beauty Come to You, and To Music—amply justify the volume and promise to find their way into anthologies.

The Story of the Renaissance. By Sidney Dark. George H. Doran Company. $1.25.

This book seems to have been written to show that the period from 1453 to 1603, from the fall of Constantinople to the death of Elizabeth, was, politically, morally, and socially speaking, a period not of rebirth, but of decay. These years mark the beginning of nationalism and of the wars that spring from it. The Italian "pipes of Pan" performed a kind of Devil's hornpipe, to which all Europe danced. The peasant and craftsman ceased to function as members of the body politic and became the slaves of industrialism. "The Renaissance," says the author, "had great gifts for the artist and for the lover of beauty, for the poet and the lover of books, for the king, for the philosopher, for the adventurer. It had no gift for the workingman." But it is well to remember that, as Homer says, "the gods in no wise grant men all things at once," and the world today, without the achievements of that amazing century and a half, would be a vastly duller and poorer place. The book suffers from the extreme compression necessitated by its brevity and is overloaded with names and dates. It is overloaded also with quotations from rather dubious "authorities"—for example, Mr. H. G. Wells and Mr. Christopher Hare. It contains some curious lapses. The Van Eycks were not German painters (p. 14); the history of modern European art does not begin with Giotto (p. 106); "Holbein's famous woodcut 'The Dance of Death'" (p. 128) is a bookful of woodcuts; and The Golden Legend which Caxton printed was certainly not "a translation from . . . the Latin version of the Bible made by St. Jerome in the Middle Ages" (p. 130)—St. Jerome, who died in 420! We should also rather like to know what became of the "famous statues of the pagan gods" that Michelangelo produced at Rome" (p. 112).

Drama Diversions

AT the Provincetown Playhouse they have put on the "George Dandin" of Molière in a very finely felt translation by Mr. Stark Young. Mr. Stark Young also writes an interesting and acute program note in which he rightly makes the point that time and revolutions in society have made of this poor, gulled peasant a tragic figure and have thus given the Molièrian farce an edge of pity. That is true enough as a general remark and would, doubtless, be measurably true of any production. This special production, however, makes it emphatically and distortedly true. The old French print of Dandin and his aristocratic parents-in-law which is reproduced in the program shows Dandin in the costume, wig and all, of a fine gentleman of the period. This peasant of Molière, in a word, is derided because, like M. Jourdain, he was a foolish snob who bartered for tinsel the solid advantages of his station and occupation. So soon as we see him strutting about in silks and ribands, we know where we are and what Molière meant. But Mr. Young has made him a hind simple not only in mind but in heart. This George Dandin in his peasant's garb, with his unpretentious ways, would never have given his money to sustain the tottering house of Sotenville. Here, as elsewhere, Molière was after sham, pretense, the pursuit of values that are no values. He wanted the presumptuous, foolishly ambitious peasant laughed at, although, in addition, he was severe enough on the dishonesty and hollowness of these aristocrats. He does not need the excuses here made for him. The play, brief and slight as it is, has all of Molière's sovereign good sense, clarity, grasp, and justice, though its technique is, of course, primitive.

The second part of the current Provincetown bill consists of a dramatization of "The Ancient Mariner." I am very much taken with the masks of Mr. James Light. But I want to see them used to other and better purposes. The old French ballads so admirably pictorialized and dramatized by the Chauve Souris Theater had an earthiness and concreteness which made them fit subject for such a process. Here the great theater of the imagination must forever suffice. The little theater of mere human voices is utterly inadequate.

At Henry Miller's Theater Mrs. Fiske continues, as she has done for some years past, to undermine a great and deserved reputation. Each successive play in which she appears is worse than the previous one. The present concoction known as "Helena's Boys" proves with a heavy didactic hand that youth is always wrong, that manners must not change, that the manufacturing of umbrellas and raincoats is nobler than art or vision, and that young men who care for poetry and thought and the fate of mankind had better betake themselves to obedience, baseball, politeness, and ginger-bread.

Far more serious than any of these things was the program of dances given at the Manhattan Opera House by Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn, and their associates, especially Miss Louise Brooks and Miss Doris Humphrey. If Pavlova's style of dancing is classic, Miss St. Denis's is romantic—romantic in the largest sense. She aims after fluid beauty, high suggestiveness, pictures, and rhythms that fire the imagination. She uses the elements of nature, the folk-dances of primitive peoples, exotic or immemorial lands, customs, gods. With Pavlova everything is fixed and finished and courtly. Miss St. Denis reaches out for beauty and the hauntingness of beauty which is also strangeness and finds and projects that beauty and that strangeness exquisitely. And, like all romantics, she has the note of irony which is admirably brought out by the "Danse Américaine" performed by Mr. Charles Weidman. The entire performance has high seriousness, a certain earnestness and yet lightness of beauty that is refreshing and sustaining at once.

India Today

THE most informed and intelligent of the daily press reports on India have been those of C. F. Andrews, correspondent of the Manchester Guardian. Mr. Andrews's writing shows a rare combination of detachment and sympathy. His knowledge is profound. We print herewith parts of three recent dispatches in which Mr. Andrews describes the situation in India following the release from prison of Mahatma Gandhi, the trouble among the Akali Sikhs, and the hope of reconciliation with Britain. The first, on the release and recovery of Gandhi, appeared in the Guardian of March 15.

Serious and informed English opinion needs to take into account the one patent fact that just as in Egypt it is Zaghlul who now counts and no one else, so in India it is Mahatma Gandhi who counts and the rest are nowhere. Zaghlul came from the peasant class. Mahatma Gandhi became, by an act of religious poverty, a peasant. It is this direct touch with the common folk which has made these national movements in Egypt and India so strong and active. There is no other force in India remotely to compare with that of Mahatma Gandhi. His least word sways the hearts of Mohammedans as well as Hindus. The president of the All-India Christian Conference called him the greatest living "Indian Christian," because of his devoted life of love and service. The Parsee priests in their fire temples offer prayers for his long life. He is revered as no Indian in modern times has ever been revered.

Therefore the whole political situation has been lightened by the wise and humane act of his release. There has been an immediate response of the most remarkable kind. From Mahatma Gandhi himself has come a renewed offer of friendship. His words have been echoed by Maulana Muhammad Ali, the leader of Islam in India, and also by Pundit Motilal Nehru, the head of the Swaraj Party in the Legislative Assembly. Nationalist papers have vied with one another in praising the Government of India for its kindly deed. There has not been a single discordant note. The opportunity is a great one for a man of imagination to lay hold of, and thus to regain something of that earlier friendship between India and Great Britain, which was so deep and true and sincere.

It was difficult for me, after leaving England on January 17, to gain any tidings about Mahatma Gandhi's illness. At last, at Aden, the Indian papers brought the welcome news that he had borne the operation well. When the ship reached Bombay a special messenger had been sent by him from the hospital to welcome me on my arrival and to ask me to come immediately to Poona. There I have been with him, apart from one slight interval, ever since. The privilege of serving him in his present physical weakness is one which I would not have missed for the world.

Words can hardly describe the frailty and weakness of his body after the operation. At one time he looked as if he could hardly recover, and I heard at first hand how anxious the doctors had been. His mind is still as alert and active as ever, almost too active for such a frail and emaciated body. He will give it no rest, and almost from the first day after his release he began to direct from his bedside some of his most devoted followers. The wound, in these circumstances, has healed very slowly indeed; already nearly six weeks have passed and it has not closed yet. The reports sent to England about his having completely recovered his health must be heavily discounted. What I have most feared is that he may be rapidly burning life itself away in the ardor of his indomitable spirit.

The crowd on this occasion has been extraordinarily good, and his very least wish has been observed. But I dread, more than I can say, the time when he is allowed to leave the hospital. It is not unlikely that then the enthusiasm of the masses, who worship him with a blind devotion, will break out in full flood, beyond all control or restraint. I have traveled with him on previous occasions, when the strain of the multitude (even when he was in good health) could hardly be borne. What will it be in his present physical weakness?

The actual news of his release came to him while I was with him one early morning in the hospital. The doctor, Colonel Maddock, who had performed the operation, was the first to bring the good tidings. Mahatma Gandhi remained quite calm and collected. "This is no release to me," he said, "but only greater responsibility than ever." He then said laughingly to the doctor: "I trust that you will allow me to remain your patient a little longer." The doctor smiled in turn and said that he would have to obey orders while he was under his charge. A remarkable friendship has grown up between these two men, and the praise given by Mahatma Gandhi for the treatment he has received has been unbounded. The extraordinary outburst of friendly feeling toward Englishmen which spread like a great wave over the country after Mahatma Gandhi's release has been in no slight measure due to the knowledge, which reached to the remotest villages, that Mahatma Gandhi's life had been saved owing to the skill and devotion of Colonel Maddock, the English doctor.

The extremely critical nature of the illness was unknown to me before the time when I heard an account of it from the doctor himself. The trouble was acute appendicitis. It developed so quickly that a few hours' further delay might have proved fatal. The doctor, realizing at once, when called in for consultation, the gravity of the case, broke through all the red tape of prison restrictions and took his patient at once in his own motor-car to the Sassoon Hospital at Poona. Darkness had come on before the operation could be performed. Then, as luck would have it, when the patient was under chloroform, suddenly the electric light fused and they were left in darkness. All that could be found on the spur of the moment was a hurricane lantern. Just as everything was over the light came on again. When one realizes all that was at stake, and the amount of human good-will and international friendship that depended on the success of that operation, it is not easy to praise too highly the nerve of the doctor. Surely here was Western science at its best, and Mahatma Gandhi, who has all the fervor of an iconoclast against modern civilization, was deeply impressed. He thanked the doctor and nurses in no measured terms for their tenderness and care. He is fully aware that he owes his life to their skill, and he has gratefully informed the Indian public of the fact. He has used the occasion also for impressing once more the vital point that his opposition is against the bureaucratic system in India, not against Englishmen themselves, whom he counts among his friends.

"Indeed," he says in his letter, "we want to regard Englishmen as our friends, and not to misunderstand them by treating them as our enemies. And if we are today engaged in a struggle against the British Government, it is against the system for which it stands in India, and not against Englishmen who are administering the system. I know that many of us have failed to understand and always bear in mind this distinction, and in so far as we have failed we have harmed our cause."

This is a true utterance, generously uttered, and, as I have twice repeated, it has created at once an atmosphere of friendliness in India such as I personally have not known for some years. What the words of the Duke of Connaught, so nobly and humbly spoken when hearts were still sore, could not accomplish, has, I verily believe, been accomplished today. The Punjab wrongs at Amritsar have at last been forgotten in the outburst of joy over Mahatma Gandhi's deliverance not only from prison but from death. The Mussulmans are not mentioning today the Caliphate. They are rejoicing along with Hindus in Mahatma Gandhi's return from the Valley of the Shadow of Death. No other subject is on people's lips, and the papers each day in the vernaculars are eagerly scanned for any fraction of news concerning their leader and friend.

The question may well be asked by those who have followed this narrative whether this is all the news of the political situation in India today; whether the Council sessions in Delhi and the provincial councils at the different capitals, which are passing their Swaraj resolutions, mean nothing at all. My answer would be that they cannot be compared with the political importance of this one frail, pathetic figure, racked and tormented with pain and suffering, yet bearing each day's burden with a cheerful smile, in the hospital at Poona. For India is vitally, essentially, immeasurably religious; and the influence of one saint who has won the love and devotion of the poor is greater than that of all the rest of the politicians put together. This saint-politician, if I may use the strange hybrid word, has already taken into his own hands the reins of political leadership again. He is ruling India as no Viceroy can do, from the hospital itself.

THE AKALIS AND THEIR FAITH

The Akali movement has a long history. This group has always been the extreme section of the Sikh community and has been known for its stern discipline and readiness to die for the faith. In ordinary times the Akalis have been a minority and their influence slight; now, according to Mr. Andrews, they dominate the Sikh community from end to end, and their doctrines have deeply affected the whole army. The Akalis wear a dark-blue or black turban and, in spite of all official prohibitions, wear the kispan, the sacred short sword. In 1919 the worst brutalities of British martial law fell upon the Sikhs, and the Akali movement sprang out of a deep sense of the injustice of that reign of terror. The Nation, in issues dated November 1, 1922, and July 25, 1923, dealt with successive developments of this movement which has now reached an acute stage. In two articles in the Manchester Guardian on March 20 and 26, C. F. Andrews describes the present situation in these words:

This article is written just after the march of a jatha, or company, of five hundred Akalis to the Sikh shrine at Jaito. There were signs of violence in the huge crowd of ten thousand which accompanied the jatha, and they appear to have carried weapons, though the jatha itself was unarmed. Shooting took place, and, as far as can be ascertained, some twenty of the crowd were killed and nearly fifty wounded. As there had already been symptoms of violence in word and thought, if not in deed, in the Akali movement of late, Mahatma Gandhi sent from his bed of sickness a message to its leaders urging them not to dispatch any more jathas until they had purified themselves in their innermost thoughts from everything that might lead to violent deeds in the end.

But the news has come today that in spite of this they are determined to launch another jatha of five hundred devotees against the military barrier with the object of reaching the shrine. This disobedience to Mahatma Gandhi's wish, if it actually occurs, will mean that the future is darker than ever. His authority has never been questioned before, and it will be strange indeed if it is thrown aside now. The news has come that two Akali leaders are on their way to reason with him against his decision. But the ominous thing is that the Akalis appear to have been unwilling to delay the aggressive element in the movement even for a single day. The new jatha, we are told, is ready, and it is to be offered as a sacrifice in the cause of religious devotion.

The following week, Mr. Andrews carried the story a step farther, and showed clearly how serious was the underlying situation.

Each day the trouble among the Akali Sikhs is growing greater, and it is very difficult indeed to know how long the spirit of non-violence will last. I seem to be repeating the same story week after week, but I can write about nothing else; for this alone is in all men's minds and hearts.

At the deplorable shooting at Jaito, when about twenty were killed and between forty and fifty wounded, it has been claimed by the Sikhs that on their side there was not a single shot fired. This statement has been challenged by the state Government; the latter declares that eight shots were fired at British officers who were present. Among the officials, however, there were no casualties, though one villager is said to have been wounded by a stray shot from the Sikhs. The Home Member, when asked in the Assembly why, if the Sikhs themselves fired, there were no casualties, answered that their firing was erratic. An inquiry is to be held, and it is hoped that the truth will soon be known.

The Associated Press representative, whose report has passed the censorship and has appeared in all the papers, thus describes what happened:

The Akali jatha (company) advanced singing hymns and huge crowds following. As it reached the Gurdwara Tibbi Sahib, the state officials, followed by mounted troops, kept the jatha in check and ordered it to retire; failing which it was pointed out that fire would be opened. The jatha is described as having stood unwavering, determined to advance. The reporter then describes that at this stage the authorities opened fire, and there were some casualties both from among the crowd and the Akali jatha. The latter had drawn itself into two lines, one in front and another behind, with Guru Granth Sahib between the two rows. After a short while when the fire was stopped the jatha people lifted their dead and wounded companions and advanced. He says that the number of casualties is unknown, but calculates the number of wounded at forty or fifty. He says that fire was opened a second time. At this point the crowd stopped, but the jatha advanced and there were a few more casualties, and as they reached the police cordon firing was stopped. It was now about 4:30 p. m. and the reporter came back and did not notice anything.

I was present, as I have already related, at Guru-ka-Bagh, in September, 1922, when a similar Akali jatha was going forward to receive a terrible beating with blows, and also kicks, from the military police. I saw these given and men knocked down senseless time after time without the slightest sign of resistance. I went with these men (who were mainly ex-soldiers) while they stood before the sacred shrine and took the vow of non-violence. They kept that vow then; and I am inclined to think they kept it also at Jaito. With regard to the crowd it is far more difficult to speak; and it may be that some shots were fired which wounded the one villager mentioned, and some other shots besides; but it is now absolutely certain that no one of the state authorities was either wounded or killed.

If the reporter's account from which I have quoted is accurate, then an event that was truly noble lighted up the darkness of the tragedy. It must be remembered that the Sikh Scriptures, called the Guru Granth Sahib, are among the Sikhs their own "Holy of Holies." The Akalis appear to have come singing their religious hymns, with the Guru Granth Sahib in their midst. They would all be used to military formation; and when the firing began, the reporter states, they "had drawn into two lines, one in front and the other behind, with Guru Granth Sahib between those two rows. After a short while, when fire was stopped, they lifted their dead and wounded companions and advanced."

If that account prove to be true, in the course of the inquiry which is to be held, it would indeed be a notable deed; for they would all know that the fire would be reopened. . . .

Another jatha is to go forward, and it is already on the march. The message from Mahatma Gandhi came too late to stop it; and when it had once started, after having taken the vow of religion, it would be quite impossible for it to draw back. The crowd, this time, is to be very strictly held in check. The jatha is to advance alone. What will be its fate?

While the jatha is on its march, at every stage the villagers collect, sometimes in hundreds, and sometimes numbering even thousands. The company of Akalis is called the Shahidi Jatha (shahid means "martyr"). The women worship; many weep. The little children are told by their mothers the stories of the Sikh Gurus who met their death by martyrdom as these are now going to die. The children listen with awe. The men stand by, silent with bowed heads. At each halting place the cry goes up: "Sat Sri Akal" ("Glory to the True, the Deathless"). These bands of Sikhs are called the Akalis, the "Deathless Ones." Such things as these must be remembered if we would understand what is taking place. We may believe that the state authorities were seeking to do their duty. But is there no other way?

Ruling Out the "Undesirables"

THE following table, prepared by Meyer Jacobstein, Representative in Congress from New York, shows the yearly immigration quotas allowed the different countries under the present law compared with those provided for in the Johnson immigration bill which has just passed the House. Citizens of Nowhere!

The Virgin Islanders lost their Danish citizenship in 1917 but failed to acquire that of the United States.

Through neglect by Congress their industries have collapsed and they are close to starvation; they are subject to the autocratic and non-constructive rule of the Navy Department.

We are trying to place their case before Congress, to get for them American citizenship, civil government, and economic rehabilitation.

We need $500. Will you help?

MAHATMA GANDHI

ROLLAND tells the story of Gandhi's life in simple, almost meager, outline but with such exquisite touches of poetic insight and with such profound sympathy and understanding that the narrative takes on, even in its narrow compass, the proportions of a vast epic. . . . Rolland's story is the best telling of the tale that we have had. His book is chiefly notable, however, for its comparatively full interpretation of Gandhi's philosophy and teaching, the principles of thought and life which are the motive impulses of his tremendous career. . . . Rolland breaks new ground and thus makes an original contribution to available sources of information about the Mahatma. Invaluable, also, are his well chosen and abundant quotations from Gandhi's writings in 'Young India' and elsewhere."—John Haynes Holmes in the New York Herald and Tribune.

THE PATIENT PUBLIC may be getting bored, and the valiant Republican propaganda to convince the country of the wickedness of investigation may be taking root, but the senatorial committees keep right on digging into the muck of the Harding-Coolidge administrations. Huston Thompson, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, appeared and, according to the summary given in the New York World, said:

The Federal Trade Commission tried for a year to get the Attorney General (Mr. Daugherty) to undertake criminal prosecution of the tobacco trust for violation of the Sherman law, and was unable even to get an answer to repeated letters until the Keller impeachment proceedings against Daugherty, when the Department of Justice sent some of its attorneys to confer with the commission, but no action resulted.

Mr. Thompson's testimony was not hearsay, nor was it that of a bootlegger or gambler. Other men of that less pleasant type who appear to have held the confidence of the Government, however, have continued revealing its nature. Seized liquor, they report, was regularly sorted out in the department and the best of it distributed to political friends. The covering-up process also continues. Mel Daugherty, brother of the former attorney general, who refused to permit the senators to investigate the books of his bank, is still unpunished for his defiance. It is high time that a few of the gentry who thus thumb their noses at the Government were put in jail.

THE JOB OF TIMING the visits around the empire of the Prince of Wales so that they shall not coincide with revolutions and general elections becomes more difficult every year. India exploded for his special benefit; and now South Africa plans a general election in June, just when the Prince was due to arrive. It seems too bad not to let him go; political education is supposed to be good for princes, and this will be an educational election. The opposition to General Smuts, both from Labor and from the Nationalists, has been gaining strength; and the recent loss of an important seat by the government party led the Prime Minister to dissolve the Parliament. The Nationalist Party, representing the unreconstructed Dutch community, has stood for republicanism as an ultimate ideal. Lately this party has made every effort to win the sympathy and co-operation of the Labor group. If the Nationalists should win in the coming elections (as is likely unless General Smuts rouses new enthusiasm by waving the imperial flag) and should succeed in forming a coalition ministry, an interesting phenomenon would appear—a self-governing dominion ruled by avowed republicans and by Labor men formally pledged to fight secession. No vital change of practical policy would be likely to result. Labor wants higher taxation of wealth—especially of the rich farmer class; the Dutch Nationalists will doubtless oppose it. Both are opposed to a liberal immigration policy—and so is the present Government. Both are without sympathy for the aspirations of the colored citizen and the native—and so is Smuts. Like England, South Africa appears to be faced with a prospect of a series of elections resulting in minority governments or frail coalitions. A week of South Africa would teach the Prince more than years of steeplechasing.

THE POOR BENIGHTED GREEKS and the oil-rich Persians must be ignorant of the life and works of Charles Hitchcock Sherrill, sometime adjutant general, United States Minister to Argentina, organizer of preparedness parades, and member, according to his autobiography in "Who's Who," of sixteen different clubs. The Greeks and the Persians have abolished the monarchy and, like Turkey and Czecho-Slovakia, become republics. General Sherrill, however, has just written a book, "The Purple or the Red," offering monarchy as the only safe alternative to bolshevism. He has toured the capitals of Europe and Asia, and returned laden with what must be one of the finest collections of royal autographs and photographs in this republic. A goodly selection of them, together with Mussolini's, Primo de Rivera's, and Horthy's, appear in his book, along with scraps of royal conversation, notes on the crown princes, and advice from Mussolini. General Sherrill (who gives himself in "Who's Who" as a Son of the Revolution) thinks republicanism an anachronism. He tolerates it in the United States because "we already have a Dictator—the President of the United States for the term of his office." Yet Greece and Persia, sublimely oblivious of the former United States Ambassador to Argentina, have given up kings. Apparently the only way to restore the prestige of royalty in the Old World would be to ship back selected sons of the American revolutionaries—they seem to be the only real royalists left.

WE SYMPATHIZE WITH President Coolidge's hand; we commend without reserve his refusal any longer to have it manhandled. In fact, we sympathize also with his profile, and see no reason why the crowds in Washington should be allowed to walk up to the railing of his office and gaze at the President as they would at the gorilla John Daniel 2d in the side-show of the circus. The theory that our chief executive should waste his time and his energy shaking hands with miscellaneous sight-seers goes back to the kindergarten days of the republic, and has been too long tolerated because we thought it "democratic" instead of realizing that it was merely asinine. Mr. Roosevelt was the first President with the courage to stop the practice, and it remained stopped—with slight concessions—until Mr. Harding with good intentions but poor judgment revived it. In Europe no prime minister or president ever dreams of fooling away his time letting sight-seers shake his hand.

FORD MAY BREAK OUR BONES with his flivvers, but he should not be allowed to repair them in a hospital whose methods "resemble nothing so much as a garage and repair shop where human machines are overhauled like automobiles." So thinks the Detroit Academy of Surgery, which condemns the new Ford Hospital in Detroit because—among other things—it refuses to take charity patients, because it demands uniform fees instead of the sliding charges by which doctors are accustomed to let the well-to-do help pay for the medical care of the poor, and because the institution refuses to allow any but its own house physicians to treat patients. These are all good reasons, but in the background lurks another which is even better. Obviously in the Ford Hospital control is in the hands of business men, and the physicians have become merely laborers. Our medical societies are among the oldest and strongest labor unions in existence. They preserve to a fine degree the old craft system by which an industry is controlled by its craftsmen, not by investors and business executives. They have a spirit of service and a code of ethics that are almost unmatched in any other walk of life. No, we have no wish to see medicine Fordized—and flivvered.

THE NAUTICAL GAZETTE calls attention to an interesting result of the curtailing of immigration. Leading transatlantic steamship companies are more and more turning to Canadian ports to escape the harassments of our immigration laws and prohibition restrictions. If Canada had a better all-year port than Halifax, some of the lines might even abandon New York. As it is, they are placing some of their finest ships on the Montreal and Quebec runs, and go directly to the public of the United States for support. The short ocean voyage, the fact that Montreal is as easily reached as New York from many places, and the lower fare make a strong appeal. With immigration in America limited to 161,000 annually, it is difficult to see how some of the steamship lines can survive in the New York trade, since until recently the New York liners derived their greatest and steadiest all-the-year-round revenue from the immigrant trade. The tide must turn toward Canada, Mexico, and South America. The Canadian Government pays a passage rebate of $15 to each immigrant, which naturally appeals. Of the twenty-seven ships in the Canadian service the Nautical Gazette reports nineteen as virtually new vessels; eight of them make the voyage in six days. The average speed of the entire fleet has risen in eleven years from thirteen to sixteen knots.

THE AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY met in New York a week or so ago to entertain a major general; only fifty people, "many of them in uniform," attended the dinner. Whereas a couple of years ago the proceedings would have been honored by long accounts with big headlines, the metropolitan dailies either ignored the dinner or gave it a few lines. True, the major general was a singularly dull one who ran true to form in trotting out once more the old attack upon the pacifists by suggesting the disarmament of the police force. Even that old gag would have attracted more space a couple of years ago. No, the interest in our preparedness societies wanes rapidly, and few persons give any signs of being terrified because the Wisconsin Republicans, after reducing their National Guard, demand substantial reductions in appropriations for army and navy. General Pershing, who but a year ago was foreseeing the end of America because Congress would not vote 150,000 men, now reports that the reorganization of the army has been satisfactorily concluded despite the fact that it has only 112,000 soldiers. It is all of good omen, but all peace-loving people ought to concentrate their fire for further reductions in the army and in behalf of Senator Borah's move for a new disarmament conference. The militarist works while you sleep; eternal vigilance is needed.

THE NATION was one of many to comment with enthusiasm on the extraordinary foresight of Benjamin Franklin, who, in 1790, could set aside £100, which was to grow into a fund to reward, at some remote day, scientific research in mind healing and kindred topics. What a man was this Franklin; what prescience—and what thrift! For in 130 years £100 becomes a fortune. In this case it was, so the story ran, a fortune of some thousands of pounds, twenty-five hundred of which were awarded as a prize by "The Franklin Fund" to one Pierson W. Banning for his remarkable book on spiritual healing. It was a beautiful and touching story; but, like many stories as beautiful and touching, it was a fake. There is no "Franklin Fund"; there were no hundred pounds; there was no prize; the only thing that was real about the matter was Mr. Pierson W. Banning, who cooked it all up out of his own head—as he alleges in his confession, to "win a bet." Alas, how terrible are the temptations offered by games of chance. Mr. Banning, by his ingenious publicity scheme probably succeeded in selling a good many copies of his book; he also succeeded in advertising himself perhaps to an unfortunate extent; and since he is discovered to be a member of numerous patriotic societies, and to hold the most extreme views on the restriction of immigration, "Red" hunting, and other patriotic pastimes, his course may cast reflections on the new patriotism, which would, of course, be very, very sad.

IN AN "EASTER MESSAGE" to the Bible class of a New York church, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., said:

Since the great World War it seems to me that emphasis has been put too much on liberty and not enough on responsibility. We hear people talking too much about their rights and not enough about their duty. We read every now and then of strikes in colleges and schools because the pupils want more liberty and rights. In the world of work this tendency has resolved itself into seeking shorter hours and less work as against an honest discharge of full duty.

Yes, gentle reader, he said just that. And then (honest injun) he added his version of the famous line from "The Follies of 9000 B.C.": "Too many people today take liberty for license." All of which, naturally, is platitudinous claptrap, as true now as when we first heard it in our nurse's arms—and it wasn't in the least true then. What a pity there was nobody to tell Mr. Rockefeller that if more people looked out for their rights, there would be fewer duties; that most of the duties of the conscientious and intelligent consist in upholding for others the rights which they are too helpless or ignorant or lazy to maintain for themselves; that there is no duty so sacred in America today as protecting one's rights (and thus, indirectly, everybody's) against the oppressions and exploitations which make it possible for millionaires to be millionaires and for their sons to deliver "Easter messages."

AN INCREASING NUMBER of Americans are coming to object to the way in which our scenery is disfigured with advertising, but there are decided difficulties in devising suitable legislation to prevent it, or in getting it enacted into law. Meanwhile, the National Committee for Restriction of Outdoor Advertising is making promising headway simply by appealing to those responsible for offensive signs to modify or remove them. The committee reports the sympathetic assistance of Herbert Pratt, president of the Standard Oil Company of New York, in taking down objectionable signboards, while other individuals and firms are showing an encouraging willingness to make it possible to see America first instead of having the eye filled only with a panorama of praise for various tires, soaps, and tonics. The voluntary response to public opinion in this country is growing ever greater, and if genuine and widespread feeling can be mobilized in behalf of an uncontaminated supply of scenery we can get a long way without the backing of law.

BEAUTY SPRANG from the sorrow that was Eleonora Duse's life, and it was quite consistent with the fate which had harassed her for sixty-four years that she died, old and ill, in a strange hotel in Pittsburgh—of all places the grimmest and darkest to be the end of beauty. Work of the hardest kind she had known from early childhood; a brutal father dragged her about from one company to another until she was old enough to be betrayed by a worthless lover and husband; poverty was her familiar from the beginning, and at forty she found herself once more deceived in the man she loved. It was evident on this last American tour that she was making a gallant effort to perform the parts she had set herself; she was thin and gray and her custom of using no make-up made her even more ghostly. But when she came on the stage the other actors seemed to take fire from her; without raising her voice or even turning her head she became the most important person there and made the others more important by her presence. Speaking in a strange tongue, she yet spoke a language which even a New York audience, assembled at ten dollars a seat to see the "greatest actress in the world," could understand, for in it life and death and pity and peace spoke and demanded an answer from their listeners.

Anatole France

ANATOLE FRANCE is eighty. It seems as if he had always been eighty, or else had never ceased to be young. No other has managed so perfectly to combine the disillusionment of age with the eagerness of youth. A kind of madness, a blindness to discouraging reality, is usually necessary to the impetuous enthusiasms which move the world. Anatole France is never blind or impassioned; yet from his disillusionment he can emerge, as in the Dreyfus case or since the war, to plead a present issue. Illusion, he knows, is necessary: "I love the truth. I believe that humanity has need of it; but assuredly it has greater need still of the deception which flatters it and consoles it and gives it infinite hope. Without deception it would perish of despair and boredom."

He believes in the power of reason, yet knows reason's limits: "I call him rational who, observing human folly and the disorder of nature, is not so stubborn as to insist that they are order and wisdom; I call him rational who does not try to be so." Yet he knows that "the heart may deceive as well as the mind. Its errors are no less disastrous, and it is harder to escape them because they are so pleasant." "Ignorance," he says, "is the necessary condition, I do not say of happiness, but of existence itself. If we knew everything we could not bear life an hour."

Bibliophile, born—almost—in a bookshop, existing in a world of books, he sees beyond his library:

Those who read many books are as opium-eaters. They live in a dream. The subtle poison which penetrates their brains makes them insensible to the real world and prey to terrible or beautiful fantasies. . . . Books are killing us. We have too many of them, of too many kinds. Men lived for ages without reading anything, and those were the days . . . in which they passed from barbarism to civilization. They were without books, but not without poetry or philosophy; they knew by heart their songs and little catechisms.

In the Middle Ages, this sage remarks, ignorance gave birth to fear; today our wealth of knowledge is leading to a kind of paralysis. Our proud eclectic civilization is doomed. "I believe," he says, "that we shall have no more posterity than the last writers of Latin antiquity, and that the new Europe will be too different from the Europe which is dying under our eyes to care for our arts and our thought." One might expect a mind which can dally cheerfully with the thought of what form of animal life will longest survive into the glacial age when our sun dies—one might expect so cold an intelligence to dwell too calmly in the realm of reason ever to fare forth to battle. Yet Anatole France marched five years ago in the red-flagged parade that moved through the streets of Paris in protest against the acquittal of Jaurès's assassin; he raised his voice for Sacco and Vanzetti in far-off America; he disobeys his doctors to preside at proletarian meetings even today.

Eighty years are nothing to a man whose mind moves in such large cycles. A lifetime is an incident. "What reason have we to believe that man marks the end of the evolution of life on earth? Why suppose that his birth exhausted the creative forces of nature, and that the universal mother of animals and plants, after bearing him, became forever sterile?" We, who live in a smaller world, may confine ourselves to hoping that eighty years of living and thinking have not exhausted the creative genius of Anatole France.

National Decency

THE most discouraging aspect of the Senate's impetuous action upon Japanese exclusion was the blithe unconcern with which this body of our elder statesmen hurled its cobblestone at the glass house of world peace. Four men alone—Senators Colt, McLean, Sterling, and Warren, none, we regret, ranking as progressives—stood out against the mob passion which swept the upper house. Some of the progressive Senators were absent; the others voted with the herd. They did not dream that their act was one of those fitful follies which are the despair of the believer that democracy makes for peace.

The most encouraging aspect of the situation is the valiant demand of the plain people of this country that the President veto the act or that the Congress in conference between the two houses rescind its action. The Federal Council of Churches has taken the lead; business organizations such as the National Council for Foreign Trade have followed, and the President's desk is reported to be heaped high with telegrams and letters demanding a veto.

It is not a question of our national sovereignty that is at stake. It is a question of national decency. We have, unquestionably, a technical right to exclude whom we choose, but there is no need of acting like an excited puppy-dog. Ambassador Hanihara, in discussing the effect of the proposed abrogation of the Gentlemen's Agreement, used the words "grave consequences." This was magnified by alarmists into a "veiled threat." But the grave consequences are already here, as might have been foreseen. We have aroused Japan. The friendly work of the Disarmament Conference is half undone; and the warm current of sympathy between the two peoples, which manifested itself in America's ready response to Japan's need after the earthquake, has turned chill. Of course there is no present threat of war; but the state of mind which easily leads to war has been stimulated by the provocative action of our Congress.

The Japanese Government has frankly recognized the American feeling against large-scale colonization by Asiatics. Japan is not seeking an outlet for its surplus population in the United States. It is not even protesting against the fact of Japanese exclusion. It is asking merely that it be done decently and by mutual agreement; without a slur upon the Japanese people. In the circumstances it would seem easy to draw up a plan that would meet the wishes of both nations. Yet without even consulting Japan, Congress has rushed along the Johnson immigration bill with an exclusion clause which led to official protest from Tokio in advance and has since roused a storm of resentment among the Japanese people. The Johnson bill does not exclude the Japanese by name but through a blanket prohibition against the admission of any "alien ineligible to citizenship" unless such person is (1) a non-immigrant on a temporary visit for pleasure, study, or business; (2) a minister, teacher, or student (or the wife or minor child of a minister or teacher); (3) an immigrant previously lawfully admitted to the United States who is returning from a temporary visit abroad. Thus the provision applies to other Asiatics as well as to the Japanese, but since the Japanese have for sixteen years arranged for their own exclusion, under the terms of the Gentlemen's Agreement, they naturally most resent our sudden slap in the face. Had Congress been willing simply to apply to Japan the quota principle, which is the basis of the Johnson bill, the Japanese would not have been irritated; yet substantially the same end would have been attained, since Japan would have been limited to only 146 immigrants a year!

The Gentlemen's Agreement, under which Japan has voluntarily refused to let members of her laboring classes emigrate to the United States, has worked satisfactorily. As we have lately pointed out, the net increase through immigration of Japanese into continental United States for the years 1909 to 1923, inclusive, was only 8,681. Including Hawaii and other outlying territories, the increase was only 16,096. Thus the Gentlemen's Agreement has amounted almost to exclusion. It has been possible under its terms for Japanese already resident here to bring in their wives, and so the total population has been increased not only by immigration but by the birth of Japanese children in this country, and some Californians are already going so far as to demand that even these American-born children be denied citizenship.

The question today is how the harm wrought by the exclusion clause can best and most speedily be corrected. If public opinion continues to demand a sane and friendly effort to work with Japan in settling a question which actually concerns her as much as it does us, then another if not the present Congress will reopen the issue. This issue will not be settled until it is settled decently.

It is not difficult to find an amicable solution. One way, as we have pointed out, would be to place Japan on a quota basis along with other countries. Her quota would be so small as to satisfy the most rabid Californian fears, while her national dignity and racial pride would not be outraged. Another alternative has been proposed by the National Committee on American Japanese Relations. It is a treaty to replace the Gentlemen's Agreement. Such a course has much to commend it. The Gentlemen's Agreement, while it has worked, was always a makeshift method. There is danger in the tendency of the Department of State to usurp the treaty-ratifying powers of the Senate by making commitments which are in substance treaties but are negotiated under the subterfuge of agreements. The National Committee on American Japanese Relations suggests that the new treaty should follow substantially the lines of the Gentlemen's Agreement, the United States and Japan mutually agreeing to prevent the emigration of skilled or unskilled laborers to each other's territory. The committee would also add provisions extending citizenship to Japanese resident in this country, thereby breaking down most of our discriminatory State laws on the Pacific Coast. This, in the long run, we believe a desirable move, but at the present moment one may doubt the wisdom of tying a proposition sure to arouse so much hostility to the other and more probably popular measure.

In any event the first necessity is for public sentiment to condemn the hasty and petulant action of Congress, demanding in its place a just and sensible solution of a delicate question. That deep-rooted idealism of the American people which believes that this country has a destiny to promote world peace must not be rendered utterly empty and futile.

Europe Breathes

A NEW decency seems to have entered the Franco-German problem with the discussion of the Dawes plan, and Europe breathes more freely. The tone of the ultimatum has, for the moment at least, been abandoned by the Allies, and the Germans, recognizing a sober, scientific effort to solve an intricate problem, have responded accordingly. The Dawes plan has been accepted in principle.

What "acceptance in principle" may turn out to mean in detail is, of course, not yet certain. The Dawes plan marks a revolution in post-war diplomacy and, apparently, Poincaré does not want to give a final verdict upon it until after the elections. Meanwhile he is talking the old language of "guaranties" and "sanctions," which does not fit with the Dawes report. Instead of demanding payment whether possible or not that report studies Germany's capacity to pay, and, instead of seizing and paralyzing the heart of industrial Germany, it accepts the principle that Germany must be treated as an economic whole. If the Allies will accept those principles peace and order may be reestablished in Europe.

"Reestablishment" of "peace and order" is, of course, a limited task. General Dawes and his associates made no attempt to discover immutable principles of social or international justice as such. They took for granted Article 231 of the Treaty of Versailles, which asserts Germany's sole responsibility for the war. They assumed, therefore, that Germany should be made to pay any burden which could be placed upon her. It is an assumption which all Germany, and a growing number of historians outside Germany, reject; but it is the cornerstone of the political structure of Europe today. General Dawes made no attempt to develop a new Fourteen Points of things which ought to be; he regarded his task as to restore, not to create. He accepted the system which he found. If the German ironmasters were forcing their workers to give up the eight-hour and in some places the nine-hour day, and hiring them at rates which before the war would have been termed slaves' wages, that did not concern General Dawes. He found Europe in the hands of financiers, and he conceived his task to be to tell the financiers how they could get Europe back to work. If he succeeds in that it will be much for the moment.

There is some hope in the very fact that the success of the Dawes plan depends so largely upon the financiers. They have a longer and a wider vision than the petty crew of nationalist politicians who have made such a mess of things. If the plan is to succeed the Powers will, for a number of years, be turning to the international financiers for loans, and the financiers will not attempt to float the huge credits required unless they are convinced that the proposed system is economically sound. What they call "economic soundness" may mean a new kind of industrial slavery, but it is at least better than an era of new wars.

There are ingenious devices in the program which mere politicians would never have conceived, such as that providing for deposit of reparation payments, in marks, in a special account in the new gold bank, where they will be controlled by a group of Allied appointees. These gentlemen will then be assigned the interesting task of converting these German marks into Allied currency without depreciating Allied exchange, and if they fall too far behind in their conversions Germany may be granted a reduction.

They may find it difficult to keep up with German payments—and thereby teach the politicians a lesson. Another provision, the operation of which will interest economists, is that providing for an index of prosperity, based upon the total export trade, the increase in population, annual budget, railroad traffic, and consumption of sugar, tobacco, beer, and alcohol. If this index is above the average for a period of years the required payments may be raised. If it falls below they should certainly be reduced.

Ambiguous saving clauses are frequent, rephrasings obviously adopted for political reasons. There is the rub. It is all very well to say today that Germany can pay, with the aid of loans, $250,000,000 the first year; $305,000,000 the second year; $300,000,000 the third year; $437,000,000 the fourth year, and after 1928, $625,000,000 a year. It may be feasible. No one—neither General Dawes nor Chancellor Marx nor M. Poincaré—knows. More is needed than a working basis; there must be a working spirit, a readiness to revise as times change.

Two immediate tests of Allied spirit may be suggested. First, are they willing now—or immediately after the French election—to establish a self-denying ordinance, fixing a maximum total for German payments? The Dawes committee was instructed not to go so far, but if Germany is to give the program the good-will and cooperation which it requires Germans must feel that there is a limit and that they are not slaves for all eternity. Second, are the French willing to abandon their occupation of the Ruhr? The report expressly stipulates that they must give up their separate economic control; will they renounce also the irritating military occupation? If the troops are not there to compel the execution of French economic regulations they can only be a symbol of sheer imperialism, and the French owe it to themselves and to the world to refute that suggestion. Will they?

Meanwhile, the report is a release, a relaxation, a new hope. The problem has not been solved, but a path leading in the right direction has been found.

Byron—Devil's Disciple

IN one respect at least Byron is a failure. A hundred years after his death respectable family newspapers are paying pious tribute to his memory and school-children are forced to read his poems that their minds and hearts may be improved. He who wished above everything else to be terrible is patted complacently on the head, and the reading of "Don Juan," once a thrilling sin, has become a pious duty. He has been dragged against his will into the company of respectable classics.

Wickedness like his has come to seem unimportant and his pose hopelessly old-fashioned. Our modern rebels boast not of immorality but of a super-morality and call themselves saints rather than sinners. It was not so with him. He attacked no standards, and proclaimed his allegiance to no higher ethos, but, accepting in principle the conventional code, he disregarded it and gloried in his conviction of sin. He admitted one praiseworthy trait, the championship of liberty, but that was merely a paradox and he was determined to leave, like his Corsair, a name "linked with one virtue and a thousand crimes." The world merely smiles.

Hardly more than a generation ago children could still be frightened by the mention of his name, and Mrs. Stowe could make two continents gasp with a shocking story of incest. But so quickly did he and his wickedness cease to seem important that when, within the last two or three years, evidence was presented which seemed to prove beyond reasonable doubt the truth of the charge only a few scholars noted the fact. The man, as distinguished from his poetry, had ceased to seem much more important or terrible than the old-fashioned seducer with carefully waxed mustachios. The world had grown wiser; convention and the established order had come to see the feebleness of self-conscious wickedness and learned that the gods of things as they are have to fear not the sinner but the saint. The comfortable people of today quite wisely raise their clamor against those who are Devil's Disciples in the Shavian rather than in the Byronic sense, against the Gandhis and the Lenins, who, far above the theatrical trivialities of wickedness, give society genuine cause to tremble. In the course of a century the world has learned that it is not vice but virtue which has explosive force; and that is no unimportant lesson.

Byron as a person is no longer more important than his poetry. Neither time nor fashion can affect his power as a satirist, or his skill, unrivaled since Pope, in handling the verse form of the eighteenth-century masters. It is all very well for Shaw to exclaim pettishly that you cannot win an argument by simply telling a lie in heroic couplet; the truth is that you very nearly can, and that there is a finality in the neat click at the end of two sonorous lines which gives an unanswerable air that the satirist can hardly afford to do without. Fame awaits the poet who, schooled in "English Bards," can touch off contemporary follies with the picturesque impudence of lines like these:

Whet not your scythe, suppressors of our vice!
Reforming saints, too delicately nice!
By whose decrees, our sinful souls to save,
No Sunday tankards foam, no barbers shave;
And beer undrawn and beards unmown, display
Your holy reverence for the Sabbath-day.

There is something too in the heartiness of his voice from which contemporary poets might learn a more resounding vigor, a passion of more generous sweep, and the courage to tackle major themes. Miss Amy Lowell has recently raised a cry of alarm against the persistently minor strains of our newest poets and their concern only with subtle and esoteric emotions. Finickiness is a crime and Byron was never finicky. Poetry will never again be supremely important until it learns not only how to be subtle and refined but also how, upon the right occasion, to roar, forgetting decorum and sophistication and raising its voice until the rafters ring. And there is no better school of roaring than Byron's. No need where he is concerned to lower the lights and utter his verses in esoteric whispers. The louder he is shouted the better he sounds, and some of our poets might with profit gather together to practice their vocal chords upon him, shouting with all the strength of their lungs and with such exultant passion as they can muster, some glorious bit of ranting like the apostrophe to the storm:

And this is in the night: Most glorious night!
Thou wert not made for slumber! let me be
A sharer in thy fierce and far delight,—
A portion of the tempest and of thee!

Toward the Top of the World

SOMEWHERE up 18,000 feet or so on the snow and granite sides of Everest a party of men are fighting cold and driving sleet and thin-edged winds and utter, unending exhaustion in the hope of reaching the frigid summit of the world. In hourly danger of death they are crawling, gasping, struggling toward—what? A peak, smothered in cloud and blowing snow, surrounded by treacherous cliffs, and bathed in an icy air too thin for human lungs. If they reach that peak alive, they will cling for a moment, perhaps clasp one another's numbed fingers in brief congratulation, perhaps affix some sign to prove their victory, and then grope a slow perilous descent.

Such is man.

The second Everest expedition in the summer of 1922 made its base camp just below a monastery fourteen miles from the mountain. The members of the party went to pay their respects to the Lama, who was also the incarnation of a god. He was wise and charming and dignified. He welcomed the party with ceremony and courtesy, and then began to ask rather searching questions regarding the objects of the expedition. Why should the strangers desire to reach the summit of Mount Everest? Geoffrey Bruce, leader of the party, described his interview in these words:

It was very much easier to answer the Lama than it is to answer inquiries in England. The Tibetan Lama, especially of the better class, is certainly not a materialist. I was fortunately inspired to say that we regarded the whole expedition, and especially our attempt to reach the summit of Everest, as a pilgrimage. . . . These white lies were very well received, as was even my own less excusable one which I uttered to save myself from the dreadful imposition of having to drink Tibetan tea also sufficiently well received. I told the Lama . . . that I had sworn never to touch butter until I had arrived at the summit of Everest. A word about Tibetan tea: . . . It is churned up in a great churn with many other ingredients including salt, niter, and butter, and the butter is nearly invariably rancid. . . .

General Bruce's explanation of the assault on that fortress of ice and stone is as good as any well could be. It is a pilgrimage, and no one should be better fitted to understand its spirit than a Tibetan lama. Certainly sheer materialism, even of the best quality, will crumble and fail in the face of this supreme example of aspiration and effort. If there were only a pot of gold at the top of Everest—or a well of oil! Instead there is something to be found that only an explorer can wholly appreciate, or perhaps a lama.

The chronicle of that second expedition ends:

Our attack upon Mount Everest had failed. The great mountain with its formidable array of defensive weapons had won; but if the body had suffered, the spirit was still whole. Reaching a point whence we obtained our last close view of the great unconquered Goddess Mother of the Snows, Geoffrey Bruce bade his somewhat irreverent adieu with "Just you wait, old thing, you'll be for it soon!"

A verbal understanding of that rather obscure bit of British slang is not necessary to convey its thought and spirit. At this very moment the "old thing" is being assaulted anew by Geoffrey Bruce and his companions—hardy and valiant, foolish and wise, with nothing to goad them to their superhuman struggle but a high heart, and nothing to win but a light one.

New Morals for Old Styles in Ethics

By BERTRAND RUSSELL

IN all ages and nations positive morality has consisted almost wholly of prohibitions of various classes of actions, with the addition of a small number of commands to perform certain other actions. The Jews, for example, prohibited murder and theft, adultery and incest, the eating of pork and seething the kid in its mother's milk. To us the last two precepts may seem less important than the others, but religious Jews have observed them far more scrupulously than what seem to us fundamental principles of morality. South Sea Islanders could imagine nothing more utterly wicked than eating out of a vessel reserved for the use of the chief. My friend Dr. Brogan made a statistical investigation into the ethical valuations of undergraduates in certain American colleges. Most considered Sabbath-breaking more wicked than lying, and extra-conjugal sexual relations more wicked than murder. The Japanese consider disobedience to parents the most atrocious of crimes. I was once at a charming spot on the outskirts of Kioto with several Japanese socialists, men who were among the most advanced thinkers in the country. They told me that a certain well beside which we were standing was a favorite spot for suicides, which were very frequent. When I asked why so many occurred they replied that most were those of young people in love whose parents had forbidden them to marry. To my suggestion that perhaps it would be better if parents had less power they all returned an emphatic negative. To Dr. Brogan's undergraduates this power of Japanese parents to forbid love would seem monstrous, but the similar power of husbands or wives would seem a matter of course. Neither they nor the Japanese would examine the question rationally; both would decide unthinkingly on the basis of moral precepts learned in youth.

When we study in the works of anthropologists the moral precepts which men have considered binding in different times and places we find the most bewildering variety. It is quite obvious to any modern reader that most of these customs are absurd. The Aztecs held that it was a duty to sacrifice and eat enemies captured in war, since otherwise the light of the sun would go out. The Book of Leviticus enjoins that when a married man dies without children his brother shall marry the widow, and the first son born shall count as the dead man's son. The Romans, the Chinese, and many other nations secured a similar result by adoption. This custom originated in ancestor-worship; it was thought that the ghost would make himself a nuisance unless he had descendants (real or putative) to worship him. In India the remarriage of widows is traditionally considered something too horrible to contemplate. Many primitive races feel horror at the thought of marrying anyone belonging to one's own totem, Bertrand Russell's article is the first of a series on modern sex relations and our changing moral standards by a group of writers—scientists, novelists, philosophers, and merely intelligent observers. The second article, by Elsie Clews Parsons, will discuss Changes in Sex Relations.

though there may be only the most distant blood-relationship. After studying these various customs it begins at last to occur to the reader that possibly the customs of his own age and nation are not eternal, divine ordinances, but are susceptible of change, and even, in some respects, of improvement. Books such as Westermarck's "History of Human Marriage" or Müller-Lyer's "Phasen der Liebe," which relate in a scientific spirit the marriage customs that have existed and the reasons which have led to their growth and decay, produce evidence which must convince any rational mind that our own customs are sure to change and that there is no reason to expect a change to be harmful. It thus becomes impossible to cling to the position of many who are earnest advocates of political reform and yet hold that reform in our moral precepts is not needed. Moral precepts, like everything else, can be improved, and the true reformer will be as open-minded in regard to them as in regard to other matters.

Müller-Lyer, from the point of view of family institutions, divides the history of civilization into three periods—the clan period, the family period, and the personal period. Of these the last is only now beginning; the other two are each divided into three stages—early, middle, and late. He shows that sexual and family ethics have at all times been dominated by economic considerations; hunting, pastoral, agricultural, and industrial tribes or nations have each their own special kinds of institutions. Economic causes determine whether a tribe will practice polygamy, polyandry, group marriage, or monogamy, and whether monogamy will be lifelong or dissoluble. Whatever the prevailing practice in a tribe it is thought to be the only one compatible with virtue, and all departures from it are regarded with moral horror. Owing to the force of custom it may take a long time for institutions to adapt themselves to economic circumstances; the process of adaptation may take centuries. Christian sexual ethics, according to this author, belong to the middle-family period; the personal period, now beginning, has not yet been embodied in the laws of most Christian countries, and even the late-family period, since it admits divorce under certain circumstances, involves an ethic to which the church is usually opposed.

Müller-Lyer suggests a general law to the effect that where the state is strong the family is weak and the position of women is good, whereas where the state is weak the family is strong and the position of women is bad. It is of course obvious that where the family is strong the position of women must be bad, and vice versa, but the connection of these with the strength or weakness of the state is less obvious, though probably in the main no less true. Traditional China and Japan afforded good instances. In both the state was much weaker than in modern Europe, the family much stronger, and the position of women much worse. It is true that in modern Japan the state is very strong, yet the family also is strong and the position of women is bad; but this is a transitional condition. The whole tendency in Japan is for the family to grow weaker and the position of women to grow better. This tendency encounters grave difficulties. I met in Japan only one woman who appeared to be what we should consider emancipated in the West—she was charming, beautiful, high-minded, and prepared to make any sacrifice for her principles. After the earthquake in Tokio the officer in charge of the forces concerned in keeping order in the district where she lived seized her and the man with whom she lived in a free union and her twelve-year-old nephew, whom he believed to be her son; he took them to the police station and there murdered them by slow strangulation, taking about ten minutes over each except the boy. In his account of the matter he stated that he had not had much difficulty with the boy, because he had succeeded in making friends with him on the way to the police station. The boy was an American citizen. At the funeral, the remains of all three were seized by armed reactionaries and destroyed, with the passive acquiescence of the police. The question whether the murderer deserved well of his country is now set in schools, half the children answering affirmatively. We have here a dramatic confrontation of middle-family ethics with personal ethics. The officer's views were those of feudalism, which is a middle-family system; his victims' views were those of the nascent personal period. The Japanese state, which belongs to the late-family period, disapproved of both.

The middle-family system involves cruelty and persecution. The indissolubility of marriage results in appalling misery for the wives of drunkards, sadists, and brutes of all kinds, as well as great unhappiness for many men and the unedifying spectacle of daily quarrels for the unfortunate children of ill-assorted couples. It involves also an immense amount of prostitution, with its inevitable consequence of widespread venereal disease. It makes marriage, in most cases, a matter of financial bargain between parents, and virtually proscribes love. It considers sexual intercourse always justifiable within marriage, even if no mutual affection exists. It is impossible to be too thankful that this system is nearly extinct in the Western nations (except France). But it is foolish to pretend that this ideal held by the Catholic church and in some degree by most Protestant churches is a lofty one. It is intolerant, gross, cruel, and hostile to all the best potentialities of human nature. Nothing is gained by continuing to pay lip-service to this musty Moloch.

The American attitude on marriage is curious. America, in the main, does not object to easy divorce laws, and is tolerant of those who avail themselves of them. But it holds that those who live in countries where divorce is difficult or impossible ought to submit to hardships from which Americans are exempt, and deserve to be held up to obloquy if they do not do so. An interesting example of this attitude was afforded by the treatment of Gorki when he visited the United States.

There are two different lines of argument by which it is possible to attack the general belief that there are universal absolute rules of moral conduct, and that any one who infringes them is wicked. One line of argument emerges from the anthropological facts which we have already considered. Broadly speaking the views of the average man on sexual ethics are those appropriate to the economic system existing in the time of his great-grandfather. Morality has varied as economic systems have varied, lagging always about three generations behind. As soon as people realize this they find it impossible to suppose that the particular brand of marriage customs prevailing in their own age and nation represents eternal verities, whereas all earlier and later marriage customs, and all those prevailing in other latitudes and longitudes, are vicious and degraded. This shows that we ought to be prepared for changes in marriage customs, but does not tell us what changes we ought to desire.

The second line of argument is more positive and more important. Popular morality—including that of the churches, though not that of the great mystics—lays down rules of conduct rather than ends of life. The morality that ought to exist would lay down ends of life rather than rules of conduct. Christ says: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; this lays down one of the ends of life. The Decalogue says: "Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath Day"; this lays down a rule of action. Christ's conduct to the woman taken in adultery showed the conflict between love and moral rules. All his priests, down to our own day, have gone directly contrary to his teachings on this point, and have shown themselves invariably willing to cast the first stone. The belief in the importance of rules of conduct is superstitious; what is important is to care for good ends. A good man is a man who cares for the happiness of his relations and friends, and, if possible, for that of mankind in general, or, again, a man who cares for art and science. Whether such a man obeys the moral rules laid down by the Jews thousands of years ago is quite unimportant. Moreover a man may obey all these rules and yet be extremely bad.

Let us take some illustrations. I have a friend, a high-minded man, who has taken part in arduous and dangerous enterprises of great public importance and is almost unbelievably kind in all his private relations. This man has a wife who is a dipsomaniac, who has become imbecile, and has to be kept in an institution. She cannot divorce him because she is imbecile; he cannot divorce her because she affords him no ground for divorce. He does not consider himself morally bound to her and is therefore, from a conventional point of view, a wicked man. On the other hand a man who is perpetually drunk, who kicks his wife when she is pregnant, and begets ten imbecile children, is not generally regarded as particularly wicked. A business man who is generous to all his employees but falls in love with his stenographer is wicked; another who bullies his employees but is faithful to his wife is virtuous. This attitude is rank superstition, and it is high time that it was got rid of.

Sexual morality, freed from superstition, is a simple matter. Fraud and deceit, assault, seduction of persons under age, are proper matters for the criminal law. Relations between adults who are free agents are a private matter, and should not be interfered with either by the law or by public opinion, because no outsider can know whether they are good or bad. When children are involved the state becomes interested to the extent of seeing that they are properly educated and cared for, and it ought to insure that the father does his duty by them in the way of maintenance. But neither the state nor public opinion ought to insist on the parents living together if they are incompatible; the spectacle of parents' quarrels is far worse for children than the separation of the parents could possibly be.

The ideal to be aimed at is not life-long monogamy enforced by legal or social penalties. The ideal to be aimed at is that all sexual intercourse should spring from the free impulse of both parties, based upon mutual inclination and nothing else. At present a woman who sells herself successively to different men is branded as a prostitute, whereas a woman who sells herself for life to one rich man whom she does not love becomes a respected society leader. The one is exactly as bad as the other. The individual should not be condemned in either case; but the institutions producing the individual's action should be condemned equally in both cases. The cramping of love by institutions is one of the major evils of the world. Every person who allows himself to think that an adulterer must be wicked adds his stone to the prison in which the source of poetry and beauty and life is incarcerated by "priests in black gowns."

Perhaps there is not, strictly speaking, any such thing as "scientific" ethics. It is not the province of science to decide on the ends of life. Science can show that an ethic is unscientific, in the sense that it does not minister to any desired end. Science also can show how to bring the interest of the individual into harmony with that of society. We make laws against theft, in order that theft may become contrary to self-interest. We might, on the same ground, make laws to diminish the number of imbecile children born into the world. There is no evidence that existing marriage laws, particularly where they are very strict, serve any social purpose; in this sense we may say that they are unscientific. But to proclaim the ends of life, and make men conscious of their value, is not the business of science; it is the business of the mystic, the artist, and the poet.

Russia, China, and Mr. Hughes

By NATHANIEL PEFFER

YOU would mind the frequent stupidity and insularity of American foreign policy less if their results were confined to ourselves. Why shouldn't we stand responsible for the kind of government we ourselves select? But the results as often as not go beyond our own borders and affect others. Witness recent Russo-Chinese relations.

After long negotiation China and Russia succeeded in reaching an agreement on a treaty of resumption of relations. China recognized the Soviet Government on the one hand and Russia waived extraterritoriality and other special privileges for Russians living in China. Also agreement was reached on the future administration of the Chinese Eastern Railway, the Russian-owned road on Chinese soil, and on other questions at issue. The treaty had been signed by commissioners representing the two countries, who were acting with the full knowledge of their respective governments. Ratification was held to be a matter of routine. Then something happened. China suddenly refused to ratify, Russia became imperious and threatening, negotiations were broken off entirely, and the two countries are back where they were at the beginning.

Why? It is clear that the direct responsibility is China's. But why should China suddenly change its mind at the last minute? The reasons are numerous and mixed, but the principal one is cold feet. And that which more than anything else superinduced the chill, I believe, was the temperature of Mr. Hughes. The State Department may make solemn and official denials of the reports that it formally protested against China's recognition of Russia and it does make them. The State Department's files may be free and doubtless are free from any records showing such protest. But the State Department's conscience is not so easily cleared.

Since the end of the World War it has been evident to all thinking Chinese and unprejudiced foreigners in China that China and Russia must come to a definite renewal of relations based on an entirely new restatement. They are neighbors. Their frontiers are contiguous over a broad stretch of Asia. There are old concessions involved. Russian White Guards, Red Guards, and refugees of no color are on China's territory. There is the Chinese Eastern Railway, the status of which has been indeterminate since the war and cannot be determined until diplomatic relations are reestablished. Furthermore, there has always been a large trade between the two countries, a trade both of them sorely needed, especially after the war.

To America Russian recognition may be an occasion for the exhibition of cant and the play of peanut politics. We are thousands of miles from Russia, our diplomatic relations are casual, our economic interests are not vital and, such as they are, in the main are concerned with oil, financial concessions, and other matters not pleasant to the sensitive nostril. So we can afford to indulge our Red mirages, our infantile propaganda, our ignorance, and our sillinesses. They do us little harm, except in the disesteem they inspire in intelligent Europeans. Not so with the Chinese, however. It is a vital question for them. They have much to gain by recognition and more to lose from Russian hostility. Until Japan loomed large on the political horizon Russia was the most important country in the world to China and the focal point of its foreign relations. This has changed only by a degree since then.

The Russians made approaches to China soon after the armistice. They came with tempting offers. They announced their willingness to cancel the old imperial treaties whereby Russia had wrested concessions and territory from China, and to start afresh on terms of equality. It was the first time such an offer had been made to China since it had become an object of prey to European Powers. China had for the first time also an opportunity to recover part of what it had lost in the period of grab at the end of the nineteenth century. It had everything to gain and nothing to lose.

China was tempted, but it did not fall. It did not resume diplomatic relations with Russia, it did not even negotiate. It did not dare to. The great Powers forbade. They informed China that the opening of discussions with the outlawed Reds would be looked upon with disfavor. China, knowing by experience what diplomatic disfavor entailed, refrained. France, Japan, and Great Britain made themselves heard; so also the United States. Not by any dispatch in writing which inquisitive senatorial eyes might examine, but by a few confidential words spoken in Peking. Chinese cabinet ministers have learned to take hints. Most diplomatic communications to China have been of the kind that is best communicated in hints.

So because it didn't please those countries whose regard for China's welfare has traditionally been shown by their readiness to take pieces of it, China had to forego its advantage. And thus the situation remained until a short time ago. Chinese fear of Europe now is no longer what it used to be. The Powers are too much occupied with one another. Besides, Russia has been admitted to speaking acquaintance with respectable international society. Negotiations were therefore formally opened, culminating in the agreement of a few weeks ago. Then at the last minute China backed out again. While domestic politics and personal jealousies also entered, the determining factor was again the attitude of the foreign Powers.

It is openly charged, not only by Russia, that the countries that intervened were France, Japan, and the United States. France as usual was outspoken. It made a frank protest, based on its claims on the Chinese Eastern Railway, which I shall discuss later. Japan's action is not clear and seems to have been indirectly applied, through factional politics. Japan's desire is to keep Russia and China apart until it is able to come to terms with Russia itself. It can make a better deal that way. Japan, too, has claims on the Chinese Eastern Railway, which runs through Northern Manchuria, next to Japan's Manchurian preserves. One of the primary motives of Japan's now defunct Siberian expedition was to get a lasting hold on the Chinese Eastern. America's part is still less clear and even more indirect, but none the less a factor.

Let it be said at once that it cannot be proved that the United States Government did make formal protest. But there is moral certainty that it made its influence felt just as decisively as if it had. In diplomacy it is not always necessary to put desires into words. The world has had frequent opportunity to learn the American Government's attitude toward Soviet Russia. It has had occasion only recently to learn that Mr. Hughes, outraged by the immoralities of the Bolsheviki who rule Russia, as contradistinguished from the austere virtues of the Government in which he has been a cabinet secretary for three years, will have none of Russian contamination. China is well aware of that. So is Mr. Schurman, the American minister to China. It was not necessary for Mr. Hughes to cable Mr. Schurman that he did not approve of Russia and to tell China so. Nor was it necessary for Mr. Schurman to convey to the Peking Government in writing his knowledge of Mr. Hughes's policy, which would go on Foreign Office records. A conversation at tea, a casual meeting in the Hotel de Pekin, a word through a third person would suffice. It was done in that manner the last time China wanted to recognize Russia. I have seen things done in that manner more than once in Peking. There is more than theoretical ground for saying it was done so this time.

China would be influenced in two ways. First, America is traditionally China's "friend." This friendship may at times appear to be more vocal than active—and Americans are never reticent in reminding Chinese of their benevolence—but it is a tradition and traditions are as potent as realities. China would hesitate to go flatly counter to a known American policy. Second, the present Chinese foreign minister is Dr. Wellington Koo. Dr. Koo was for years Chinese minister to the United States. There is also a tradition that he has miraculous powers that win American favors for China. At any rate, his career is founded on this tradition. He has been able in this way to "sell" himself to China. Nor can it be denied that he does understand American newspaper sentiment and political practice better than any other official Chinese. At any rate, Dr. Koo would hesitate even more to be responsible for any act counter to State Department policies and therefore calculated to make him less persona grata to the Department. And it is known further that before Dr. Koo consented to accept his present portfolio he consulted with Mr. Schurman. He would take a hint easily. I believe he did.

The French on their side have a more tangible form of pressure. They have not yet ratified all the treaties concluded at the Washington Conference, especially the one permitting China to increase its tariff rate by a 2½ per cent. The Chinese sorely need the added revenue and they cannot get it until France agrees. France therefore has a weapon. France's motive is something more than the general policy of ostracizing Russia until the Soviet Government comes to terms on the old loans to the Czarist Government. Principally it is concerned with what is most at stake in Chinese-Russian relations, namely, the Chinese Eastern Railway. This line, the Manchurian link of the Trans-Siberian Railway, was built by the Russians on Chinese territory subsequent to an agreement between the Chinese Government and the Russo-Asiatic Bank, nominally a private Russian enterprise but actually and admittedly the Russian Government. Theoretically also the railway was to be a joint Chinese-Russian enterprise, with a certain voice allowed to the Chinese Government, but actually it was exclusively Russian, the Czarist Government having later appropriated the sovereign right of keeping military guards on the territory through which the road ran.

Russia, of course, had not the money to build the railway. As usual it borrowed from France. On this ground the French now base their claim to disposal of the line or at least to an injunction restraining the Chinese from doing what they wish about it. This is oversimplified, because the French claim is stated in more legal terms, but substantially this is it. The Chinese, of course, hold that the contract on which the line was built was exclusively between themselves and Russia and any separate and coincidental loan agreement between Russia and France was an entirely independent transaction, has nothing whatever to do with the railway, and does not affect China in the least. The original agreement provided that the line would ultimately revert to China and that China could buy it back at a stated period; it made no mention or condition of French mortgages. Nor does anybody impartial pretend to see any legality in the French position or to see anything else than a diplomatic maneuver. But France is a great military Power, China is not and France has a weapon to use.

So the Chinese Eastern Railway remains a dangling prize for the most unscrupulous grabber. Russo-Chinese agreement would settle the status of the road: restore it to a really joint Chinese-Russian administration until China is able to buy it by repaying the cost of construction to Russia. But that is exactly what is not desired by those who have other motives.

While the situation is in a state of flux France has something to bargain off against Moscow, Japan keeps a finger in the North Manchurian pie—and America? Well, observe the recent big American loans to Japan. If Japan could keep a finger in the pie and Japan had big enough obligations to the biggest American banking interests, Japan might be willing or compelled to share the pie. And the Chinese Eastern is the key to more than Northern Manchuria. It also runs through soil rich in natural resources and it can be a terrible sword against Russia in the hands of any more aggressive and militaristic Power than China.

So while we sign Four Power treaties to preserve the peace of the Far East and make lofty talk about emancipating China, we hold China on a short string when it comes to important matters and keep alive all the embers that always have smoldered in the Far East. And none less than America, for all our pious talk. Partly because our "idealism" never blinds us to the main chance, and partly because we have to satisfy our cant about international morality in other and less reactionary nations, and partly because our foreign policy is nearly always provincial and always adolescent.

The Trial of a Communist Bank President

By WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

Moscow, March 10

A FEW months ago Alexander Krasnoschokov could easily have been reckoned among Russia's fifty leading Communists. Behind him was a distinguished record of revolutionary service as president of the Far Eastern Republic during the period of civil war and Japanese intervention. An equally distinguished career, if in a different field, seemed to open up before him in the future. As president of the Commercial and Industrial Bank he had a powerful voice in the financing of the Russian industries. In addition to his work with the bank he was Russian representative of the RAIC, the organization formed under the auspices of the Almagamated Clothing Workers for the purpose of assisting the Russian clothing industry with capital and technical advice, and head of a corporation designed to foster commercial aviation in Russia. At a time when economic reconstruction took precedence over everything else in Russia he seemed to be one of the most vigorous and enterprising of the Russian hozaestvenniki, or industrial administrators.

Today this same Krasnoschokov is a broken man. Removed from his office and sentenced to six years in prison for alleged financial irregularities in connection with the management of the bank, his reputation is blasted and his political career in Russia is irrevocably ended. The story of his fall illustrates quite vividly some of the complex ethical problems that are bound to come up in a country where Communists are attempting to operate a capitalist economic system and where the line between what is prescribed by communism and what is permitted to capitalism is rather faintly drawn.

Last year Krasnoschokov was an example constantly cited by people who were disposed to point out, with sorrow or with malicious joy, the demoralizing effect of the NEP upon the morale of individual Communists. Other hozaestvenniki may have offended equally in the matter of luxurious and extravagant living; but no leading Communist seems to have yielded to the temptations of the flesh quite as frankly and ostentatiously as did Krasnoschokov. His blooded horses, his luxurious summer villa, his elaborate wine parties in the most expensive restaurants of Moscow and Petrograd became matters of common gossip. This style of living would not, perhaps, have excited surprise in the case of an American bank president; but it was obviously inconsistent with the very modest salaries which the Soviet Government pays even its highest officials.

Krasnoschokov's brother, Jacob, was a flourishing building contractor and speculator in Moscow, and carried out many transactions through the Prombank, the institution of which his brother was president. Ugly rumors began to get afloat about the relations between the two brothers. Alexander Krasnoschokov was warned several times against his mode of living by various party organs, but he was confident of his prestige in the highest government circles and dismissed all warnings and remonstrances with contempt.

His fall came with dramatic suddenness. Early in the autumn both he and his brother were arrested by the Gay-Pay-Oo, or political police, and Kubashev, head of the Workers' and Peasants' Inspection, an auditing and supervising body that watches over the various state institutions, declared that serious malpractices had been discovered in the administration of the bank. Several bank employees were also arrested in connection with the case.

After a long interval the trial of the Krasnoschokov brothers and of the four accused bank employees opened on March 4 in the Supreme Court of the republic. The small courtroom was crowded with spectators, for wild rumors about the amount and extent of Krasnoschokov's defalcations had been in circulation ever since his arrest. Indifferent oil paintings of Lenin and Trotzky, the former extremely intense, the latter very fiery, looked down on the scene. On a raised dais at one end of the room sat the chief judge, Solz, a short thick-set man with bushy iron-gray hair. He has a reputation for severity and belongs to the Central Control Committee of the Communist Party. He was flanked by the two assistant judges. One of them, Sakharova, was a woman, a former Petrograd textile worker; and her pale, somewhat ascetic face suggested the quality of steeled, austere fanaticism that one comes to associate with the comparatively few Russian Communist women.

To the left of the judges sat the prosecutor, Krilenko, a slight, wiry man, with tense face muscles and something of the air of a hunter ready to spring upon his prey. "He hates and despises everyone who is not a thoroughgoing Communist," someone whispered, referring to the prosecutor.

The prisoners sat in a row on a bench on the opposite side of the room from Krilenko. Alexander Krasnoschokov, alone among them, had an interesting face. All the others looked like the speculators one sees in Moscow hawking foreign currencies illegally and keeping a watchful eye on the nearest policeman. Krasnoschokov, by contrast, stood out as a personality to be reckoned with. His face, somewhat lined and worn, was strong, shrewd, and thoughtful. His bearing was cool, resolute, self-possessed. He made the impression of an ambitious, intelligent man, suddenly tripped up by what he must have regarded as an unaccountable and unreasonable outburst of fanaticism, but determined to make the best possible fight in his own defense.

Krasnoschokov and Krilenko seemed to embody two different phases of the revolution, the canny practicality of the Nepman pitted against the pure, pitiless, idealistic fanaticism of the earlier period. Russia is steadily being made over more and more in the spirit of Krasnoschokov; but in the courtroom the spirit of the desperate, hungry years of terror and military communism seemed again temporarily in the ascendant.

The case opened with the reading of the indictment by the woman clerk of the court in a dry, uninflected voice. The indictment filled seventy-two typewritten pages; and the reading took two or three hours. From a legalistic standpoint the indictment was a curious document. Charges of favoritism in granting preferential interest rates to his brother's private corporation and of misappropriating small amounts of the bank's funds for his personal use were jumbled up with more or less personal details about what the Russians would call his "broad living," about his revels with gipsies and his dinners with a notorious Moscow gambler.

In the evening Krasnoschokov took the stand in his own defense. He had little difficulty in focusing the attention of the spectators upon his personality and his life story, for both were distinctly out of the ordinary. Born in southern Russia he had gone into the revolutionary movement along with his younger brother, who was hanged in the course of the 1905 revolution. Both brothers at one time fled to America, where Alexander lived for many years, working as a paper-hanger, studying law during his free nights, conducting a labor school in Chicago. Returning to Russia by way of Siberia in 1917, he stopped in Vladivostok and soon became a leading figure in the Far Eastern revolutionary movement. He was president of the Far Eastern Republic and when the intervention came a price was set on his head and he was hunted like a wolf by the Whites and the Japanese. Krasnoschokov availed himself of his revolutionary past in the most skilful and intelligent fashion. He brought out its essential features clearly without wearying the audience with too many details or too much sentimentality. And finally he led up, almost inevitably, to the contrast between his long revolutionary career and the petty financial favors which he was supposed to have shown his brother. "After all those years of struggle and sacrifice would I be likely to be corrupted in such a pitiful manner?" he asked.

As both the prosecution and the defense developed their evidence it became more and more clear that this was not an ordinary case of more corrupt maladministration. The rumors that Krasnoschokov had somehow absconded with hundreds of thousands of dollars were exploded. The dubious transactions with his brother's firm were shown to have involved no actual loss to the bank in the shape of non-payment of obligations, although the prosecution claimed that the bank should have made a few thousand dollars more by charging higher interest rates. Krasnoschokov was also shown to have appropriated for his personal use sums estimated at $10,000, which were designed for other operating expenses of the bank. In view of the disparity between the "broad living" of many other officials and their meager salaries it is difficult to believe that misappropriation of this kind was peculiar to Krasnoschokov. On the other hand, his administration of the bank, as was conceded by the prosecution, had been distinctly successful. During the comparatively short period of its existence the bank had increased its capital many times over, besides earning more than a million dollars of clear profit.

The final duel between prosecution and defense centered largely about the issue whether violations of Communist ethics should be considered legal offenses. "I do not defend my client as a Communist," said Chlenov, Krasnoschokov's eloquent lawyer. "He did not always live up to Communist standards of conduct. But you cannot try a man in a civil court for ethical offenses. For that purpose you have a party code of discipline and party courts."

But Krilenko would not admit this distinction. "Our revolutionary justice erases the distinction between ethics and written law," he declared in his harsh, metallic voice. "Just because Krasnoschokov had such a distinguished revolutionary past, just because the party reposed so much confidence in him, his treason before the party and the soviet power is all the greater."

After five days of exacting examination and cross-examination the case drew to an end on March 8. Early in the evening the judges withdrew to discuss the verdict. Shortly after midnight Krasnoschokov and the other prisoners were brought into the courtroom. The air of cool self-possession which he maintained throughout the trial did not desert him at the end. Smoking a pipe he talked and joked with his companions and his lawyers. But there were times when the conversation flagged and Krasnoschokov looked thoughtfully before him into space. One wondered what occupied his mind in those moments of reflection and suspense. Did he recall the years of obscure exile in America, the thrilling days in the Far East, or the period of intoxicating power and luxury in Moscow?

Perhaps he thought of the Communist Party, that extraordinary, disciplined machine, impersonal as fate, ruthless as an Oriental despot in the pursuit of its aims. The party had raised him to high positions, had given free scope to his energy and organizing talents. Then, just as coolly and deliberately, it hurled him down, when he seemed the logical scapegoat to offer up in order to appease the outcry of the workers and the rank-and-file Communists against the high-living hozaestvenniki. Krasnoschokov must have known the party and its workings too well to have expected mercy after its powerful machinery of destruction had been set in motion against him. At 5:30 in the morning the judges returned and announced their verdict: six years in prison for Krasnoschokov, three years for his brother, lighter sentences for the minor figures in the case.

It was a victory of the stricter, more idealistic Communist spirit over the corrupting tendencies of the NEP. Krasnoschokov had much of the spirit of the hustling, free-living, energetic, unscrupulous entrepreneurs who "developed" America, more or less at the public expense, after the Civil War. His spectacular fall was a plain warning that Russia, even under the NEP, is not reconciled to such excesses of individualism on the part of its captains of industry and finance.

Pictures of "The Patch"

The Picnic

MRS. SWOBODA jerked the washtub hurriedly into a corner. A wing of soapy water flew up in protest, then flapped helplessly to the floor. It was eleven o'clock; she dared not work any longer. She would have to finish Mrs. Clarke's laundry at night.

Anna sang happily through her long, thin nose as she helped her mother with the younger children.

"Today's the picnic, the picnic," she rejoiced over and over again. Anna had been to a club picnic before and all the year she had kept on recalling the happy incidents of it. As she conjured up the magic pictures of grassy hills and boat-rides, wonderful things to eat and exciting games to play, the children's thin, taut bodies would relax and their mean, screwed-up little faces would soften. Her mother's eyes, staring dully through the steam, would brighten with thoughts that were not of dirty clothes. And now they were all going to the picnic together. For a week the small world around the washtub had been garrulous with excitement, making plans for the holiday.

At first Mrs. Swoboda had held sullenly back. What business did folks like them have to think of picnics? But finally the enthusiasm of her children had kindled memories of her own youth—memories of happy times with carefree friends in another country; holidays that meant dancing in the fields. . . . It had all been so long ago it seemed as though this woman whose present life was composed only of babies and work and never-ending fatigue had not even the right to recall those other days. Yet her memory once stirred would not so quickly go back to the long sleep from which it had been roused. She remembered an orchard in the spring, where the happy rays of the morning sun stole among the blossom-crustured branches. And a deep-rooted longing pressed her to see wide spaces of green grass, to see the rich bark of a tree silhouetted against a clear blue sky.

With Joey in her arms and Marushka running at her side, she hurried after Anna, who had taken the two boys ahead with her. Finally, breaking into a half run, she dragged Marushka, hanging limply by one arm like a rag doll, until she was able to draw her tiny feet up under her again and catch her step.

Around the corner a happy crowd would be gathered; automobiles would be waiting; she would sit down and rest. Her nerves, stretched ready to snap, were crying out for that relaxation.

Around the corner, in the middle of the sidewalk, stood Anna, her lips drawn back from her big teeth in blank stupidity, her bulging eyes swimming in the tears that were still too surprised to drop. Franek stood staring down the empty street contemplating the enigma with the wide eyes of a clay image.

Andrew, catching sight of his mother rounding the corner, ran to meet her with the accusation that was as fierce as his sobbing would permit: "They're gone, they're all gone already. You're always slow like that," he cried bitterly.

The pain in the boy's face caused the roots of her hair to freeze before his words had conveyed their awful meaning to her brain. She longed to gather her unhappy children in her arms and cry with them—cry in protest to that small strip of vibrant blue that smiled down on their disappointment.

The baby twisted fitfully in her arms and Marushka's thin voice rose in a sudden wail. Riveting the baby against her breast with a tense arm, she leaned over and with the back of her free hand struck sharply at the small wet face at her side. "Keep still," she commanded, her own voice sharpened by the sense of her futility.

"It's all your fault," Andrew dared, and the feverish light in his eyes pierced their mist as the morning sun pierces the dew. He dropped his head to the protection of a lifted shoulder as his mother took a quick step toward him, but it was an unnecessary precaution. Her hand fell back before it was half raised.

"Yes, picnics, picnics," she muttered, and grasping Marushka's reluctant arm she trudged back toward home.

At the corner she stopped a moment and glanced back. Those were her children standing there round-shouldered and dejected beside the blank windows of the club, their eyes fastened apathetically on the far end of the deserted street. Two tears hesitated a moment in the dark hollows above her cheekbones. She shook them down with a jerk of her gaunt head.

Across the street a well dressed woman, obviously alien to the Patch, attracted by the sobbing of Marushka, stopped to stare at the old-young mother who could remain so indifferent to a child's breaking heart.

Mrs. Swoboda became suddenly aware of the gaze of scorn trained on her. All the bitterness, all the resentment that had struggled, inarticulate, within her, now flowed into the clenching of a fist that she shook at the frightened woman. Then, as if she had in some measure settled her score with society, she took the child's hand again and hurried home to her washtub.

Americanization

Faces, sounds, gestures, all floated in an eerie mist before her frightened eyes. This was the court, this the day that would perhaps take the food from the mouths of her children. Her body was so tense that the blood pounded in her constricted veins.

The judge was talking in a thick monotonous voice, and she could not keep her mind on what he was saying. In her brain were burning the words of the Official Notice: "Unless you take out your second citizenship papers by March 17, 1919, your widow's pension will be discontinued."

It had not been easy to keep up her family on the pittance she had received; yet what would happen to them without it? It all depended upon her now. She remembered Franek's pinched, earnest face as, night after night, he had helped her hold a pen and make impossible curving, twisting marks—his childish words of encouragement during the nerve-racking task of tracing a signature. Her heart sickened at the memory of the grotesque lines that writhed in the darkness of sleepless nights.

If only the judge would give her the pen now and let her put them on paper, the whole thing would be over.

He had stopped talking. He was waiting for her to say something.

"Who was the first President of the United States?" he repeated in an irritated tone.

She could see Franek watching her anxiously. The muscles in her throat tightened—a half laugh, half cry tore itself from her pale lips and a leering blackness rose to embrace her. . . .

The Boss-Lady

"It's my paper an' you gotta give it to me," Helen pulled irritably at the bent forms stooping over her newspaper. But the gossipers on the bakery stairs continued to gaze fascinated at the picture of the woman they all knew.

"It stands in this paper that she only killed twelve."

"In our paper it stands twenty."

"No, it don't. Twelve only are killed yet, the rest are still sick."

"Gee, I'd be afraid to kill so many people."

"You-gotta-give-me-my-paper," cried Helen, this time emphasizing her demand with a few nervous punches at the maddening calico backs.

"Here, Stingy, take your old paper. Here comes Ginka anyways. She knows all about it because it's her Boss-Lady."

The cramped knot of girls untangled as if by magic, and formed a flying line to the slight figure coming toward them.

"Of course she's our Boss-Lady," this with a proud head held high. "Gee wiz, we lived in her house this is the second year already. She's rich. She's got two properties; but my Ma don't care, she don't like her anyways."

Eager faces were strained to catch the precious words that fell from the lips of one so closely connected with "her."

Ginka's eyes glistened and she drew a deep breath as she prepared to toss out an unexpected pearl.

"Yes, an' I seen her cousin lots o' times too." While an exclamation of surprise went the rounds, she took another deep breath and summed up her material. "How b-e-w-diful is she, and such a nice house has she got—everything crocheted, the bedspreads 'n' everything. She had somebody to do all her work for her. She didn't do nothin' but crochet all day. She had to move all the time though. Every time she killed a husband then she moved in another street and got another one."

"Your Boss-Lady killed only one husband, though, didn't she?" Helen interrupted, feeling it her duty to bring the conversation back to the lady who was beginning to be overshadowed by her more illustrious cousin.

"Yeah, but our Boss-Lady ain't pretty; everybody laughs on her. Her new husband called all kinda names on her in the yard; he's so mean; an' she was sorry then why she killed the first one fer him. He was such a nice man. The kids didn't have to steal when he was livin'—not so much. An' how bad did she treat him! Even ammonia she gave him when he was sick already from the poison."

"Did you see the p'lice come to fetch her?"

"Naw, she wasn't home; she went to work right away. But they took my brother from the yard to show where she was workin'. They took her without no coat, and so dirty—when she was eatin' just."

Here Ginka's small nose wrinkled up and she sniffed her disapproval of such impropriety.

"The whole yard went to the trial; but her children don't care is she gonna hang or not. Martin found some money in her mattress and now he's paintin' the house like new, and Anna, the oldest girl, she takes the rents."

"Do yuh think they're gonna hang her?"

"Naw," she smiled indulgently at such ignorance. "Naw, they can't hang her. There is such a law in this country that you can't hang ladies, only men. But just the same, my Ma thinks they ought to hang her. My Ma says it's terrible to kill yer husband with rat poison."

Earnest faces, impressed for the first time with the gravity of the crime, nodded solemn assent. Then suddenly the jarring clang of the near-by bells sent the young jury flying home with its breakfast rolls.

The Church Bells

The priest's servant gave her a chair. The priest himself would not be down until four. Mrs. Habina clasped a small purse in her cold red hands. Dry-eyed she sat and thought.

Now that Julie was dead she would have to work nights again, but all the money that she had had in the mattress she had used to give Julie a nice funeral. She looked like an angel in her white satin dress and flowers on the coffin. Everything had been arranged already—everything but the church bells. In the excitement Mrs. Habina had forgotten to allow for them. . . .

As she groped her way down the dim hall, hot tears charred her sight. The priest's words ached in her brain.

"Five dollars to walk beside the coffin to church, and one dollar a ring for the bells."

She had counted the money many times—just one dollar and forty-eight cents left. No priest to walk beside Julie's coffin to the church—and the bells—a sob caught in her throat. One whole ring and one short one was all he could give her.

Anelka

Anelka lay crumpled up in a little heap in the alley. She sobbed bitterly. A dull pain was eating its way through her foot. She dared not look to see what had happened. With a vile curse the teamster had given one glance over his shoulder and driven on.

Jimmy had run screaming for her mother.

"Anelka's runned over, Anelka's runned over."

Anelka pictured the look of anguish on her mother's face and a warm satisfaction flowed into her aching heart. Her mother scarcely had time for showing much tenderness. What she had she gave to Antziu, the youngest of the seven.

She was in her mother's arms now. Her mother did love her—she had kissed her forehead. Anelka clung tightly to the thin neck.

"Really I'm sick this time, Mamasha," she pleaded. "Will you take me in the feather-bed with you?"

Is It McAdieu?

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

SOME say it is. They hope so, and they like their joke. Disposing of McAdoo, however, turns out to require more than jocularly.

Out in the noble region west of the Mississippi, where the freshest and most healing and saving political thoughts are supposed to grow, and down south of the Potomac, where the party of local self-government pants to pay for Georgia roads with federal tax receipts, the name of McAdoo will not down. It rises, it spreads. When the party of federal income taxes arrives in New York in Jefferson's name and proceeds to nominate a hero to combat the Hamiltonian Republicans, who revere Hamilton for starting a nationally owned bank and who say that it is contrary to their principles to let the government go into any business, it will be found that the overwhelming mass of Democratic delegates from the trans-Mississippi West and from the sub-Potomac South will be for McAdoo.

McAdoo then will confront, as the champion of the Western farm and ranch and of the Southern plantation and of the railroad workers who carry the glad tidings of his virtues from roundhouse to roundhouse throughout the country, a whole long line of formidable antagonists stretched almost arm in arm from the Mississippi eastward to the Hudson.

In Illinois there is William E. Dever—a Catholic but in practice, as Mayor of Chicago, a dry. George Brennan, skilful and aspiring Democratic boss of Illinois, thinks that something might be made presidentially out of a dry Catholic. If it is not accomplished presidentially, he then perhaps hopes that it might be accomplished vice-presidentially. It would not be beyond George Brennan to imagine a combination between a Southern Protestant for President and a Northern Catholic for Vice-President, thus boldly recognizing the two opposing elements which constitute the twin pillars of the temple of the jangling harmony of his party. He could imagine "Harrison of Mississippi and Dever of Illinois."

Eastward from Illinois, in Indiana, there is good old Uncle Sam Ralston, the epitome of an Indiana small town as exactly and as completely as Calvin Coolidge is the epitome of a Vermont small town. Tom Taggart, experienced and versatile Democratic boss of Indiana, says that Uncle Sam Ralston is abundantly physically able, in spite of his years, to fulfil the duties of the Presidency—an opinion in which this writer readily concurs, provided Mr. Ralston adopts the bold and strange expedient of confining himself to the duties of the Presidency and avoids the idea that the American President exists in order to do the work of everybody else in Washington and in the country and in the world.

Mr. Ralston has a geographical location to which nobody can take exception and he has a temperament with which hardly anybody has ever picked a quarrel. He is the Abou ben Adhem among the Democratic candidates. He loves his fellow-man, and it happens additionally that his fellow-man loves him, and it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that the Democratic convention in New York may finally reach a presidential decision based on the fact that nobody has anything against Indiana geographically and nobody has anything against Ralston personally.

At this point, and before proceeding farther eastward, it is to be noted that just as Dever in Illinois has been a prohibition law-enforcement mayor of Chicago, so in Indiana Tom Taggart, the boss, and Samuel Ralston, the candidate, are agreed on the proposition that prohibition law enforcement should and must occur. In other words, the Democratic machine of Illinois and the Democratic machine of Indiana are both committed to the prohibition law-enforcement cause.

This sets up a certain bond in principle between them and the Western and Southern dry—and ever drier—forces of William Gibbs McAdoo. Moreover, it is well known that in fact George Brennan of Illinois has a perfectly open mind on the subject of presidential candidates. He likes Dever, but if he cannot get Dever into the ticket, he is fancy-free. At any rate, almost all close observers of him say so; and, as a hasty observer of him, this writer agrees on this point with those who have made longer voyages across the wide waters of Brennan's amazing political experience and intelligence.

Brennan, being geographically on the border-line between McAdoo territory and anti-McAdoo territory, and being associated with a Chicago administration which has tried to make Chicago dry, and being potentially and ultimately without any passions or prejudices whatsoever regarding the final Democratic presidential and vice-presidential ticket, may turn out to be the pivotal person in the necessary concluding negotiations between the South and the West on the one hand and the East on the other.

Leaving Indiana in the direction of the Atlantic seaboard, one immediately arrives in Dayton, Ohio, and in the printing-shop of a local newspaper publisher, James M. Cox, who three times was Governor of Ohio and who once ran for President on the Democratic ticket and seems quite resolute to do it twice. Mr. Cox has a printing-shop, which for modernity and beauty of mechanical equipment is not excelled anywhere in the world; and he still has a lot of money left after building that shop; and he is quite strong with the laboring masses on his record as Governor; and he pines to do good to the whole world in the sacrificial footsteps of Woodrow Wilson. He is a candidate by no means to be contemned.

Eastward from Ohio in West Virginia there is John W. Davis, who is amazingly able but who is engaged in practicing law successfully and therefore earning money off the wealthy. This does for him.

In Pennsylvania there naturally is nobody; since under our American political system a Julius Caesar combined into one person with a William Pitt could live in the hopelessly Republican State of Pennsylvania, and if he were a Democrat he would never be the recipient of a single thought from anybody anywhere in search of a savior for the republic.

In New York there is Al Smith, endowed with a larger appeal of political personal charm than any other man in America, but a Catholic and—and—a wet. His chances to be important in the convention are enormous. His chances to get the nomination, unless Taggart and Brennan change their minds about dryness versus wetness, are small.

Meanwhile, south of the Potomac, there is Underwood of Alabama, the most nationally experienced and the best nationally trained candidate of the whole lot but profoundly distrusted and disliked by the McAdoo "progressives" for being, as they think, anti-progressive and, more specifically, anti-labor.

McAdoo will have more than one-third of the total number of delegate votes in the convention. The Central and Eastern candidates and the Central and Eastern bosses from the Mississippi to the Hudson will have more than one-third of the delegate votes. The McAdoo forces think they can get a majority of the votes and then start a stampede and get the two-thirds necessary for a nomination. If they fail in this attempt, then negotiations will be necessary between them on the one hand and Brennan and Taggart and Murphy on the other.

In these negotiations it seems incredible that the McAdoo forces could ever consent to accept Underwood or Davis, the conservatives, or Smith the wet. Bad blood has also arisen between the McAdoo forces and Dever and additionally between the McAdoo forces and Cox in the course of bitter primary election contests for presidential delegates in Illinois and in Ohio.

In Indiana there was no contest. The McAdoo forces conceded the Indiana delegation to good old Uncle Sam Ralston. Once more Mr. Ralston escaped the acrimony and the retribution of a quarrel.

The upshot accordingly is that at this moment McAdoo is so far from being McAdieu that he is the leading and outstanding candidate. The upshot further is that at this moment, if McAdoo cannot be put across, the candidate against whom everybody has least is Ralston of Indiana.

The dope-sheet would say McAdoo or Ralston. Tomorrow morning the dope-sheet may be totally upset by some sudden change in performance during exercise or by some sudden new entry.

In the Driftway

TO be a member of the timider or masculine sex has its advantages, as many a mild man has noted with rejoicing. But those advantages stand out more clearly than ever to the Drifter since he received a letter from a Texas widow, fifty-five years old, with whom the Ku Klux Klan is displeased. The lady's offense is not particularly heinous; she wants to live by herself on her own land. But the Klan thinks it improper for a woman to live alone; as a consequence she is harassed by petty inconveniences, she finds it difficult to borrow money although her security is good. In short, she should have been born a man; then no one would have objected if she—or he—had wanted to live alone; she—or he—might even have become a member of the Klan, and could have ridden about the country in a white night-gown without fear and without reproach.

* * * * *

IN spite of the new freedom for women which is being celebrated on every hand, there are still a good many things a woman cannot do, at least without protest. The Drifter will not be a traitor to the male sex by suggesting that jealousy or fear of competition or plain bad temper is at the bottom of these prohibitions. He rather thinks that paternalism in its sugariest and kindest aspects must bear the blame. Two hale, competent, and muscular young women of his acquaintance wished lately to make a trip to the country which would involve some use of hammer and saw, some motoring through bad roads, some sleeping in a large and but for them empty house. Their husbands, whom they had not invited on the expedition, were extremely dubious about it. Would they not hammer their thumbs? Would they not get stuck in the mud? Might they not tremble and blanch at the thought of a lonely country house, once dark had fallen, with the nearest strong man a mile away? The Drifter, who does not believe in interfering between husband and wife, refrained from comment. He knew that the trip would be carried through as originally planned, and he knew also that if any thumbs were hammered, no one but their owners would be the wiser. Two boys would have been sent on their way without a qualm. Woman has still to fortify her position in many places.

* * * * *

IT is evident, of course, that the chief enemy of woman's new freedom is woman. So many women prefer the shackles which bind them to a life of leisure. Lest the Drifter, by that last remark, bring down on his head a torrent of reproach, he hastens to say that he does not mean any of the women of his acquaintance. But there are women, somewhere, doubtless far away, who like to have their meals paid for or their clothes bought or the landlord or taxi-driver settled with by someone other than themselves. They would rather play bridge or go to luncheons than go to work for a salary. Their housekeeping and child-keeping duties have been halved and quartered by servants and electricity; most of the day is theirs. They do not spend it in gainful occupations, not because they could not find something to do, but because they would really rather not. And the Drifter is the last man to blame them; he hereby offers forthwith to renounce a life of toil if any man will be so good as to provide him a living. He will not, however, promise to play bridge in his spare time; he imagines instead that a ship or a hill or an alien sea or a strange city will prove a more irresistible attraction. And in that case, the gains would all be his instead of accruing partly to his patron.

THE DRIFTER

Spring Thunder

By MARK VAN DOREN

Listen. The wind is still,
And far away in the night—
See! The uplands fill
With a running light.

Open the doors. It is warm,
And where the sky was clear—
Look! The head of a storm
That marches here!

Come under the trembling hedge—
Fast, although you fumble. . . .
There! Did you hear the edge
Of winter crumble?

Correspondence

A Protest from Virginia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have a copy of The Nation of April 9, 1924, and am interested in your comments on the Virginia law for racial integrity.

You evidently did not discuss this subject from the viewpoint of one who is in the midst of the fray and who sees hourly the results of the condition which this law contemplates combating.

It is an unfortunate condition that the people of the North cannot see the thing in its true light. Until that time arrives the Southern people are compelled to handle the situation as best they can, even with the discouragement which we receive from our brethren of the North.

Our law preventing these near-white people securing marriage licenses is about the best that we are able to do at this time, until the country as a whole realizes the seriousness of the situation. Unfortunately we cannot handle the matter with the same vigor and firmness that they are doing in Australia.

The Ku Klux Klan Viewed from Moscow

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One gains a new perspective on American views here in Moscow. As for instance:

William Joseph Simmons, Emperor and Founder of the Ku Klux Klan, has disposed of his right, title, and interest in the "invisible empire" and renounced his monthly annuity of $1,000 for a consideration of $145,500 in cash, it was announced today by Paul Etheridge, Imperial Klonsel and Chief of Staff to Hiram Wesley Evans, the Imperial Wizard.

This most amazing sentence, which might seem a trifle hyperbolic in one of Mr. Mencken's exuberant burlesques, stares me in the face at the beginning of a perfectly serious and presumably authentic Associated Press clipping. Reading through the clipping I discover the following interesting facts: The compact between the two potentates, Simmons and Evans, has been ratified by no less an organization than the Imperial Klonselium. The dethroned Emperor, searching, like Alexander, for new worlds to conquer, has gone off to establish an order of Knights of the Flaming Sword, with himself as head. The Imperial Wizard has inaugurated his reign by declaring that "the official second degree of the order will be given to all Klansmen in good standing without additional charge." A citizen of our democratic republic who gives himself the imposing title of Grand Dragon of the Realm of Arkansas announces that the Imperial Wizard, apparently hoping to recover his $145,500 with interest, is prepared to sue the ex-Emperor for $150,000, on the ground of libel.

This sort of thing may have become too much a matter of course to excite any special surprise or amusement in America; but to Americans who have lived abroad for some time it suggests the distressing possibility that a number of their fellow-citizens have been suddenly stricken with insanity.

The Nation has recently been carrying on a symposium on the subject of Progressivism. I should like to suggest that the Klan seems to offer an equally promising field for popular discussion, which might throw light on the following questions:

1. How can the widespread popularity of an organization like the Klan, in which rascality and imbecility seem to be mingled in about equal measure, be reconciled with the widely held conviction that America is a cultured and civilized nation?

2. What extraordinary complex of political, economic, religious, and pathological factors helped to bring the Klan into existence and to extend its influence until it constitutes a serious power in the elections of perhaps a dozen States?

3. Just what does the Klan show about the quality of American education?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Six weeks or so ago some American newspaper men went on a naval "junket" to Haiti for the purpose of investigating conditions in the island. The Haitians, not knowing anything about their intended visit, could not send a committee to welcome them and take them around to see the havoc the American occupation has wrought. They were, instead, ciceroned by the very officers at whose hands we have suffered so much, and who have shed Haitian blood in such profusion. There is no need of telling you that the journalists were not shown what would have provoked the ire of the American people—in whose name so many crimes have been committed.

The day the journalists were to visit the prison, Messrs. Jolibois fils, Elie Guérin, Antoine Pierre-Paul, Georges Petit, Savain, and Lemaire were locked in their cells so that they could not talk to them. On noticing that locked door, one of the visitors asked who the prisoners behind it were. General MacDougall and Lieutenant Johnson, who were showing them around, answered: "They are politicians who during the war took up arms in favor of the Germans."

Mr. Pierre-Paul, who understands and speaks English, heard the conversation, and realizing what it was all about, yelled out: "It's a lie! Come over here, journalist, come over here, and we will tell you all about our crimes." The reporter then went nearer, and with the door between them, Mr. Pierre-Paul told him how, for having denounced in the Courrier Haitien and other papers the misdeeds and exactions of all kinds of the occupations, they were thrown in jail over six months ago.

After the reporters left Lieutenant Johnson, enraged, beat the prisoners and exposed them naked in the yard of the prison under the hot, tropical sun. How long is the Washington Government going to allow its representatives to treat the Haitians in such a barbarous and uncivilized way?

Higher Education in California

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As the Regents of our University of California go about the State preceded by their President, accompanied by the Governor, eulogized by their Dean of Deans, feted by the Director of their Southern Branch, and reported by our admiring press, some of us suddenly think of our professors and students, then of our school teachers and their tender charges, and finally of our Ambrose Bierce's poem Arbor Day:

Hasten, children, black and white,
Celebrate the yearly rite.
Every pupil plant a tree;
It will grow some day to be,
Big and strong enough to bear
A School Director hanging there.

However, with the university's new million-and-a-quarter-dollar stadium as the goal of every young eye in California, we fear that our great satirist's lines, even when sung into them, will fill unheeding ears.

Autocracy to Left and Right

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With your recent comment on President Gompers's high-handed autocracy in forcing the Bookkeepers, Stenographers, and Accountants Union of New York to suspend a member for the sole offense of belonging to the Workers Party, I am in entire agreement. It was the sort of act which discredits the principles and imperils the success of the American labor movement.

But when I read the Daily Worker's comment on the same event, ending in a rebuke of Mr. Gompers as "dictator and coward," I am compelled to remember that it was the left wing which introduced into the labor movement the glorification of the notion of dictatorship and the capture of power by any means which may work. That is the pity of the present situation. The minority of the left preaches dictatorship, and many officials of the right practice it. The situation calls for a finer interpretation of fair play inside labor-union ranks.

In the particular case under discussion, the B. S. and A. U. is courageously undertaking a vigorous campaign of organization in a very important and difficult field, and it is to be hoped that the dependence of the union upon the executive committee of the A. F. of L. will not divert its energies into mere heresy hunting.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Certain of your readers have suggested that the Saul S. Grabow of my article Within the Law of Tooth and Claw in your February 20 issue was a stage name for an official of the Portage Lake Hardware Company of Houghton, Michigan.

Emphatically I exonerate all officials of the Portage Lake Hardware Company from any role in that charming drama of the North.

Books

A Nation Indicted

The Revolution in Ireland, 1906-1923. By W. Alison Phillips. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.

IT is possible that Mr. Alison Phillips really believes his book to be, as he says, "history, not propaganda," but if he deceives himself he is unlikely to deceive anyone with a rudimentary knowledge of Irish affairs from the Easter Rising to the creation of the Free State. Burke confessed his inability to draw up an indictment against a nation. Mr. Alison Phillips recognizes no such limitation of his powers. He places in the pillory not one nation but three. Ireland is damned for demanding her freedom; Great Britain is dishonored for consenting to make terms; the United States is relegated to outer darkness for its "blundering interference" and "ill-informed clamor." I am reminded of Grattan's comment on that Protestant hero, Dr. Duignenan. "His speech consists of four parts," said Grattan, "invective against the religion of the Catholics, invective against the present generation, invective against the past, invective against the future. Here the limits of creation interposed and stopped him."

To a certain extent Mr. Alison Phillips, I admit, disarms criticism by confessing his bias, though one would be more impressed had he made any real efforts to counteract it. While it is not yet possible to write a complete history of the Sinn Fein campaign to overthrow British rule in Ireland, its main outlines offer no real difficulty. Unfortunately, the bias of Mr. Alison Phillips colors not merely his general conclusions but his presentation of facts, with the result that the reader lays down this volume in a state of sheer bewilderment. If the narrative is correct, all that happened in Ireland was an explosion of savagery on the part of a primitive people whose religious and political emotionalism rendered unavailing any appeal to logic or reason. Irish lack of logic, it is interesting to discover, found its most characteristic expression in the crusade against conscription. Apparently only a double dose of original sin could explain the monstrous demand of Sinn Fein that before going out to kill and be killed by Germans, in order to secure the right of nations, small as well as great, to shape their own destinies, England should give a proof of the sincerity of her professions by practicing them in Ireland. Downing Street's belated discovery that acceptance of the principle of self-determination made Irish conscription impossible is denounced as "the beginning of the moral rot in the Unionist ranks which was to end in the disgraceful capitulation of 1921."

Mr. Alison Phillips asserts, as if the matter were beyond doubt, that responsibility for abandoning political agitation in favor of an appeal to force rests with the Irish leaders. Yet in the years that followed 1916 Griffith and his colleagues strained their authority almost to the breaking-point to keep the struggle on the plane of passive resistance, and it was Dublin Castle which maneuvered to precipitate another revolt by raids, arrests, and general military terrorism. The weak point in Griffith's plan was that he overlooked the fact that his opponents, when it seemed good to them, could throw the sword into the scales. The Castle, on the other hand, convinced itself that the worst it had to fear was a repetition of the Easter Rising which could be smashed in a few days, and was wholly unprepared for the guerrilla campaign of the I. R. A. Inevitably in a struggle of this kind hideous and indefensible things are done by all sides. Had Mr. Alison Phillips argued that the demoralization which must follow a war of ambushes by flying columns would offset any political advantage that might accrue I feel he could have made a strong case. Unfortunately for himself he refuses to deal with facts on their merits. All his ingenuity is directed toward explaining away the excesses of drilled and disciplined Crown forces on the ground that they were tried beyond their strength, while at the same time he insists that no allowances should be made for untrained country lads fighting with ropes about their necks.

It cannot be denied that the conflict in its later stages degenerated into what Judge Bodkin described as a "competition in crime." Auxiliaries and Black-and-Tans visited the sins of the I. R. A. on the heads of the civil population; the I. R. A. in revenge made scapegoats of the Unionists in various areas, while lawless elements, owing allegiance to neither side, profited by the confusion to fill their pockets at the expense of all who had anything to lose. Mr. Alison Phillips has no doubt that the troubles of the Free State are retribution for the deeds of Sinn Fein, but the whole pith of his argument is that the failure of British statesmen to persist in what he describes as a policy of "cruelty well applied" so far from counting to them as virtue exposed their country to abject humiliation. If one accepts the view that England's dominant interest in Ireland was to buttress up a system under which a Unionist minority had it in its power to veto the demands of the Irish people, there is some foundation for the charge that the treaty was a betrayal. But Mr. Alison Phillips admits that the Free State has not pursued a vendetta against Southern loyalists on the grounds of either politics or religion, and he sees in its policy the dawn of a new life, "when in Ireland there will be no longer Protestants and Catholics, but only Irishmen."

It is difficult to understand how a trained historian could be guilty of the errors and perversions of fact which mar this book. Mr. Alison Phillips denies that there is any proof that the Auxiliaries burned Cork, though the evidence in support of the charge is overwhelming. But he insists on the evidence of an unpublished government memorandum that Lord Mayor MacCurtain was murdered not by the police but by the I. R. A. He does not even refer to the indictment preferred by General Crozier against the acquiescence of Dublin Castle in the lawless excesses of the Auxiliary Corps, and his pages contain no mention of the Trim scandal in which police cadets dismissed for looting were reinstated in spite of the protests of their superior officer. He palliates the Balbriggan massacre on the ground that "fear will open the lips that fear has sealed," and also that only the houses of known Sinn Feiners were destroyed, though the first act of the uniformed incendiaries was to burn down the hosiery factory which was the property of an English firm. "The Revolution in Ireland" is a perfect example of how even with a professional student of history when party passions come in at the door detachment and accuracy fly out of the window.

The Decadence of Wonder

The Life of Mrs. Humphry Ward. By Janet Rose Trevelyan. Dodd, Mead and Company. $5.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD played a conspicuous part in the decadence of wonder. In 1851, when she was born, knighthood, in a literary sense, was still in flower. Tennyson, Browning, and Carlyle, and all the other nostalgic Victorians who opposed the Time-Spirit, had not yet made their impression. Childe Harold set the fashion for the young men whose hearts were ever bleeding in public. Religion was most vital and characteristic when most medieval and romantic.

But "nous avons changé tout cela." Mrs. Ward died in 1920. Then the romantics were shrouded in a twilight as impenetrable as that of the Teuton gods. If Mrs. Ward did not cause this spiritual revolution, she at least mirrored its changes, particularly through the last quarter of the nineteenth century—as her daughter and biographer, Janet Rose Trevelyan, demonstrates—with a fidelity which caught precisely the note of the times.

It is easy to understand why. She was an Arnold. It was natural, almost inevitable, that the granddaughter of Dr. Thomas Arnold of Rugby, the niece of Matthew Arnold, and the daughter of Professor Thomas Arnold, "a sentimental ideal-ist by nature," should find herself hoist between the Thirty-nine Articles and the higher criticism. It was as significant of the thought of the day as of Mrs. Ward herself that her most famous effort in fiction, "Robert Elsmere," dramatized "the clash between the older and the younger types of Christianity," working themselves out, often poignantly and tragically, "in terms of human life."

Mrs. Trevelyan seizes upon this conflict between two worlds, "one dead, the other powerless to be born," as a sort of motif for her book, evoking the events of her mother's life as human documentary evidence. It is a vivid method, in spite of the minuteness of the narrative.

Mary Augusta Arnold was born in Tasmania. She spent her girlhood and early married life in Oxford. Contacts with Mark Pattison, Jowett, Canon Liddon, and "Uncle Mat," and her father's unfortunate vacillation between the Establishment and Newman's Catholic University of Dublin, kept her constantly immersed in the troubled waters of English thought. Her marriage to T. Humphry Ward in 1871 led her from Oxford society to London, and "Robert Elsmere" (1888) established her among the lions of politics and literature.

The opportunities of metropolitan life, and the abundance of her own sympathies, plunged Mrs. Ward into the sort of ameliorative effort by which so many of the social and religious philosophers of the day—Charles Kingsley, Frederic Harrison, F. D. Maurice, and Ruskin—sought to instruct the proletariat in abstract philosophy, aesthetics, and armchair socialism. Every three or four years a new novel appeared, presenting some new aspect of Mrs. Ward's central problem, while she kept pace as a publicist with national and world affairs, whether by attacking woman's suffrage, promoting public interest in child welfare, or championing England's effort in the war. When she died she was admired and loved as a distinguished Englishwoman—and as a novelist curiously forgotten. Her vogue in the nineties lay in her religious problem; and that, in 1920, was as out of date as a nest of dinosaur eggs.

Mrs. Trevelyan's book is probably one of the best biographies ever written by a daughter. She is no special pleader. She drains no wells of sentiment. She seldom becomes enmeshed in the wealth of her material. She writes competently, if not brilliantly, and her impartiality inspires confidence. She leaves one feeling about Mrs. Ward as a reading of "Robert Elsmere" or of "The Case of Richard Meynell" does: that she was an intelligent observer, but not a glowing one; a repository for typical ideas, but a cloudy mirror of life; a person of importance to the literary historian, but a pedestrian artist.

GERALD HEWES CARSON

A Baedeker to Russian Art

The Russian Arts. By Rosa Newmarch. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

AS a work the object of which "is to prepare the way and give us [the British] certain criteria for the intelligent acceptance of gifts that the next few years will assuredly bring us with a freer exchange of spiritual and artistic ideals between ourselves and our newly found and glorious friend in Eastern Europe," Rosa Newmarch's book on "The Russian Arts" must prove a distinct disappointment. A book could hardly be expected to prepare its readers for an understanding which its author failed to have. In her last chapter, dealing with The New Art, the author confesses that "the latest phases of Russian art—those of the twentieth century—are too complicated and changeable to be definitely classified as yet. . . . When I returned to the country after a few years' absence I found myself in what, at first sight, appeared to be an entirely strange world of art, inhabited by wholly new ideals." One may easily imagine the bewilderment of the author if she were to revisit the country now and find the world of art which is Russia's in 1924.

But, then, it would not be quite fair to judge Miss Newmarch's work in the light of the post-revolutionary development of the Russian arts. Although published in America in 1924, the book was written in 1916, when, for people with the author's turn of mind, the revolution was undreamed of, and Russia was still in the fold of "civilized nations."

However, the author failed also in her initial "intention . . . to trace the common link of nationality through every branch of Russian art" and to show how "the Russian arts—like all other art—have grown gradually into their present fully self-conscious and highly developed state." Had she done so, the newer art might not have appeared to her as being of such an "entirely strange world," and she might have been prepared for an "intelligent acceptance" of even the post-revolutionary art. The "common link of nationality" is as much traceable in the revolution as in the various branches of Russian art, while the present development of the latter has been shaped by the revolution to the same degree in which the art just preceding it was the accompaniment of those social processes that led up to the events of the last seven years.

Miss Newmarch has made a conscientious study of the paintings and sculptures in the Tretyakov Gallery in Moscow and in the Museum of Alexander III in Petrograd, as well as of the mural decorations and architectural details in a number of churches and cathedrals. She has faithfully recorded the details of hundreds of pictures and works of sculpture—as she has seen them. But despite much talk of "national individuality," "movements, social and religious," which have shaped the development of the Russian arts, of "ideals which have inspired [her] first sympathies," she has not seen the artistic personalities standing behind the individual works of art she records, or the social phenomena that have shaped them. Whatever glimpse of these artistic personalities she had caught are buried beneath a laboriously piled up mass of unnecessary details and generalizations. One gets no idea of the "soul" of the Russian people which the author professes to have "learnt to love under the guidance" of "that sturdy . . . champion of the Russian cause," Vladimir Stasov. Somehow one cannot escape the feeling that it is a love burning with a reflected glow, while the people with whose soul the author is so much concerned are only those types which look down from the canvases of the "national realists" whose works are discussed at the greatest length.

Miss Newmarch seems not to realize that it was not a mere "fervent interest in . . . archaeology" that has been the chief influence in directing the movements of contemporary art in Russia. The influences have been much deeper than that. The "young barbarians" of the newest tendencies are either themselves children of the people or when they "go to the people" they go there to study the artistic forms in which the true "national individuality" reveals itself.

It was quite different with the national realists of the second half of the nineteenth century, who have been typical representatives of the Russian intelligentsia of their epoch for which the people were in the nature of "lesser brothers." Their art reflected, on the one hand, the slavophile movement of the Russian intelligentsia, one of the chief champions of which was Vladimir Stasov, and, on the other hand, the movement of the early revolutionary intellectuals who saw their way of fulfilling their duty toward the people by "going into the people." For the national realists of the Society of Traveling Exhibitions the people were only the object on which they spent their lofty idealism. They went to the people not to study the national forms which had been preserved there during the centuries, but for subjects, themes, and types for their works.

It is these subjects, themes, and types—and not their origin and the social background on which they have been created—that occupies the body of Miss Newmarch's book. The result is, at best, a guidebook through a few Russian galleries, churches, and public monuments. But it is no more a history of Russian art than a Baedeker is a history of any country.

Diplomacy

When There Is No Peace. By the author of "The Pomp of Power." George H. Doran Company. $3.

IF we are to believe the author of "The Pomp of Power" there is too much democracy, and what is even worse, too much liberty on this globe of ours. The French are overindulgent toward the Germans, the Treaty of Versailles is unjust in its unreasonable leniency, and the whole world is saturated with the poison of the idea of Wilsonian self-determination—to mention only the chief sources of his anxiety. There is, however, one promising light on the dark horizon, and this is the policy of M. Poincaré. He is the Ormuzd of the post-war world fighting gallantly against the spirit of darkness, Ahriman, who returned to new life in the person of Lloyd George. There is hardly a word, much less an act, of the English war premier which the author does not regard as sufficient evidence to decapitate him politically. Who can forget, the exclamation very often recurs in the present volume, that Lloyd George treated the Germans as his friends, that he tried to force the way of the unspeakable Russian Bolsheviks into the company of the respectable nations, and that he caused the present upheaval in Germany by his insistence upon a plebiscite in Upper Silesia! The author affirms and reaffirms in the tone of genuine conviction that chief among the mischiefs of Lloyd George was this unfortunate plebiscite which was the immediate cause of the world's present plight since it stirred up German patriotism to a new pitch. With the same stern seriousness he proclaims to a startled world that the earth would be a place of eternal bliss had the Allies marched through the Brandenburger Tor in Berlin at the time of the conclusion of the armistice. They did not need to occupy Berlin. A march through Berlin's famous gate and Unter den Linden would have been sufficient to cure the Germans of their chronic megalomania. Nothing can make good the criminal failure of the British Cabinet to give its consent to the march which deprived the world of a return of the Golden Age.

With the same grave mien with which the author discusses the dictatorship of Lloyd George and the supreme virtues of French diplomacy he solves on eighteen pages the problem of reparations. He performs this tremendous task with the aid of data largely gleaned from daily papers. Having finished with this problem, he sits in judgment upon the Ruhr question and, turning subjective, declares that "I am one of those who regret that English troops are not side by side with those of France and Belgium."

Notwithstanding his disguise of anonymity, the author can be recognized by his abundant personal references as Lord Frederick Spencer Hamilton, one of the most conservative-minded representatives of the British diplomatic corps.

EMIL LENGYEL

Stirring the Depths

Horses and Men. Tales, Long and Short, from Our American Life. By Sherwood Anderson. B. W. Huebsch. $2.

THERE is a vast America which is never entered by the people who read books. The people who travel in Pullman cars and stop at Statler hotels and who do these things even when they are poor in order to save their sensibilities—these people tend to forget how tiny a minority they form in that enormous nation to which they belong. And, of course, they know farmer-folk among the clean hills of New England or tall, well-built, expensive plumbers who come to their houses or apartments when the radiators leak. But they do not know anything about the life that Mr. Sherwood Anderson has brought into the field of literature. But if ever you have missed connections between trains and have stumbled after midnight into a day coach, especially into a day-coach smoker, and have seen the men there and listened to them as the close, fetid night crept on toward a jaded dawn; or if you have been in the sort of shabby little barber-shop that is found among the straggling hovels near a railroad station of some Middle Western town; or if you have stood at the money-order window of a branch post office in a poor neighborhood—if you have done any of these things and have used your ears, then you know what Sherwood Anderson is trying to do and to say.

It may be said that this kind of life has been chronicled before. Fragments of it, perhaps. But all previous chroniclers have looked upon it with the scorn or the compassion of the observer. They have not written from within it. When you read Dreiser's unforgettable description of the bread-line in which Hurstwood waited on a certain bitter winter night, you know that you are reading the words of one who, whatever his early experiences may have been, has now transcended them and the world of the submerged in which they happened and can survey that world, from which he was always detached in his mind, as from a mount of vision. This is the impression that Mr. Anderson does not give and does not want to give. He sinks himself into the minds of his characters with a grave simplicity. Through and with them he struggles after undiscovered secrets, secrets that shall make clear the life of those millions. And he has come to the conclusion that the realities of this life, the form, as he says, "of things concealed in darkness," and the secret of this form "have to be felt, not understood with the thinking mind." Thus we arrive at a notion of Mr. Anderson and his method—his profound and voluntarily instinctive absorption in the inmost experience of common men and his half-mystical belief that from this absorption there may flame forth a secret that shall break down psychical walls, destroy ugliness and the furtiveness that is so large a part of ugliness, make existence less tortured, more natural, sane, and free.

It is a sense of Mr. Anderson's vision and aspiration that has held even those readers who knew that, as a rule, he did not write well and who were aware of the fact that his failures were perhaps more frequent than his successes. In "Horses and Men" he writes now and then better than he has ever done before. There are passages that have a legendary simplicity and dignity. Such is the story of the ice cutters on Lake Erie and such the fine paragraphs about the Welshman that open An Ohio Pagan. Admirable, too, is the little sketch of Dreiser and the description of the weariness and comfortlessness of the Chicago of the common people. As the style varies in excellence so do the stories in interest, grasp, creative clarity. Especially in the latter quality. There are a hundred profoundly significant details in Unused; the tale as a whole is dark. I'm a Fool is brilliantly successful; one or two of the other stories are nearly as good. But even where Mr. Anderson fails he remains of first-rate interest and importance. For he is not aiming after a conventional success by conventional methods. He plunges his plow into unbroken fields. He is looking for a secret, but he is looking for it in the earth. He is realist and mystic at once. Whether he finds the secret or not, it is a stirring thing to share his search, ardor, brooding, aspiration. To read him is always a spiritual experience even though one often misses a final aesthetic and intellectual satisfaction.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

"The Grandeur That Was . . ."

The Three Fountains. By Stark Young. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

MR. YOUNG is one of those who find in foreign lands a sort of contemporary ancestry: the calm reasonableness of the ancients dwells in the kindly priest; the pagan spirit, in direct contact with nature, retaining the primitive rites, survives in the simple country-folk. Stark Young sojourns among them like Ulysses in the Elysian Fields, a stranger, yet poignantly at home.

Life today is ingeniously transplanted to this hallowed ground, in the person of the several tourists whom Mr. Young presents, whose comments and attitudes make the contrast clear. Although he seems, at moments, to press a sly finger on the scales (as in his picture of the English professor who does not know Shakespeare is in verse), his vignettes are generally well balanced. They are always vivid. A sudden phrase throws a character into sharp relief: "Fig-leaf professors!" "like a cameo steeped in vinegar," "handsome in her way, like a great oatmeal loaf." A quiet beauty—"The lanterns and shadows are not only in the street, but shine and darken in the soul"—often rises through the prose to spread the glow of his mood over the pages and to create the "large transcription of art into one's own condition" that is the reward of communion with the classics. The individuals we see are in the main the essence of their race. There is the sensible Frenchman, unable to understand why Byron must be "forgiven" by his own countryman, who "manifested that huffiness of manner that so often accompanies English culture, a trait that puzzles unendingly the well-bred of other lands, and is the more puzzling for being followed later so often by a devotion and an outpour of confidences equally beyond foreign ideas of breeding." The Americans, like the English, carry their country, the standards of their town, wherever they go; along the walks of Volterra and Assisi they declare there is, after all, no place like Providence or Durham. The Italians have a heritage of suave culture, of cordiality and tolerance; yet Don Paolo's political liberalism is a cloak over a Catholic complete acceptance; and the peasant—"the light, the olive boughs, the wheat, the abundance and verdure are reflected within him as they are in the water of the pool"—feels the pagan need of a visible shrine where he can lay material token of his thankfulness. Only a few of those Mr. Young depicts elicit our questioning; they are the vague, disquieting souls who find shelter among the pillared memories, drawn to Italy—as the author himself seems drawn—by the impalpable spirit that made Byron say "The orphans of the heart must turn to thee."

At times Mr. Young's love of olden beauty seems transformed into an obtrusive display of learning, as when the reported conversation of an Englishwoman includes, in one casual chat, exact quotations from Baudelaire, Béranger, Rabelais, and Racine. However, this is at worst a colorful fault; more unfortunate are the rare lapses into careless expression ("Their lights were not carried overhead or on the shoulders, as our processions do") which come as sudden ruts in a smooth, tranquil road along which Mr. Young makes us wish to look and to ponder.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

Books in Brief

The Poetics of Aristotle: Its Meaning and Influence. By Lane Cooper. Marshall Jones Company. $1.50.

One of the most interesting volumes in the series called Our Debt to Greece and Rome. Mr. Cooper has done two difficult things in small space: he has summarized and commented upon the "Poetics," and he has written a history of its influence on criticism in Europe. The first task is perfectly performed, but in the second portion of his essay Mr. Cooper has run too much to bibliography, crowding each page with titles and dates of treatises on Aristotle rather than illuminating it with the commentary upon them which he is capable of making. The book, however, is remarkable as being a popular tribute to a masterpiece of criticism which too exclusively has been the possession of scholars.

Come Hither. A Collection of Rhymes and Poems for the Young of All Ages. Made by Walter De La Mare and Embellished by Alec Buckles. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

These five hundred pages of verse and these two hundred pages of notes, assembled by Mr. De La Mare with great affect-tion and care, make up an anthology which is easily the finest of its kind. The selections are by no means exclusively juvenile, though the charming introduction is addressed to children, and the illustrations are such as the imaginative young most like to see. There is only one obvious defect—none of the editor's own verse for children, equal as it is with the best in English, is included.

Jean-Gaspard Gevaerts. By Marcel Hoc. Oxford University Press. $4.20.

Some may be familiar with a fine portrait by Rubens in the gallery at Antwerp representing one of his best friends, a scholar "grave and dignified and conscious of his own worth" seated at his desk writing his commentaries on the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, whose bust is standing on the table beside him. Who was this Jean-Gaspard Gevaerts? His fame seems to have been altogether forgotten by the writers of the Encyclopaedia Britannica and his name is not included even in the long list of Netherland scholars of the time given in Sandys's three volumes on Classical Scholarship. But now, his life, his historical, numismatic, and philological work, his Latin poems, and his position in the gradual decline of Belgian humanism have been brought to light in a monograph by a young Belgian scholar. The book is published as one of the volumes of the Fondation Universitaire de Belgique, supported by funds which Mr. Hoover presented for the purpose from the residue of the Commission for Belgian Relief. The thoroughness with which this study has been made is a further indication of the revival of scholarship in Belgium after the war and is a monument of philological zeal worthy of "the last of the Renaissance scholars of Belgium" to whom it is devoted.

Louis Pasteur. By S. J. Holmes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

This is a simple, accurate summary of the life of Pasteur, boiled down from such biographies as those of Vallery-Radot and Emile Duclaux. There is no pretense of understanding the man himself; dramatic moments are recounted, but the drama is omitted. In short, an expanded encyclopedia article.

On the Giving of Stravinsky

By HENRIETTA STRAUS

THE test of a composer, it seems, is not so much whether he can refute his critics as whether he can survive his interpreters. Both Beethoven and his Fourth Symphony, for instance, have long outlived that contemporary who wrote that in his work Beethoven "is extremely bizarre and makes himself unintelligible and an object of terror to even cultivated dilettanti." And Stravinsky continues to be played, in spite of an indignant "opposition." On the other hand, one can recall quite recent occasions when a wave of the baton has proved more fatal to either of these composers than any gesture of protest; when Beethoven has become again an "object of terror" and Stravinsky almost "unintelligible." With Beethoven, at least, there is the safeguard of familiarity. But when, as happened this winter, five works by Stravinsky receive their first hearing in New York from five different conductors, and each conductor presents the composer from an entirely different angle, then to find the true Stravinsky becomes more a matter of deduction than of recognition.

The "Song of the Nightingale," for example, revealed one Stravinsky under Mr. Damrosch and another under Mr. Mengelberg. This symphonic evolution of Stravinsky's opera "The Nightingale" represents that phase, rather than period, of the composer which, in its conciseness and elimination, its delicacy yet brilliancy of effects, bears a curious kinship to the Japanese art of the brush. As Mr. Damrosch's treatment adhered more closely to this interpretation than the heavy reading of Mr. Mengelberg, and as his "nightingale" happily had Mr.

Barrère to sing its rapture on the flute, one can only feel that Mr. Damrosch's bird bore more semblance to the real one and Mr. Mengelberg's to its glittering, jeweled rival.

Again, Mr. Monteux's performance of the "Rite of Spring" differed quite radically in conception from that which Eugene Goossens gave when he introduced it to London, four years ago. Where Goossens made this ballet music literally a ritual of barbaric frenzy and elemental ecstasy, Mr. Monteux marked it with a fine restraint, in which heavy, decorous rhythms were substituted for the dynamic vitality of Goossens's beat. Stravinsky, however, was present at the latter's performance, and gave it his unqualified approval. And so, while Mr. Monteux's rendering was interesting and brought out the superb virtuosity of his orchestra, it must be considered from an interpretative standpoint as falling wide of the mark.

Stravinsky, indeed, is an invaluable auditor, for he does not hesitate to repudiate what is spurious, even when the conductor is a Koussevitsky. This he did when the latter introduced in London his symphony for wind instruments and presented merely the notes, without either coordination or subordination of the voices. If one may use such a performance as a precedent, then one may legitimately reject that of the "History of the Soldier," which Chalmers Clifton presented for the League of Composers, and in which he displayed a similar looseness of ends. This work is a satirical suite on the adventures of a penniless soldier marching home on a two weeks' leave of absence. It contains many rhythmic episodes, including marches, a tango, a waltz, and even a "rag-time." Such episodes should of course be irresistible; but so indeterminate was Mr. Clifton's beat and so vague his musical purpose that no soldier ever danced or marched to less alluring sounds.

Koussevitsky was excused on the ground that those who play Scriabin well can not do Stravinsky, and Koussevitsky is undoubtedly magnificent in the former. Whether this can be applied to Mr. Clifton I do not know. Yet it is a poor idea at best, for there is Stokowski, who not only has the fluid and sensuous emotionalism that Scriabin requires, but also the sensitiveness to sonorities and the dynamic, mechanical rhythm that Stravinsky practically demands. Stokowski, indeed, seems to be the one conductor here on whose interpretations of Stravinsky one can rely. He made, as far as was possible, a success of the same symphony for wind instruments with which Koussevitsky had failed—the symphony is uninteresting, at best. And he created a veritable sensation with Stravinsky's "Fox," which he prepared and gave for the International Composers' Guild. This delicious burlesque of a Russian fairy tale was by the same ironical Stravinsky of the "Soldier" suite, but it proved infinitely more amusing than the latter. This might not have been so had the "Soldier" been given in its entirety and with the same perfection of detail and understanding. As it is, one cannot but wonder whether there is not danger that the patient may die while the doctors disagree.

Drama Conflict

READERS of the German text of Ernst Toller's "Masse Mensch," now presented by the Theater Guild under the title of "Man and the Masses," found themselves occasionally not a little bewildered by the originality of the play's form, the antiphonal cries, the apparently harsh and too immediate impact of idea against idea. It is a tribute to Ernst Toller as a master of his new theatrical craft, as well as to the American translator, Mr. Louis Untermeyer, and the American designer and director, Mr. Lee Simonson, that in the production all difficulties disappear. The play now seems of a stark and terrible clarity; its form seems as inevitable as the form of a Euripides, a Molière, an Ibsen. A new domain has been conquered for art. It already seems old because inevitable.

We have heard a good deal about plays that deal with ideas.

But these plays have hitherto always been plays in which the human characters were interested in ideas and flung these ideas back and forth and discussed them and, at times, tried to live by them. In "Masse Mensch" the idea itself steps forth—terrible, gigantic, overwhelming. And the idea is dramatic, because it holds at its core one of the rooted antinomies of which the universe is built. The idea is dramatic because, rightly thought upon, the universe is so. Think far enough in any direction and you come upon a hopeless contradiction, a conflict that is from the beginning and nature of things. Hegel built up his whole dialectic to harmonize these contradictions. The average man says "God" and thinks that he has driven conflict out of the universe. Alas, it is at home there.

This fact has been known to thinkers since the days of Job. It has been known to dramatists, too. But their knowledge of it, except in the cases of Hebbel and Shaw, was always an instinctive one and did not rise into the operative artistic consciousness. It rose into Toller's consciousness because he lived the idea which he has here dramatically projected. It is well known that he took part in the Munich Communist revolution under Kurt Eisner and is still in prison. He is no less a Communist today because he has transcended Communism, no less an impassioned friend of mankind because he sees most clearly today the hopelessness of its struggle—the hopelessness which arises from this fact: If you use force, you incur guilt; if you do not use force you are destroyed by those who use it. That is the dramatic idea of "Masse Mensch"; it is the most dramatic of all ideas, the most catastrophic for the entire race.

The play shows a White Terror in full operation: war, hunger, industrial slavery. The masses rise, tempted to institute a Red Terror, partly as revenge but more largely to make the revolution prevail. But that is only exchanging murder for murder, oppression for oppression, guilt for guilt. The voice of the Woman who is the tragic conflict within the idea rises in great accents of compassion, of despair, of accusation of the Eternal who has cursed man with force and therefore with guilt. The masters, of course, try to turn the antinomy that is at the root of things to their advantage and try to differentiate their guilt from that of the rising masses. The Woman, though she goes to her death rather than be liberated by force and rejoin the revolutionaries, is not to be corrupted. Though guilt cannot rectify guilt nor murder atone for murder the masters are the more responsible. They taught the masses war and slavery.

I have worked out the central idea. It has corollaries. Under capitalism there is a lean and shriveled possibility for the individual mind. The masses wish to obliterate the individual. Salvation cannot lie that way. Only personality is saving. Yet who shall blame the masses for having learned their long lesson that, as far as they are concerned, personalities mean not wisdom and goodness but power and so oppression, sweat, and blood?

The seven scenes of the play stand forth like the shadows of the great gallows in one of them—somber, grandiose, against an eternal background. Never has Lee Simonson's imagination shown an equal union of reach and intellectual rectitude. Miss Yurka, as the Woman, is indeed sibyl, prophetess, and embodied idea and conscience. But excellent above both the scenes and the individual players are the speaking choruses of men and women. These not only achieve both clearness and a necessary tragic hardness of speech; they are magnificent pictorially and rhythmically. They sway and slant and dance to the very music, the timeless iron music, of the idea that both uplifts and kills.

A great play greatly produced. It will have only a very brief run. In the opening scenes the audience was scared. What? Was the Guild brazenly indulging in Bolshevik propaganda? That was going far. Later when Toller repudiates the use of force by revolution, there was a distinct feeling of relief. No one identified himself with the masters and bankers. Still, why be disturbed at all? As a portly lady said on the way out after a deep breath of relief that this bad business was safely over: "We'll have to educate the common people. That's all. . . ."

The Crumbling British Empire

By SCOTT NEARING

1. WHAT HAS HELD THE EMPIRE TOGETHER?

MORE than 400 millions of people live within the "British Empire." The vast majority of these people do not speak English, are not Christian, belong to some racial group other than the Celtic-Anglo-Saxon-Teutonic, make most of their living without the aid of modern machinery. Obviously, therefore, neither language, religion, race nor common activities is responsible for British imperial unity. What does bind the empire together? In the main, past or present reciprocal economic interests.

A glance at some of the trade and investment figures of the British Empire for 1913 will make this clear. The trade relations for that year are well illustrated by the importation from India of 513,039 hundredweight of cotton, and the export to India of 1,483,082,900 yards of cotton piece goods. By the importation, from the Cape of Good Hope, of 101,336 tons of hides and the export to the Cape of 182,496 dozen pairs of shoes. (Hides imported from India, 99,176 tons; from Australia, 149,584 tons. Boots and shoes exported to India, 159,327 dozen pairs; to Australia, 210,313 dozen pairs.) By the importation from Australia of 265 million pounds of sheep and lambs wool (92.5 million pounds from the Cape of Good Hope and 54 million pounds from India); and the export, to Australia, of 15,891,000 yards of woollens and worsteds (16,424,900 yards to India and 2,001,500 yards to the Cape). Cotton, hides, and wool were bought in the colonies, manufactured in the home country, and sent back to the colonies in the form of calico, shoes, and dress-goods.

British foreign investments complete this economic picture. In 1913 Great Britain had 3,714 million pounds sterling invested abroad. Of this amount:

514.8 millions were in Canada and Newfoundland.
378.8 millions were in India and Ceylon.
370.1 millions were in South Africa.
332.1 millions were in Australia.

(C. K. Hobson, "Annals of the American Academy," vol. 68, p. 28.)

These four regions alone had absorbed about 43 per cent of Britain's total overseas investments.

Such are the economic ties holding the empire together. Britain buys raw materials from the colonies and dominions; they buy manufactured goods from Britain; Britain provides much of the capital for local development and handles the trade, insurance, and banking for the empire.

2. THE BRITISH HOLD IS SHAKEN

The economic, commercial, and financial ties which are at the foundation of the British Empire have been gradually loosening during the past thirty years: (1) Because economic rivals such as Germany were buying raw materials, selling finished goods; transporting; insuring and investing in British territory; (2) because the colonies and dependencies began to do their own manufacturing and to exclude British goods by protective tariffs.

Both of these forces have shaken the Empire to its foundations. It is only the second that need concern us at this point.

There was some development of local industry in the leading British colonies and dominions before the war. This is particularly true of Australia and of Canada. But the war gave an emphatic impetus to the movement: (1) By cutting off the supplies of British manufactured goods and of British capital that were shipped to the colonies in normal times; (2) by creating an immense demand at top prices in the British market for dominion manufactures.

The results are particularly noticeable in the iron and textile industries, which are the leading home industries of Great Britain.

3. RISE OF CANADIAN MANUFACTURING

Canadian manufacturing industries responded immediately to the war demand. In 1915 there were 21,306 manufacturing establishments in the Dominion. By 1917 there were 34,392, or an increase of more than 60 per cent in two years. For 1919 the number was reported as 38,344, nearly twice the 1915 figure ("Canada Year Book").

Despite the heavy drafts of men into the army, the number of workers in these factories was:

1915.....	497,190
1917.....	674,910
1919.....	682,434

During the same four years capital invested increased from $1,994 millions to $3,230 millions, and the value of the product from $1,407 millions to $3,520 millions.

These figures present a picture of really phenomenal industrial growth, which becomes even more important from the standpoint of this study if they are viewed in some detail.

British textile and steel industries have always occupied a preeminent position in British economic life. It is in exactly these industries that Canada shows most remarkable development. Thus the number of spinning cotton spindles in the Dominion was 860,000 in 1904 and 1,167,837 in 1920 ("International Cotton Statistics," 1922, p. 28). Between 1914 and 1917 the exports of cotton fabrics rose from 356,081 yards to 846,099 yards; the woollens exported in 1914 were valued at $81,555 (of which $26,542 went to Britain). In 1917 they were valued at $725,148, of which $294,886 went to Britain ("Canada Year Book").

Canadian steel production figures are as follows:

	Metric Tons
1914.....	751,738
1915.....	926,156
1916.....	1,195,707
1917.....	1,583,786
1918.....	1,699,886
1919.....	934,726

("Mineral Industries, 1922," p. 389.)

Steel production, in the three years between 1914 and 1917, more than doubled, and in the four years (up to 1918) it increased by 125 per cent. In 1919 it was considerably reduced owing to the drop in war demand, but the machinery for producing the 1918 volume is still there.

Canada is a country of vast resources, suddenly thrown on its own devices and galvanized by the extraordinary war demand into the position of direct competition with the industries of the mother country.

5. MANUFACTURING IN AUSTRALIA

Australian industries show the same tendency as that noted in Canada. Here are figures for two of them that come into direct competition with the mother country:

	Woolen, Cotton and Tweed Mills		Boot and Shoe Factories
	No. of Employees	Value of Product	No. of Employees	Value of Product
1914.....	3,290	£1,153,000	13,192	£4,157,000
1916.....	3,927	1,888,000	13,322	4,617,000
1918.....	3,817	2,024,000	15,499	6,410,000
1920.....	5,029	3,290,000	17,986	10,207,000
1921.....	5,783	4,242,000	16,573	8,895,000

("Year Book of Australia," 1922, pp. 427-429.)

These industries have continued to develop since the war, even under the pressure of trade depression.

6. THE TEXTILE MARKET OF INDIA

Canada and Australia are modern industrial countries. India and South Africa have been much slower to establish factory industries. Even India and South Africa show the effect of war pressure in a changing industrial life.

The president of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce is quoted as saying that "British textile trade with India had fallen from 3,000 million yards of cotton goods exports before the war to 1,000 million yards after the war," which means that India produced 28 per cent of her own cotton goods before the war and 61 per cent after the war (The Labour Monthly, September, 1923, p. 131). This situation is, of course, complicated by the Gandhi movement.

However, Indian woolen mills are credited with a production of 4,222,000 pounds of goods in 1913 and of 9,744,000 pounds in 1917, and her leather works and tanneries with 7,805 workers in 1913 as compared with 27,840 workers in 1917 ("Statistical Abstract of British India," 1922, p. 234).

7. A VOICE FROM SOUTH AFRICA

South African factories numbered 3,998 in 1915-16, with a total output of £40,000,000. In 1920-21 there were 7,005 factories, with a £98,000,000 output. General Smuts, commenting on the situation, writes concerning South Africa as a Dominion Opportunity for British Capital: "It is significant from the British manufacturer's point of view that a number of local industries in the Union today are being bolstered up at the expense of the imported article" (Manchester Guardian Commercial, October 4, 1923, p. 371). In other words, South Africa is rapidly closing as a British market.

8. "IMPERIAL PREFERENCE"

Automatically this development of "infant industries" in the British dominions led to the enactment of protective tariffs, and Britain herself, at the end of the war, raised her import duties to prevent continental "dumping." Chamberlain had already educated the country in the matter of "imperial preference" and a policy was therefore adopted under which goods manufactured inside the British Empire should be admitted at lower duties than goods made outside the empire.

Theoretically this is significant. Practically, however, what does it amount to? In 1921 South Africa imported British goods to the value of 27.5 million pounds on which there was a preferential rebate of only 751,000 pounds, or less than 3 per cent of the whole value. And, as General Smuts notes (Manchester Guardian Commercial, October 4, 1923), the import duties are so high, even with the preferential, that the imported article "cannot hope to compete with the local product."

The imperial preference move came too late to prevent the rapid growth of local industry in the dominions. At the Colonial Conferences of 1887 and 1897 the colonies were not taken seriously, but the Boer War placed Canada and Australia definitely on the imperial map. The World War found the Dominion Premiers on the War Cabinet and at the Peace Table they received a respectful hearing. Rome succeeded in keeping her tributary states in a reasonably subordinate position, but the British dominions in 1921 had grown to such imposing proportions that Lloyd George was led to refer to the empire as "based not on force but on good-will and a common understanding" and to describe it as a "Commonwealth of Free Nations."

9. WHAT WILL THESE FREE NATIONS DO?

How long will they stay within the British Empire? Only so long as it is in their interest to stay. The ties that held them together in 1913 are breaking. They need no longer sell their raw materials to Britain. There are other markets.

They need no longer buy British manufactured goods. They can buy elsewhere or make their own.

They need no longer depend on Britain for supplies of new capital. The United States has an investible surplus far larger than that of Britain, and besides, as the local industries develop, each colony or dominion will provide its own new capital.

The economic ties that hold the British Empire together have been crumbling for thirty years. The process was hastened by the war. Today it is merely a question of holding them intact, until the surplus industrial population of Britain has colonized the great estates or migrates to the colonies.

Russia, Rumania, and Bessarabia

THE disputed question of Bessarabia was revived in the recent Russo-Rumanian conference held at Vienna. The conference broke up on this question, straining still further the relations between the Soviet Republics and Rumania. The Rumanian Government maintains that the question of Bessarabia has been settled once and for all by the act of the "Sfatul Zerii," the temporary Bessarabian parliament which, in 1918, voted the union with Rumania. Moreover the annexation of Bessarabia was ratified by the great Powers, the French Parliament passing the ratification on the very eve of the recent Vienna conference. The Rumanian delegation at Vienna therefore declined to discuss the question of Bessarabia. The attitude of the Soviet Government was explained in the following declaration read by the chairman of the Soviet delegation, M. Krestinsky, at the first business session of the conference on March 28:

The Government of the USSR (and before the creation of the Union, the governments of the RSFSR and of the Ukrainian SSR) has never given its consent to the addition of Bessarabia to Rumania, and it considers the occupation of Bessarabia by Rumanian troops in 1918 and the maintenance of the occupation to this day as an annexation by force of arms. The arguments which the Rumanian Government advances to justify this annexation are unconvincing. It is not true that Bessarabia belonged to Rumania and was then ceded to Russia in 1812, and that the addition of Bessarabia to Rumania in 1918 represented only the uniting with Rumania of a province which had been a component part of Rumania prior to its occupation by Russian troops. Bessarabia never belonged to Rumania. The territory of present-day Bessarabia was under the dominance of Turkey. As a result of a series of Russo-Turkish wars during the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries these territories were freed from Turkish rule and added to Russia in 1812. Rumania, on the other hand, came into existence several decades later.

The Rumanian Government itself has never before taken the position which it is maintaining at present. Thus, the command of the Rumanian troops which entered Bessarabia in January, 1918, issued a declaration to the Bessarabian population explaining that the Rumanian troops had come only for a temporary stay. Further, the dean of the diplomatic corps at the Rumanian court, the Italian Minister Fasciotti, in full understanding with the Rumanian Government communicated with the Italian consul in Odessa delegating the latter to inform the command of the Russian revolutionary troops that the entrance of the Rumanian troops represented a military operation devoid of any political significance and undertaken only with the humanitarian aim of guaranteeing a supply of food for the Russian and Rumanian forces and for the civil population.

Finally, the president of the Rumanian Cabinet, Averescu, himself signed, in March, 1918, an agreement with the representative of the Soviet Government, Rakovsky, and the military-revolutionary organizations of the Rumanian front and of the Odessa province in which he acknowledged the obligation in the name of the Rumanian Government to withdraw the Rumanian troops from Bessarabia inside of two months.

The Soviet delegation cites the former status of Bessarabia, the agreements with Rumania, and the supposedly temporary character of the Rumanian occupation not as a basis for its rights but only in order to refute the historical argument of the Rumanian Government. Since the October Revolution the basic principle, upon which rests the union of the peoples on the territory of the former Russian empire, has been the right of the peoples to self-determination. It is by this principle and not by any claims based on historical rights that the Government of the USSR is guided in its relations with the neighboring nations. The Government of the Union maintains that the population of Bessarabia must decide for itself whether it prefers to stay in the USSR, whether it wishes to quit the USSR and unite with Rumania, or whether it prefers to exist as an independent sovereign state.

In a series of notes and other official declarations the Rumanian Government has tried to prove that this expression of the will of the people has already taken place and that the addition of Bessarabia to Rumania has finally been settled by the decisions of the Sfatul Zerii of March 27 and November 27, 1918.

These decisions, however, have no legal power. The Sfatul Zerii, by its very nature, had actually no right to decide upon such a material question as the form of the national existence of Bessarabia. The Sfatul Zerii was created on the strength of the decision of the all-Russian congress of the Moldavian military organizations exclusively for the provisional administration of the government of Bessarabia during the period before the convention of the Bessarabian constitutional assembly should take place, and its prime task was to convene this constitutional assembly. This provisional and special character of the Sfatul Zerii has been confirmed by the Bessarabian peasant congress and by the repeated declarations of the Sfatul Zerii itself. By the decision of the mentioned Moldavian military congress the majority of places in the Sfatul Zerii was reserved for the Moldavians. The latter, however, represent less than half of the population of Bessarabia. Furthermore, both sessions referred to—those of March 27 and November 27, 1918—were marked by a gross violation of all rules regulating the work of representative bodies and even of the regulations of the Sfatul Zerii itself. On both occasions the question of the union with Rumania was not even put on the agenda.

At the session of March 27, despite the demand of many of the delegates for a secret ballot, the question was decided by an open roll-call vote. The session of November 27, when the unconditional addition of Bessarabia to Rumania was passed, was attended by only 46 delegates out of 162—less than one-third of the delegates. The question did not even come to a vote. Many members of the Sfatul Zerii as well as the representatives of whole groups protested against these resolutions which are being presented as the decisions of the Sfatul Zerii.

The Rumanian Government itself realized that it would never have achieved the desired decision at a normal session of the Sfatul Zerii, and the latter was therefore dissolved by royal decree on the very night it passed the unconditional addition of Bessarabia to Rumania. Finally, both decisions of the Sfatul Zerii, in March and in November, 1918, were adopted in an atmosphere of Rumanian military occupation and under Rumanian military terror in Bessarabia. Kishinev was full of Rumanian troops. The troops surrounded the building of the Sfatul Zerii. Under the pretext of an honorary guard a Rumanian military force was sent into the building. Under such conditions it would have been necessary for the delegates to possess a great amount of civic defiance to refrain from voting in a manner satisfactory to the Rumanian Government. Under such circumstances it was easy for the adherents of a union with Rumania to force their resolution upon the Sfatul Zerii.

It is therefore inevitable that the Government of the USSR refuses to recognize this resolution as having the force of an expressed will of the people, and it considers it necessary that a plebiscite be taken among the population of Bessarabia under conditions guaranteeing the full freedom and legality of the expression of will.

Finally, there is no legal validity, from the viewpoint of the Government of the USSR, in the agreement between Rumania and the Entente Powers concerning the addition of Bessarabia to Rumania, signed in Paris on October 28, 1920, without the participation of Russia and the Ukraine. The

Poincare Parcels Out Russia

Soviet Government entered its protest in due time both against the declaration of the Rumanian Government on the addition of Bessarabia to Rumania on the basis of the decision of the Sfatul Zerii and against the Paris agreement. (Radio of Commissar of Foreign Affairs Chicherin on April 17, 1918, and the note of the Commissars of Foreign Affairs of the RSFSR and the Ukrainian SSR Chicherin and Rakovsky to the governments of France, England, Italy, and Rumania on November 1, 1920.) The Soviet Government maintains this viewpoint to this day.

Faithful to its policy of peace which has already brought about the friendly regulation of relations between the USSR and all the neighboring nations except Rumania, the Soviet Government is striving toward a similar peaceful and friendly solution of the questions of difference between itself and the Rumanian Government. It therefore proposes to settle the principal question of difference, namely, the question of Bessarabia, through a properly organized plebiscite among the Bessarabian population under conditions guaranteeing the freedom of the expression of its will.

The Union Soviet Government insists that in the Bessarabian question it does not stand on historical rights inherited from the Czarist Government. The Soviet Government does not strive to keep Bessarabia within the USSR at any cost. But the Soviet Government has reason to believe that the majority of the population of Bessarabia resents its actual subjection to Rumania. Therefore the Soviet Government insists that a plebiscite be carried out.

Were the Rumanian Government convinced of the opposite, namely, that the great majority of the Bessarabian population sincerely considered itself Rumanian and wished Bessarabia to be a part of Rumania, then it should have nothing to fear from the outcome of the plebiscite and would not try to avoid it. The Russian delegation, intending to propose at the coming session of the conference that a plebiscite be taken among the population of Bessarabia, hoped that it would meet with no opposition to this proposal from the Rumanian Government. The Soviet delegation was mistaken in its hope. The Rumanian delegation refuses to discuss Bessarabia and by this it declined the plebiscite. According to our opinion this proves that the Rumanian Government acknowledges that it is keeping Bessarabia under its rule by force and in spite of the will of the Bessarabian masses, which is known to the Rumanian Government. In view of this the delegation of the USSR is compelled to declare again most categorically that the Government of the USSR has never given and is not giving its consent to the addition of Bessarabia to Rumania and that it protests against the annexation of Bessarabia by Rumania.

The action of the French Parliament in ratifying the Treaty of Paris by which Bessarabia was handed over to Rumania caused strong resentment in Soviet Russia. In connection with this action the following exchange of notes between the foreign offices of Moscow and Paris took place. (The notes are reproduced from the Moscow press of March 18 and March 26.)

TRANSLATION OF TELEGRAM SENT BY CHICHERIN TO THE FRENCH MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS ON MARCH 15, 1924

The Government of the USSR protests vigorously against the support given by the French Parliament to an act of seizure of territory in relation to the Soviet Union notwithstanding the fact that at the moment of the occupation of Bessarabia by Rumanian forces France formally declared that this occupation would be temporary since it pursued only humanitarian ends. The decision of the French Parliament adopted on the eve of the negotiations between the Soviet Union and Rumania cannot be considered as anything but an intervention of a third Power which will inevitably obstruct the establishment of lasting peace and will cause the prolongation of the unsettled situation in that part of Europe. The Government of the USSR directs the attention of the French Government to the fact that the latter has identified itself with a violation of the rights of the population of Bessarabia and of the Soviet Union in the occupation of Bessarabia by Rumania, and it is therefore responsible for the losses caused the Soviet Union by this occupation. The Government of the USSR will draw from this all the necessary conclusions.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS POINCARÉ TO THE COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS CHICHERIN ON MARCH 20

The ratification by the French Parliament of the treaty signed October 28, 1920, by the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, and Rumania recognizing the sovereignty of Rumania in the territory of Bessarabia elicited a protest from the Soviet Government, which views this decision as an unjustified intervention that may obstruct the establishment of peace in that part of Europe.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs recalls the fact that the Allied Powers agreed that historical tradition, the ethnographic and economic situation of Bessarabia, and the clearly expressed will of the people justified the annexation of the Rumanian population of this province to the Kingdom of Rumania.

The French Parliament could only be guided by the same motives by which the British Parliament was guided in ratifying the treaty referred to on April 14, 1922, at which time this action was not considered an obstruction to the establishment of good relations between Great Britain and Russia.

The French Government resents particularly the interpretation according to which the said treaty is an act of violation of the rights of the population of Bessarabia. As a matter of fact the governments of the Allies recognized Rumania's sovereignty over Bessarabia only after the following declaration of March 27, 1918, had been voted upon by the National Assembly of Bessarabia (Sfatul Zerii):

The Moldavian Democratic Republic (Bessarabia), bordered by the rivers Prut, Dniester, the Black Sea, and the former Austrian border line, which had been severed by Russia more than one hundred years ago from the former Moldavia, standing upon its historic right as well as upon its right of kinship, and basing itself on the right of peoples to determine their own fate, joins from now on and forever its mother, Rumania.

In any case, Article 9 of the treaty provides that Russia should be invited to affix its signature to the convention. Thus the situation in relation to Russia may be regulated in the same way as was the case with the newly created independent states on her western frontier in accordance with the principle of the self-determination of peoples, Russia always being the first to declare itself in adherence with this principle.

POINCARÉ

TRANSLATION OF TELEGRAM SENT BY COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS CHICHERIN TO THE FRENCH MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS POINCARÉ ON MARCH 22, 1924

The vote of the so-called Bessarabian National Assembly mentioned in your telegram of March 20 was in reality an impudent deception on the part of the agents of General Mackensen, whose aim was to compensate Rumania for the loss of Dobrudja, as provided by the Bucharest treaty between Rumania and Germany. This act of deception was carried out under the instructions of the leader of the Germanophiles, Margiloman. The Sfatul Zerii, which at its inception was made up partly of elected delegates and partly of delegates from parties, was deliberately enlarged by tools of the Rumanian forces which thus created a majority. It was these members of the assembly who were added by the Rumanian occupants who supported the idea of the annexation of Bessarabia. Prior to the act of March 27, 1918, some of the most prominent members of the Sfatul Zerii, men like Kataros, Pancir, Prokhnitzky, Chumachenko, Grunfeld, Litviniv, had been shot by the Ru-manians for their opposition to the annexation. The voting itself took place in the presence of armed forces and Rumanian gendarmes and under the pressure of open threats. Notwithstanding this, the act of March 27 provided not for the joining of Bessarabia with Rumania but for a very broad autonomy for Bessarabia.

The second act of a like nature took place on November 25, when the proposal for the complete union of Bessarabia with Rumania was unexpectedly brought in at night with only one-fourth of the delegates present and was adopted by a mere announcement without taking a vote for or against.

We have in our possession protests against these deceptive acts signed by the Rumanian senator, Alexandri, the leader of the People's League, by the General Secretary of the Sfatul Zerii, Epuri, by the representatives of the military congress, the peasant party, the workers' union, and municipalities, and by forty other members of the Sfatul Zerii.

These acts of the Rumanian authorities in reality constitute an unexampled violation of the will of the Bessarabian people and an application of brute force on the part of the Rumanian occupants. Identifying itself, at the instance of the French Government, with these acts on the eve of the Vienna conference, the French Parliament assumes a responsibility for all consequences which may follow.

Distinction—

A guiding star to people of good taste. These books have it in three respects. Their writing is brilliant; their stories are different; their format is what the cultivated bookreader now demands in beauty of type and taste in binding.

★ THESE CHARMING PEOPLE Michael Arlen
"Mr. Arlen's fiction does possess an unusual quality, a delicate and impalpable bouquet, the distillation of a romantic temperament."—New York Tribune. $2.50

★ ANTIC MAY Aldous Huxley
"He is the creator-god of a beautiful new world which is wholly and peculiarly his own and which he peoples with antic folk whose adventures always keenly intelligent and sparkling with wit, are eloquently and continually amusing." $2.00

★ YOUNG FELIX Frank Swinnerton
"Young Felix" is a delight in its story, in its style, and above all in its hero, who should rank with the beloved of English fiction."—Philadelphia Public Ledger. $2.00

★ JENNIFER LORN Elinor Wylie
"Jennifer Lorn" is a quite charming book, compact of color and legerity and glitter. I have delighted alike in its wistful mocking humors and in the fine prose."—James Branch Cabell. $2.50

★ RICEYMAN STEPS Arnold Bennett
"A ripe, matured book, spacious in plan, genial with the wisdom of experience and wide knowledge of life."—New York Herald. $2.00

★ LUSTRES Anne and Dillwyn Parrish
Fantasy to be placed with such delights as Barrie's "Peter Pan," Kenneth Grahame's "The Wind in the Willows" and Christopher Morley's "Where the Blue Begins." $2.00

★ WIFE OF THE CENTAUR Cyril Hume
"He has that gift of hurling truth and realism in a cloud of petals as George Meredith so divinely used to do."—New York Post Literary Review. $2.50

WITHOUT FEAR of being called upon to deplete its slender treasury, The Nation herewith offers a prize of one hundred dollars for anyone who will intelligently explain the following sentences:

The work of the Associated Press, both necessary and logical, indicates that the true method would appear to lie in recognizing the broad principle of our individual and national dependence, calculating the requirements which flow from that condition, and governing ourselves accordingly.

This condition began to subside nearly four years ago, but it left along its course a trail of vicious and criminal selfishness which in diminishing degree has ever since been attempting to gratify an appetite grown all the sharper through indulgence and a general credulity to rumors of large sums demanded and paid on account of every conceivable motive and action.

The principle of service is not to be confounded with a weak and impractical sentimentalism. It does not mean that either the individual or the nation is to assume the burdens which ought to be borne by others. It is warranted in considering self to the extent of recognizing that it is justifiable to accumulate and hold the resources which must necessarily be used to serve ourselves, our own household, and our own nation. But it does not stop there. It recognizes the necessity of serving others, and when the need arises for meeting a moral requirement, of making individual and national sacrifices sufficient to maintain the cause of righteousness.

It is hardly necessary to add that all this obscure nonsense is taken from the speech of President Coolidge to the assembled members of the Associated Press.

WHAT PRESIDENT COOLIDGE said or didn't say in regard to Muscle Shoals has some bearing on his political fortunes, but it has nothing to do with the future of water-power—a far more important question. The Senate Committee on Agriculture has made public a telegram which a reputable Washington journalist, acting as he says in the capacity of an observer for Mr. Ford, sent to the latter's newspaper, the Dearborn Independent, on October 12, 1923. The correspondent called on Mr. Coolidge on the day of Mr. Ford's public attack on Secretary Weeks for the sale of the Gorgas plant, and quotes the President as saying: "It is my hope that Mr. Ford will not do or say anything that will make it difficult for me to deliver Muscle Shoals to him, which I am trying to do." Mr. Coolidge denies this statement, but he does not and cannot deny seeing the correspondent or talking with him of Muscle Shoals. Nor can he deny that in the weeks immediately following the dispatch of the telegram Representative Madden, after conference with Mr. Coolidge, introduced a bill to duplicate the Gorgas steam plant and turn it as well as Muscle Shoals over to Henry Ford, following which Mr. Ford met Mr. Coolidge and pledged his support of him for President. All this, however, is a mere detail beside the tremendously important issue of whether the country's water-power is to become a private monopoly or be developed by the nation for the benefit of the people and their children yet unborn.

THE EAGERNESS with which Mr. Coolidge and his party pursue the promised house-cleaning at Washington may be judged from the fact that Lieut. Osborne Wood, who is supposed to have made a fortune in speculating by cable in New York while on duty as an aide to his father, General Wood, in Manila, has been allowed to resign from the army. In other words, he is allowed to escape any possible punishment as an official for any improper acts that might be discovered. Equally significant is the fact that the Ladd resolution calling for an investigation of the Woods, father and son, and the general situation in Manila, has been pigeonholed by the Senate Committee on Audit and Accounts. The chairman of the committee, Senator Keyes of New Hampshire, seems determined to make no report whatever on the bill, and of course there has been no message from the White House to urge that another investigation be begun. It will be a crying shame if the Wood administration of the Philippines is not overhauled as it ought to be by a committee determined to get at the facts. General Wood and his son ought to be the very first to demand such an inquiry.

A RECENT COPY OF Mail Notes, a newspaper issued in St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, contains under the caption "Official Publication" a notice signed by the Governor, Philip Williams, and presumably paid for with public money. After stating that a bill had been introduced into Congress by Senator McLean to provide a civil government for the Virgin Islands, the Governor makes this extraordinary announcement:

I desire to inform the people of the Virgin Islands that the Government had nothing whatever to do with this bill; was given no opportunity to comment upon it prior to its presentation to the United States Senate and in fact knew nothing concerning it until the printed copy was received this morning. Further, in so far as this Government is aware, the party or parties who requested Senator McLean to introduce this bill acted without the consent and approval of the people, inasmuch as the people, as represented by the two Colonial Councils, have not signified a desire for a complete change in the form of government of these islands.

Governor Williams then adds this still more extraordinary sentence: "The danger of legislation concerning the Virgin Islands being introduced in the federal Congress without official backing is only too apparent." The bill in question was prepared by Virgin Islanders and their friends. Governor Williams is a naval captain, temporarily executive of the Virgin Islands, and as such he is entitled to express an opinion on legislation affecting them to his superiors in Washington. He is not entitled to propagandize, with public or private money, for or against measures in Congress. In doing so he illustrates the amazing impudence of our bureaucrats overseas in the effort to maintain themselves in a pleasant and powerful position.

"WALL STREET IS WAGING a war of financial extermination against Europe" is the charge made by many European papers in connection with the speculation in French francs on the New York market. Since March 10 the European exchanges, the Paris Bourse not excepted, have had a continuous row of "black Fridays." At 9:15 a.m. of that memorable day M. Philippe, representative of the banking firm Lazard Frères & Cie., of Paris, stepped on the floor of the bourse and offered ten thousand pounds sterling for sale. From that moment until 1 p.m. at ten-minute intervals M. Philippe threw ten-thousand pound blocks on the market. Simultaneously the French franc began to rise all over the world. At 11:15 a.m. a Vienna stockbroker involved in franc operations committed suicide. At 12:05 another Vienna broker went insane for the same reason. The forcing of the franc to an artificially high level financed by what is known as the Morgan loan spelled disaster for banking firms and brokerage houses in Amsterdam, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, and Budapest. There was talk of a moratorium in several Central European countries. As Europe saw it, the French franc, protected by mighty influences with headquarters in the huge skyscrapers of Wall Street, was being forced up by the dollar. Even Paris complained, for control of the franc was taken out of its hands. It was a financial Marne, and European papers, Paris journals included, are lamenting—possibly on inadequate information—that the only victors were in New York.

KARL HELFFERICH has followed Hugo Stinnes into death. Another financial genius whose determination to play politics cost Germany dear has slipped off the stage. Helfferich reached his peak before the war, as director of the Anatolian Railway and later of the Reichsbank. As war-time Minister of Finance he was responsible for the policy of living on loans instead of taxes—the Allies were to foot the bill! When he was made German Ambassador to Moscow, after the Peace of Brest-Litovsk, his elaborate precautions against assassination made him a laughing-stock. He never reconciled himself to the republic, and was a bitter-end opponent, first of ratification of the Versailles treaty and later of the "fulfilment policy." But he had a cutting mind and would have been the brains of the Nationalist attack on the Dawes report. To Stinnes monarchy and republic were one; he believed in the dictatorship of big business. What was a mere government to a man who owned steamship lines, newspapers, forests, oil fields, coal and iron mines, steel mills? He worked sixteen hours a day, and expected others to work at least ten; employing more than a quarter of a million men, he dictated the lives of millions. Sometimes he supported a government, sometimes not—but never for sentimental reasons. He deliberately encouraged the fall of the mark, and made by it millions, which he immediately reinvested in industrial enterprises in and out of Germany. Helfferich's death is a breach in the Nationalist wall, Stinnes's in the industrial wall; unfortunately the conditions which made them dominant if sinister features in German life persist.

PRESIDENT LOWELL OF HARVARD is a bold man. He undertook to defend himself and American universities in general against Bertrand Russell's charges of illiberalism. Bertrand Russell's reply was smashing enough, but the governing board of the Harvard Union almost at once gave further aid and comfort to the enemy. A group of undergraduates wanted to invite Eugene Debs, Scott Nearing, and William Z. Foster to speak at the Union. Its governing board objected. The undergraduates suggested a revision of the rules so that a petition signed by 200 student-members would suffice to produce an invitation. The board, in an exceptionally stupid reply, refused. The opinion of the 200, it said, might not necessarily be the majority opinion—as if the issue were not precisely the right of minority opinions to be heard! Mr. Lowell boasted in public that Harvard had never dismissed an instructor for his views; he is understood to believe that if a university exercises proper care in selecting its professors dismissals will never be necessary. The fundamental issue raised by Mr. Russell goes deeper still:

Anyone who cares more [he said] for academic pursuits and the advancement of learning than for political propaganda would wish to see the government of universities in the hands of men of learning rather than uneducated millionaires. What would be thought of a proposal to have the money market administered by a board of professors? If learning were as much respected in America as is wealth this proposal would seem no more absurd than the existing boards of trustees, where we find, in Shakespeare's words, "Folly, doctor-like, controlling skill."

Harvard may reply that her millionaires are educated, but she will hardly claim that they were selected for their learning.

MAY DAY has a mixed ancestry. It is England's festival of spring and fertility—dating back to pagan days—with Maypole and hawthorne blossoms; it is Europe's revolutionary anniversary, when the workmen take an unofficial holiday and flaunt their red flags in the streets; and now in America it is to be Child Health Day. Few in America remember that Europe's red May Day, Soviet Russia's revolutionary celebration, is of new-world origin, and a scant forty years old. May Day as Labor's Day began here during the eight-hour-day agitation in the eighties, when the American labor movement was young and spirited. The movement became world-wide, but American labor forgot and denied its own child while in every industrial center of Europe May Day is still the great labor festival of the year. What more fitting, fundamentally, than a coalescence of the traditions of children dancing on the green, of shorter hours for their parents, and of the modern science that is transforming childhood?

SAINTS SOMEHOW COUNT in Oriental politics, but it is difficult to conceive of a man like Gandhi in any role whatever in American political life. Imagine, for instance, an American politician saying, upon his return from a period of retirement, anything like this:

I live for India's freedom, and would die for it, because it is part of truth. Only free India can worship the true God. My patriotism is not exclusive. Indian freedom as conceived by me benefits the whole world. Consciously or unconsciously, the majority of us broke our pledge of non-violence. Therefore our own countrymen are filled with distrust. Hindus and Mussulmans have provided lessons in violence, each claiming the monopoly of truth. Our central policy must be to illustrate the utility and necessity of non-violent thought, word, and deed, in dealing with public affairs.

THE DEATH OF CHARLES F. MURPHY will suggest to some that with him is passing out of politics the era of personal leadership—of power based on personal contacts and man-to-man influence. Certain signs point that way. The possibilities of influencing great numbers of men through mass suggestion by means of newspapers, motion pictures, and the radio seem to be growing ever and appallingly greater. And yet it is no more true that politics is politics than that business is business. Both are largely friendship, and as we look about it appears that even in our mechanized life—perhaps because of our mechanized life—the outstanding and long-endured political successes, good and bad, are those based on the power of personal leadership. The reach of the Hearst publications is enormous, and yet their owner has failed signally in his efforts to capitalize it for his political advancement; the attempt to elevate General Leonard Wood to the Presidency failed miserably in spite of the expenditure of fabulous sums to swing mass opinion his way. On the other hand, the chief newspapers of the country long did their best to turn mass opinion against Roosevelt, Bryan, and La Follette, failing because all these men had a personal following which was largely immune to such methods.

MEANWHILE, for almost a quarter of a century, Mr. Murphy wielded enormous political power without resorting to any of the usual ways of controlling mass opinion. He owned no newspapers; he did not inject himself into the motion-picture films of current events; he did not make speeches for the radio. Except on rare occasions he did not even give interviews to the newspapers; he did not attend public dinners; he did not unveil monuments. He never held but one public office and that not for long; he was not even the titular head of the New York County Democratic Committee, popularly known as Tammany Hall. He had that organization behind him, of course, but it stayed behind him only because he was strong enough personally to stay in front of it. Mr. Hearst, through his press, attacked Mr. Murphy but failed to dislodge him. Indeed the press of New York City was generally almost unanimously against the Tammany boss, without conspicuous result. It is a pity, of course, that Mr. Murphy was not guided by higher ideals and purposes, but there is satisfaction in reflecting that personal leadership still has a potency even when opposed by all the methods of mobilizing mass opinion of which the interests dispose.

FOR NEARLY TWO GENERATIONS G. Stanley Hall had been a stimulating and provocative force in this country. In the eighties at Johns Hopkins he fostered successfully the type of accurate and extensive experimental investigation in psychology which he had himself learned in Germany. He was one of the first and most persistent students of educational method and technique. His own work on "Adolescence," for all its dubieties and sometimes hasty generalizations, remains a classic and pioneer work in the understanding of that uneasy and crucial period of human life. His editorship of half a dozen different psychological publications, his own psychological work and teaching at Clark University (of which he was long the active and productive president), made him a singularly fertilizing force in the development of psychology and enlightened education in the country. Many important projects in abnormal psychology and psychiatry can be traced to him, and he was a valiant defender of the Freudian contribution in the days, not so long ago, when it was scoffed at by the academic and official psychologists. Apart from his own work and instruction in psychology he was notable for the breadth and humane wisdom of his thinking and learning. His very recent "Life and Confessions of a Psychologist" is the testament of a cosmopolitan and cultivated man, with something of the mellow sageness of Havelock Ellis. "Senescence" almost does for old age what his earlier work did for adolescence. It is not simply a psychologist who has died, but one of the inciting intellectual voices of our day.

IT IS TWO HUNDRED YEARS since Thomas Longmans, then a young man of twenty-five, bought out the publisher of "Robinson Crusoe" and set up for himself at the same spot in Paternoster Row on which the present publishing firm of Longmans, Green and Company is situated. The firm thus has the right to call itself the oldest in the business; Wordsworth, Charles Lamb, Scott, Froude, Lecky, Stevenson, William Morris, Macaulay—even Dr. Johnson—entered the literary world over the Longmans imprint. It is an imposing list covering two centuries that have meant much in English letters. One's first impulse is to murmur that the good old days are no more: Where are our Wordsworths and Macaulays and Dr. Johnsons? Yet Alfred A. Knopf's list or Thomas Seltzer's or those of Harcourt, Brace and Company, of Boni and Liveright, or of half a dozen other progressive publishing houses in America may have as interesting names to present some hundred and ninety years from now, provided Mr. Sumner and his descendants can be persuaded to keep hands off. In 1724 a world very different from ours presented itself; the industrial revolution had not begun. Yet the inexplicable spirit that we call genius is still burning. There is no need to fear that a machine age, or whatever may follow it, can quench that fire; it is stronger than iron and steel or flesh and blood.

Mr. Coolidge Rampant

THE newspapers assure us that President Coolidge now has a majority of the delegates to the Republican National Convention pledged to him and therefore holds the nomination in the hollow of his hand. If this be so, it is a tribute both to the political power of the President, by reason of his control of his party and the offices, and to the simple-mindedness and gullibility of many of the politicians. They have set up a man of straw, and in so doing they have laid aside their critical faculties. The leaders in Washington can be under no illusions as to the man in the White House. They know he does not lead. They attend White House conferences upon the state of the party and the nation—the President makes no suggestion whatever. Recently various men were gathered by the President to advise him as to how he should get out of the dilemma in which the Congress's scandalous action as to the Japanese had placed him. The headlines read: "President gives views to callers, but has not offered way out." Yet there is a hopelessly fatalistic approval of the Coolidge candidacy. It is as if the insiders said to him: "We who are about to die politically salute you. We must go down with our colors since we cannot disavow you."

The absurdity of the situation is plain. An accidental President has to be nominated for fear lest a substitution be interpreted as a confession that his Administration—and Mr. Harding's—is a failure. When President Arthur had filled out the term of James A. Garfield he was quietly dropped. No one felt that as a reflection either upon him or his Administration. There was another man whom the party deemed more entitled to the honor. True, President Arthur's Administration did not reek with scandal. No member of his or his predecessor's Cabinet was found to have received $100,000 in a black bag and to have scurried around the country seeking to induce men to commit perjury in order to cover up his tracks. No members of his Cabinet were forced out for obvious and grotesque unfitness. It may be that party leaders of the Lodge type feel that no one else ought to carry the burden of such terrible maladministration; it may be that they feel that Coolidge deserves the burden of the inevitable defeat. At any rate, they accept the situation for the present and are aiding in the unblushing effort to make the people believe that the incumbent of the White House is really the man of the hour. Whether they will be of that point of view when the convention meets is another matter; much may still come to light before that time. It may still be that when the final conference meets in some private hotel room, after the manner of our unbossed conventions, the members of that conference will find Mr. Coolidge unavailable. If their Cassius has by that time grown so great in votes as to be able to defy them, then the Democrats should have an easy victory.

We are the more confirmed in this belief by a calm perusal of the President's speech to the members of the Associated Press on April 22. Much of that address is unlettered nonsense to make a grammarian weep; some of it is ridiculous in expression and content—a cause for mirth were it not a cause for sadness. His reference to the shocking corruption and rottenness recently unveiled in Washington revealed him once more as entirely lacking in the capacity for effective indignation. Confessing to the wholesale wave of corruption which swept over the country in the wake of the war (which war Mr. Coolidge in the same breath declares to have been "a demonstration of the strength of self-governing peoples and a victory for free institutions"), he yet swept aside all the revelations of rottenness in Washington with these words: "From all of this sordidness the affairs of government, of course, suffered. In some of it a few public officers were guilty participants, but the wonder is not that this was so much or so many; rather that it has been so little and so few"! A wonder that only one member of Mr. Harding's Cabinet was caught red-handed, and two of Mr. Coolidge's were driven out of public life for good and just reasons? Ought we to have been surprised and disgraced only if six instead of three had been besmirched? It seems to us that any fine-feeling and sensitive American who really had his country's honor at heart would have hung his head in shame that even one member of the government had betrayed it. Because the country was money-mad and reeking with that corruption which is the inevitable concomitant of war is no reason why any of our officials had "of course" to join in the corruption. Mr. Coolidge's plea is in effect not only in avoidance but in condonation. It is in keeping with the Calvin Coolidge who called for Mr. Daugherty's resignation in a letter in which he said: "I am not questioning your fairness or your integrity," when every intelligent and informed man the country over more than questioned both.

After this passage in Mr. Coolidge's speech to the newspaper men we confess to much less interest in the remainder of his utterances. It is well that he stuck to his guns and declared that the country's decision against the League of Nations was final; it is to his credit that he appealed for economy and lighter taxes, that he saw hope in the Dawes report and favored the loan to Germany, and that he pleaded for arbitration. We rejoice that he has changed his mind about the inadvisability of calling another conference for disarmament if the Allies will effect a prompt settlement of the German economic situation and the reparations question. Despite all this and other good things in his speech one feels that here is a man utterly lacking in that delicate sense of the fitness of things, in that fury for righteousness in the face of open and admitted evil which the American people had a right to expect. By a third party or otherwise, by a revolt of the Republican progressives, by the discernment of the American people—in whom we have not lost faith—Mr. Coolidge must be defeated if the Cleveland convention is so blind and fatuous as to nominate him.

This brings us back once more to the extraordinary responsibility resting upon Robert La Follette, now happily nearly restored to health and activity, and to the brave and determined Senators who, in the face of contumely, misunderstanding, and deliberate assaults upon their character have stood fast to uncover rottenness and wrongdoing. If their patriotism is limited to this service alone it will be a misfortune indeed. They can, we believe, make impossible the election of Mr. Coolidge. They owe it to the country to do so.

Our Restless Colonies

ONE of the plaguy things about a democracy is that if it has colonies it is more or less obliged to give them some measure of democracy too. This is embarrassing because it raises the question whether colonies are compatible with democracy. The United States has dodged the question so far by refusing to admit that it has colonies. It has called them by every other name and temporized with every problem that has arisen in them. But although the United States has acted as secretly about its colonies as if they were illegitimate children, some of them have lately become so clamorous as to leave no doubt of the parental relation and to make some attention to their future imperative.

Two tendencies have run parallel in our attitude toward our colonies: the theory that we should administer them for the benefit of their inhabitants and the idea that we should exploit them for our own gain. In our purely political treatment, at least, the first and worthier aim has so far been uppermost. It is worth noting, therefore, that strong forces are now working—with certain symptoms of success—in the other direction. This is the explanation of General Wood in the Philippines and of the outburst of native resentment that his policy has occasioned. Practically General Wood and his backers stand for the repudiation of our promise of independence to the Filipinos. That promise, we should remember, rests on more than the personal declarations of Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, and other individuals. It was incorporated by Congress in the Jones Act of 1916, in which it is stated that "it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established." Thus it all simmers down to what is a "stable government."

Raymond Leslie Buell, of the department of history, Harvard University, after a recent visit to the Philippines, writes in the Atlantic Monthly that General Wood has defined a "stable government" as "one under which capital seeks investment at normal rates of interest." Mr. Buell believes the Filipinos have demonstrated the existence of a "stable government." Mr. Buell says also that not only the Filipinos but the average American would benefit economically and politically by Philippine independence, and adds:

There is only one important reason why so many Americans are now demanding that we cling to these islands: that is, in order to advance the interests of a limited number of American business men. The American people as a whole have derived no material advantage from our occupation of these islands. . . . We have sunk at least $700,000,000 in military and naval expenditures arising out of the occupation. . . . The United States cannot afford, either from the standpoint of Mr. Man-in-the-Street, of the Filipinos, or of world peace, to have its Philippine policy dictated by the Manila Chamber of Commerce, or even by the Americans in the Philippines, who constitute one-tenth of 1 per cent of the population.

The exploitation theory of colonies, already present in the Philippines in the person of General Wood, seems about to be introduced also into Porto Rico. The artificially stimulated demand for independence of a few years ago has collapsed, but there is a genuine desire for greater autonomy, and all parties united recently in sending to Washington a delegation, headed by Governor Towner, to ask for concessions in this direction, including the right of the island to elect its own chief executive. The demands met with considerable opposition from Secretary Weeks and others in official Washington, but this hostility seems lately to have subsided, and the bill embodying the Porto Rican demands has been reported favorably to the Senate.

Now turn to Porto Rico and note the possible explanation. The most rapidly growing and virile political organization there in recent years has been the Socialist Party, whose head (oddly enough) has also been the director of the American Federation of Labor in Porto Rico. The Socialist Party cast more than a fifth of the total vote in the 1920 election and captured the government of eight important municipalities. It had effected a partial working arrangement with the Republicans (the second party of the island numerically) which promised to develop into an alliance. Then came the Washington trip, the return of the delegation to Porto Rico, and, presto, a joint announcement from the leader of the Republicans and of the Unionists (previously the bitter opponents of the former) calling upon the members of the respective organizations to unite and inviting the Socialists to disband! This remarkable manifesto is attributed by Porto Rico Progress largely to Secretary Weeks and the fear that he expressed to the delegation of the growing power of the Socialists. It is significant also that the manifesto calls upon the American Federation of Labor in Porto Rico to resume "the position of balance and neutrality" occupied by the A. F. of L. in the United States, or to define itself as "a class organization with radical tendencies." Was Mr. Gompers busy also when the Porto Rican delegation was in Washington?

Immanuel Kant, 1724-1924

AN OLD PRINCETON PROFESSOR of philosophy, pounding on his desk, used to begin his courses somewhat as follows: "Gentlemen, is this table real? That may appear to be a very trivial question, but on the answer to it depend God, freedom, and the immortality of the soul." So to many minds the questions that Kant propounded with such baffling elaboration appear quibbling and technical, the aberrations of an ingenious mind absorbed in a marvelous and meaningless intellectual technique. But on the answers to them as Kant gave them depended God, freedom, and immortality, and it is not too much to say that it was to save these that the whole of the "Critique of Pure Reason" came to be written. "How is experience possible?" Kant asked. It is not a problem that would fret many. But upon its answer, Kant thought, depended both the science which the skeptical Hume had almost wrecked and that religious and moral order which had almost been wrecked by science.

There is something almost uncanny about the fame and influence of Immanuel Kant. A quiet little professor in a remote town in East Prussia writes, out of his incredibly learned solitude, a work in a style so barbarous and unreadable that few except technical experts would dare or care to grapple with it. Yet Kant has become a byword for profundity with thousands who do not in the least know in what way he was profound. Writing professedly for professionals, his subtle dialectics were at bottom devoted to the saving of simple Protestant pietism.

It is not in revolutionary science and metaphysics, but in orthodox and simple morals that his influence has been most powerful and pervasive. It is not his elaborate deduction of the categories, not his daring and questionable explosion of space and time, but his moralistic phrase, "the categorical imperative," that is really immortal.

Kant came at a time when empiricism and rationalism, the devotees of observation and the devotees of pure reason, had both been making extravagant claims. With his self-styled Copernican revolution in philosophy he attempted two things: to restore and guarantee the dependability and universality of scientific knowledge and to remove forever the claims of science to reveal or to refute the world of moral law, of immortality, and of God. His technique, despite an elaborate mumbo-jumbo, is essentially simple. The world of nature, of experience, of knowledge has a stable, pervasive, and universal structure, because it conforms to our intuitions of time and space and our categories of understanding. Without time and space, without causation, there would be no experience and no world experienced. Time and space, as Kant ingeniously and dubiously shows, are never to be derived from experience, nor is causation. Yet we can depend on scientific knowledge of the world, because the world has to conform to the a priori lenses through which we see and understand it. The world of nature and of experience thus becomes, for Kant, a phantom, an appearance, a projection of our way of knowing. Its structure and anatomy are the form of our knowledge. The world of experience is thus simply a picture, the appearance of a reality which we can never know. Whatever we know must be conformed, one might say disformed, to the molds and forms through which alone we can have knowledge. There are, however, realities which we can never know, Dinge an sich, including the values which this little Protestant professor cherished with a touching and provincial piety. Science and mechanism were to him the last and lasting word in the sphere of externals, of cause and effect. But in the unknowable world of realities, in the sphere of faith beyond the reach and purview of reason, were God, immortality of the soul, and the invulnerable voice of Duty in the obedient listening to which was freedom. The world of mechanism, of cause and effect, of compulsion was for science. In the world of faith were the God whom we must believe and whom we could never know, the Immortality which we certainly had and could never demonstrate, the Duty which we could never explain and must never doubt or disobey.

Kant thus tried with heroic ingenuity and ingenuous simplicity to separate forever the things of this world and the things of spirit, the realms of science and of faith. The complexion of philosophical thought and method has radically changed since his day. A genetic and psychological method has been substituted for his impressive dialectic. We no longer raise the question: Is experience possible? We attempt to learn from and by experience. The distinction, as Kant drew it, between appearance and reality, has come to seem a piece of futile sophistication. But the great issue that Kant was wrestling with still remains: What is the status of God, freedom, and immortality, which we love, in the world of mechanism in which we of necessity live? Kant may not have answered it, or his answer may now seem irrelevant. But he was honest and searching. And his Three Critiques remain overwhelming monuments of intellectual architecture.

The Genius of Duse

THE great mimes are passing. Few appear to take their places. Perhaps it is because, in truth, there should and need be no one to fill those special places. For in spite of the expressionists and the latest innovators in the art of the theater, the modern actor is primarily servant, interpreter, and sinks himself into the spirit and the character of the artist for whom he speaks.

Such was, obviously enough, not the primary function of the great mimes of the past generation. They used Sardou or even Ibsen as a vehicle for themselves. It is significant that the furious brilliancy of Bernhardt was rarely if ever employed to illuminate a dramatic work that the world will care to remember. It was otherwise with Duse. But when she acted Ellida Wangel or Fru Alving what one thought of was actually neither of these tragic women: what one saw and thought of and dreamed of afterward was Eleonora Duse, her grace, her gestures, her tragic fortunes, her fame, and her transcendence of fame.

Even as John Barrymore has but one role, whether the name of that role is for the moment Fedya or Richard III or Falder or Hamlet; as he is always one whose outward seeming cannot conceal his wounded soul, so Eleonora Duse played upon the instrument of herself, played, with infinite variations, the song of her own heart. She was Latin grace yearning for something beyond itself, the Latin spirit drawn to the strange dreams and conflicts and terrors of the North—the morbidness and strangeness that are of the North, that are romantic in essence, that have no place in the clear light of those Sicilian meadows that Theocritus and Vergil celebrated. When Duse played Ibsen it was as though those meadows, weary of their own sun, their own serenity, dreamed of the icy waters of the fjords. And it was when she played Ibsen that the peculiar character of her temperament and genius stood out in clearer definition than when she played "La Città Morte" or any of those works more native to what, outwardly and most naturally, she seemed to be.

In some such terms as these the genius of Duse may be defined from the point of view of the audiences that will never see her again. For actors she had still another meaning—the meaning of the marvelous liquidness of her movements—the liquidness and inevitableness too. Her way of standing, of sitting, of holding some simple thing like a parasol; of handling a simple drapery like a little shawl—sometimes a poor, dun little shawl—these things were and will be in memory thought about and studied. She was not beautiful. But all the lines she created were beautiful—the line of a gesture, of a posture, of a step, of sitting down, of moving her head.

She is gone and with her an art of the theater that is not likely soon to return. The world is not growing more beautiful nor more preoccupied with Duse's kind of beauty, which is, rightly looked upon, a simple thing. In every age there are pull-backs, eddies of reaction; the main current sweeps on full and strong. What we are after in art, no less than in knowledge, is exactitude, is the characteristic, concrete. To these belong the present and the future that is visible. Those final appearances of Eleonora Duse in America were elegiac in more than a personal sense. They marked her passing; they also marked the passing of an age and an art.

More Conservative and More Radical

By WILLIAM HARD

TO the roving inquirer, journeying and sojourning in East and in West amid the varying social elements and the varying sectional views of this diversified country, it surely must often seem probable, and sometimes indeed certain, that the country today is advancing both toward an increased conservatism and an increased radicalism.

Twenty years ago, when Theodore Roosevelt was wielding the big stick upon the heads of malefactors of great wealth, there was a large element of American small business men filled with a fierce frenzy against trusts and railroads. Today in that element the frenzy is but a pale phantom of its former ruddy self.

Small business men today in unprecedented multitudes are going along happily with the trusts and with the railroads. If Mr. Andrew Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, is a trust magnate, they are not resentful. If the railroads are becoming more prosperous, they are not indignant. Amazingly numerous they join Mr. Mellon in wanting the highest surtaxes of our highest millionaires drastically reduced. Amazingly numerous they join the persuasive managers of the public relations committees of the Eastern railroads and of the Western railroads in wanting railroad income to be amply adequate for the continuous improvement of railroad freight-train service.

To a greater degree than ever before, within the observation of this writer, these small business men have identified their interests with the interests of great corporate wealth. To put it lightly but precisely, they think now that a granting of a Rolls-Royce to others is a small price to pay for the getting of a Buick for themselves.

Accordingly today they are found in line and in harmony with the largest corporations in a common and concerted opposition to what is called "undue" governmental interference with business. This development in business circles is at the same time intensified by a certain widespread popular reaction against governmental interference in fields other than that of commerce and industry.

The Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead law, for instance, have heavily helped to produce conservatives. Contemporary radicalism for the most part hopes to win its way by governmental action. The Volstead law is governmental action. The wets in the United States are a minority. They nevertheless number many millions and they feel deeply on their favorite topic. Every one of them hates a prohibition inspector more than he hates almost anything else in the world. He then begins readily to hate all inspectors. He says to himself and his friends: "Government is going too far; the less we have of it the better."

Thus the enraged wet is added to the consolidated business community as an enemy of governmental expansiveness. So are the outraged scenario-writer and motion-picture spectator who do not want their writings and seeings censored. So are numerous officers of privately owned and privately conducted schools and colleges and universities who think themselves confronted by the threatening prospect of a federal department of education designed to be the systematizer and standardizer of all the educational efforts, public and private, of this whole country.

This tendency deepens and spreads. Meanwhile, however, the contrary tendency in certain other elements also deepens and spreads.

Among these elements are outstandingly the Northwestern farmers and the organized railroad employees. The Northwestern farmers do not recoil from governmental action. Their leaders think nothing of coming forward with plans for governmental corporations empowered to merchandize agricultural products in general and at large, both at home and abroad. Some of these suggested corporations would be authorized not only to deal in wheat and in other great staple crops but also at need to convoy an egg from a barnyard nest to a city pantry in order to supplant and eliminate the felonious middleman.

In this desire to expand the powers and the duties of government and to substitute the idea of service for the idea of profit in certain business fields the Northwestern farmers find congenial allies among the organized railroad employees. The railroad employees liked the federal control of railroads under William Gibbs McAdoo. They hate the present Esch-Cummins Transportation Law. They would have hated any law which restored the railroads to the management of their private owners and which brought federal control to an end. Back of all the criticisms of the Esch-Cummins Transportation Law on the part of the organized railroad employees is the determination to bring federal control in again.

To socialize certain processes of distribution and to socialize railroad transportation—those projects go far beyond any projects outlined by Theodore Roosevelt either in the White House or at Armageddon. In 1912 they were the theories of intellectuals. Today they begin to have the firm backing of large economic groups.

Thus we are more radical now than then. Also, however, through the revolt against high taxes and through the rising resentment against paternalistic legislation, we are more conservative now than then. It is a criss-cross.

Footnote: In the judgment of this writer the new conservatives would make a stronger showing against the new radicals if, besides being unwilling to see the government used as the economic servant of the Northwestern farmers and of the organized railroad employees, they were equally unwilling to see it unused as the economic servant of merchants and manufacturers and bankers. Their moral disadvantage is that when, as in the case of the present Railroad Labor Board, they find a bureaucratic body which they believe is serving their interests, they raise no objections whatsoever to that special sort of governmental interference in business. They gladly accept governmental interference on their side. They object to it usually only when it goes against them. It is difficult accordingly to credit most of them with the philosophic sincerity which animates men like Knight of Ohio or Borah of Idaho, who as genuine Jeffersonian Republicans object to all avoidable governmental expansions irrespective of whether those expansions are demanded by the ins and ups or by the outs and downs.

Shall We Remake the Supreme Court?

I. The Origin of Its Power

By CHARLES WARREN

(One of the most vital issues before the country today is the power exercised by its judiciary, especially by the Supreme Court of the United States. Senator Borah favors a constitutional amendment requiring that at least seven of the nine justices of the Supreme Court shall concur in a decision in order to set aside an act of Congress; Senator La Follette proposes that a two-thirds vote in Congress shall be sufficient to repass and validate any law that the Supreme Court has upset. The Nation publishes below the first of three articles on the power of the Supreme Court and the possibilities of limiting it. The second article will be The Experience of Other Countries, by Charles Grove Haines, and the third A Program for Reform, by Beulah Amidon Ratliff. Simultaneously with the last article of the series there will be an editorial expressing The Nation's views.)

RECENT decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States, holding that Congress has exceeded its authority in passing legislation not warranted by the Constitution, have revived the discussion as to the exercise by the courts of the power of judicial review. It is urged by some that this power to pass upon the validity of acts of Congress, even assuming its legality, should be abolished or limited. By others the lawful existence of the power is absolutely denied; its exercise is said to be a "usurpation"; it is claimed that Congress is the final judge of its right to legislate on any subject; and it is pointed out (apparently under the mistaken notion that English practice would be applicable here) that in England and in most European countries the Parliament is the supreme judge of its own powers.

There is a very necessary reason, however, why in the United States Congress should not be its own final arbiter. Unlike England, the United States has a federal form of government, under which, in the same territory and over the same body of citizens, two distinct governments operate—the National and the State, each limited in its powers by the provisions of the Constitution. One of the most important class of questions which comes before the Supreme Court, therefore, is that in which the claim is advanced by one or the other of the parties to the suit that either Congress or the State legislature has exceeded these limited powers. No such question can come before an English court with respect to acts of Parliament, since no such class of limitations on the powers of Parliament exists.

If the United States possessed no Supreme Court, with authority to say when Congress or a State legislature had trespassed beyond the field assigned to them respectively by the Constitution, then both Congress and the State legislatures would have full power to legislate at their own sweet will, utterly unrestricted by the provisions of the Constitution. And, as a natural and inevitable consequence, Congress, being the mightier body, would prevail in every instance, and national legislation might sweep away all boundaries between the nation and the States in any case in which Congress felt sufficiently strongly the necessity or desirability of so doing. As to the citizens of the States, Congress might violate every one of the Bill of Rights contained in the first ten amendments, and no citizen of a State would have any redress in court. Of the later amendments, each might be violated at will by Congress, if unrestricted by the judiciary; and Congress might, therefore, authorize the sale of intoxicating liquors, in complete violation of the Eighteenth Amendment, or it might directly legislate as to the rights of Negroes in the States, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In other words, instead of a federal government with limited powers, and with complete reservation to the States and their citizens of all other powers and rights, we should have a consolidated government with unlimited powers, and with no rights left to the States and their citizens except such as Congress, in its supreme autocracy, might see fit to leave or to grant to them. That this is no imaginary danger is shown by the fact that Congress has, in the past, enacted at least ten laws violating the Bill of Rights; and the citizens have been protected only because the court has held that the Constitution must prevail in their defense over such laws of Congress.

The voters of this country, if they so desire, have the right, of course, at any time to change the powers and functions of the branches of their government, provided they do it in the method required by the Constitution, i.e., by amendments duly adopted by the necessary votes of Congress and of the States. But when such a change is suggested as the destruction of the most important function of the Supreme Court the voters ought to be made to realize, in advance, that this change means the destruction of their federal form of government. Moreover, arguments in its favor should be based on facts, and not on mere declamation.

Unfortunately, the assault upon the Supreme Court's power of judicial review has heretofore been accompanied by either suppression or absolute misstatement of historical facts. For a number of years past a charge has been that the power of the Supreme Court to pass upon the validity of acts of Congress was a "usurped" power, first exercised by John Marshall, in Marbury vs. Madison, in 1803. The reiteration of this charge has gained it a certain degree of credit. Had either the opponents or the defenders of the court made a thorough examination of the newspapers, pamphlets, debates, and correspondence of the early years of the country they would have found that, far from being regarded as a "usurpation," the court's power of judicial review was acknowledged from the very outset by both political parties; and that when Marshall rendered his famous decision in 1803 he only expressed a view which had been little challenged at all between the years 1789 and 1802.

In the first place, in the debates in the Federal Convention of 1787, this power of the federal judiciary was specifically recognized on several occasions, notably by Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts and Luther Martin of Maryland (both of whom opposed the adoption of the Constitution, though on other grounds), by James Wilson and Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, by James Madison and George Mason of Virginia, and by Hugh Williamson of North Carolina. Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut, William R. Davie of North Carolina, John Blair, Edmund Randolph, and George Wythe of Virginia, Alexander Hamilton of New York, and David Brearly of New Jersey were also members of the convention who expressed themselves in 1787 and 1788 in favor of the power. Its existence was denied by only four members of the convention. Moreover, before the convention met, the legislatures of four States, North Carolina, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and New Hampshire, had passed statutes depriving citizens of the right of jury trial, and these statutes had been set aside by the State courts, in decisions each one of which was known to members of the convention; this example of the necessity of providing a judiciary to safeguard important constitutional rights must have impressed itself upon the members of the convention at the time. Senator La Follette is hardly justified, therefore, in saying that "It is absolutely certain the Constitution would never have been adopted had the men at that time believed that the court they were providing for would assume the powers now exercised by our federal judges."

Before the Constitution was adopted those who opposed it used the existence of the Supreme Court's power of judicial review as an argument against adoption, but they did not challenge the fact of its existence. Thus a prominent writer in the Independent Gazetteer in Philadelphia said February 23, 1788: "Besides, should Congress be disposed to violate the fundamental articles of the Constitution . . . still it would be of no avail as there is a further barrier interposed . . . namely, the Supreme Court of the Union, whose province it would be to determine the constitutionality of any law that may be controverted. . . . It would be their sworn duty to refuse their sanction to laws made in the face and contrary to the letter of the Constitution." As soon as the new Government was started a New York correspondent of the London Public Advertiser, October 19, 1789, wrote specifically that the court was to exercise a right of judicial review of acts of Congress as follows: "The judicial power is established for the benefit of foreigners, and will be a check on any encroachment by the State or the United States on the Constitution. They have the power of declaring void any law infringing it."

Senator Ladd of North Dakota has recently written: "One thing is certain, and that is that the Congress which enacted the Judiciary Act of 1789 never dreamed that it would be at any time so construed as to be the instrument of judicial usurpation." This is an illustration of loose statements made without any examination of the historical facts. For the very Congress to which the Senator refers, the First Congress, at its first session, is on record as not only recognizing but welcoming the court's power of judicial review—not as a "usurpation" but as an existing and desirable function. In June, 1789, a bill was discussed in the House making the Secretary of Foreign Affairs removable by the President. Objection being raised to the constitutionality of this measure, it was emphatically contended by congressmen from the Southern States and by Anti-Federalists that Congress ought not to legislate, since the question of the President's power to remove was one which must be settled by the judiciary. Abraham Baldwin of Georgia said: "It is their province to decide upon our laws, and if they find them to be unconstitutional, they will not hesitate to declare it so." John Page of Virginia said that the Constitution ought to be left "to the proper expositors of it"—the judges. William Smith of South Carolina stated that the question of the President's right of removal should be "left to the decision of the judiciary." Alexander White of Virginia said: "I would rather the judiciary should decide the point because it is more properly within their department"; and again: "I imagine the legislature may construe the Constitution with respect to the powers annexed to their department, but subject to the decision of the judges." It remained, however, for Elbridge Gerry, one of the strongest of the Anti-Federalists, to assert most clearly that "The Judges are the constitutional umpire on such questions. . . . We are not the expositors of the Constitution. The judges are the expositors of the Constitution and acts of Congress. Our exposition, therefore, would be subject to their revisal. The judiciary may disagree with us and undo what all our efforts have labored to accomplish."

Two years later, in February, 1791, in the same Congress, there occurred in the House a heated debate on the right of Congress to charter a corporation, the first bank of the United States. This right was not given to Congress in specific language by the Constitution; and its existence was violently denied by the Anti-Federalists, by Madison and Jefferson, and by those who later became the Democratic Party. It was earnestly upheld by the Federalists. The Anti-Federalists in Congress argued against the passage of the bill on the ground that, even if passed, the Supreme Court would be bound, and ought, to hold it unconstitutional. The Federalists cited the possession of such a power by the court as an argument in favor of the passage of the bill, for, they said, if Congress errs in so passing it, the court will correct the error. "The last objection is that, adopting the bill, we expose the measure to be considered and defeated by the judiciary of the United States, who may adjudge it to be contrary to the Constitution and therefore void," said Elias Boudinot. "This gives me no uneasiness. I am so far from contravening this right in the judiciary that it is my boast and my confidence. . . . It is the glory of the Constitution that there is a remedy even for the failures of the supreme legislature thereof."

Thus, in these early congresses, both parties upheld the court's power of judicial review; there was no talk of "usurpation," but rather a demand that the court should exercise an acknowledged power.

One year later, another act of Congress and the question of its power to pass it actually came before the judges of the court in the famous Hayburn Case, in April, 1792. The case involved a subject on which the American public was considerably wrought up—the pensioning of its much-neglected invalid veterans—a subject which is by no means unfamiliar today. Congress had passed a statute imposing on the justices of the Supreme Court the duty of examining and passing on these pensioners' claims with a final right of review by the Secretary of War. A refusal to assume the duties thus imposed by Congress was likely to bring odium on the judges and to alienate popular sympathy. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court justices, sitting in the United States Circuit Court in Pennsylvania, unhesitatingly proceeded to hold the act of Congress unconstitutional, on the ground that the duties directed to be performed were not of a judicial nature. Here was a subject and an occasion when, if ever, we should expect to find charges of judicial usurpation, and especially from the Anti-Federalists, who were particularly opposed to all extensions of federal power. But on an examination of the newspapers of the time, the curious fact appears that it was the Anti-Federalist press which especially supported this exercise of judicial power. Thus, the violent opponent of federalism and supporter of Thomas Jefferson, Freneau's National Gazette, not only applauded the decision but expressed the hope that the court might hold other federal legislation unconstitutional. It stated that the judges' action "must be matter of high gratification to every friend of liberty, since it assures the people of ample protection to their constitutional rights and privileges against any attempt of legislative or executive oppression." The Anti-Federalists evidently regarded the court as a great source of protection to the people against encroachments of power by Congress. It was the Congress whose usurpation they feared, not the court. The Federalists had always upheld the court. Here again, as early as 1792, was an instance of support of the court's action by both parties.

In 1796 the validity of the federal carriage tax was argued before the court and upheld by it; but the Anti-Federalists, particularly in the South, not only did not deny the court's power to hold the tax unconstitutional but were exceedingly anxious that it should so hold. So in 1799 and 1800 the Anti-Federalists were insistent that the court should hold the Alien and Sedition laws unconstitutional, and bitterly attacked the judges for failing to so hold.

Conclusive disproof of the charge of usurpation may be found also on an examination of the current literature of the years from 1789 to 1802. Had there been any great popular discontent at the exercise of power by the judiciary, it would have revealed itself in letters or editorials in prominent Anti-Federalist papers like the Aurora in Philadelphia, the American Citizen in New York, the Virginia Argus in Richmond, or the Independent Chronicle in Boston, for the columns of these papers teemed with attacks upon every other alleged "outrage" or "usurpation" committed by Federalist officials and by Federalist judges. Yet these newspapers, and similar partisan journals of less wide circulation, contain (with the exception of letters from Charles Pinckney of South Carolina) practically no evidence of any challenge of judicial power between the years 1789 and 1802.

It was not until the latter year, 1802, in the midst of a bitter political fight over the federalist change of the judiciary system, enacted in the closing days of President Adams's Administration, that the power of the court to hold acts of Congress invalid was for the first time challenged by senators and congressmen from Virginia, Kentucky, and North Carolina, but from those States alone.

It was just one year after this debate that Marshall rendered his decision in the famous case of Marbury vs. Madison, holding a section of the Judiciary Act unconstitutional—the action which has, in the last few years, been termed a "usurpation." Widespread newspaper publicity was given to this decision in 1803. It was printed in full in many papers; and a résumé of the opinion, published in Washington in Jefferson's administration organ, the National Intelligencer, was copied into all papers of any consequence. An extensive examination of the papers opposed to Marshall in politics reveals practically no criticism of the exercise of the power of the court to set aside an act of Congress. Jefferson himself did not then attack the decision on this ground, but assailed it because of Marshall's attempt to interfere with the President's executive authority by even considering the question of issuing a mandamus to a cabinet officer.

It was not until a desire to get rid of the federalist judges by impeachment took hold of the Anti-Federalist politicians, in 1804, that talk of judicial usurpation became at all rife; and then it was based on politics and not on legal discussion or historical facts.

Opponents of the court now make much use of certain letters of Thomas Jefferson in which he attacked the court as being the "subtle sappers and miners constantly working underground to undermine the foundation of our confederated fabric"; "the inroads daily making by the federal court"; "that body ever acting with the noiseless foot and unalarming advance." But in these letters (written from 1819 to 1823, when he was an old man of eighty) Jefferson was not referring at all to the court's action in holding acts of Congress invalid; on the contrary, he was referring to the wide scope of power which the court was giving to Congress by upholding acts of Congress as against the sovereignty of the States. He was complaining because the court failed to deny the power of Congress. This fact is carefully concealed by the court's assailants in quoting these letters. So far from denying the court's power, Jefferson was exceedingly anxious that the Alien and Sedition laws, the act of Congress chartering the Bank of the United States, and the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act, authorizing writs of error to State courts, should all be held unconstitutional by the court.

It is impossible, therefore, to regard as a "usurpation" by John Marshall the exercise of a function which was recognized and supported by both the political parties of his own time.

The fact is that it was not encroachments by the court on Congress which alarmed Jefferson and his adherents from 1801 to 1823, or the Democrats of the 1830's and 1840's; it was encroachments by Congress on the sovereignty of the States, upheld by decisions of the court, which they feared. Then when the year 1850 arrived, and the passage of the Fugitive Slave law, there immediately arose the most violent attack on the court in all our history—but this time made by the Republicans and Abolitionists—an attack which continued for ten years, not because the court denied the constitutionality of that act but because it refused to do so.

With the charge of "usurpation" thus cleared away, the question as to the possession of the power of judicial review by the court may be considered simply on its merits, i. e., from the point of view of the necessity and desirability of its exercise.

It is true that the Constitution does not expressly vest this power in the court; but it is also true that it vests no other powers in the court. While the Constitution vests in a Congress "all legislative powers hereby granted," thereby specifically defining and restricting the power of Congress, it vests "the judicial power" in a Supreme Court and inferior courts, without any definition or restriction of the court's powers at all, and simply states to what class of cases their jurisdiction shall extend. In other words, while Congress has only limited powers, the Supreme Court has all powers which are inherently necessary to enable the court to function, as a court, in a federal form of government with a written constitution. It impliedly possesses, therefore, the power of judicial review, just as the President impliedly possesses power of removal of officers—a power not expressly granted by the Constitution, but inherent in the term “the executive power,” which the Constitution vests in “a President.” As John Marshall said in 1803:

It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each. So if the law be in opposition to the Constitution; if both the law and the Constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformable to the law, disregarding the Constitution; or conformable to the Constitution, disregarding the law; the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty.

As to the desirability of the court's function, that will depend upon whether the citizens of this country wish to retain the federal form of government, under which they have existed for 134 years, or whether they wish to live under a consolidated and autocratic government by Congress, with States and citizens possessing no right or power save such as Congress sees fit to leave to them. To abolish the court's power of judicial review means to destroy the former form of government and to institute the latter.

Finally, we should never lose sight of one fact, which is often obscured, owing to the loose use of language too often indulged by courts and lawyers as well as by laymen. The court does not “veto” an act of Congress; it does not in reality hold it void. The decision rendered by the court in a case involving a federal statute is not a mere decision that the statute is valid or invalid; it is a determination of the rights of two parties actually litigating before it, the one claiming a personal or property right based on the law as found in the statute, the other claiming his right under the law of the Constitution. The court, in deciding which of these two parties shall prevail, must of necessity hold that the superior law fixes the rights of the parties, and that the other law, if conflicting, must be disregarded.

To those who urge that the court should be prevented from thus deciding the rights of parties litigating before the court, the question has been very strikingly put by a president of the American Bar Association, John W. Davis:

Shall we say that when an American stands before the court demanding rights given him by the supreme law of the land the court shall be deaf to his appeal? Shall wrongs visited upon him by the illegal excesses of congresses or legislatures be less open to redress than those which he may suffer from courts, or sheriffs, or military tyrants, or civilian enemies? If this be so, if in any such case the ears of the court are to be closed against him, it is not the power of the court that has been reduced but the dearly bought right of the citizen that is taken away.

Man and His Young World

By HARLOW SHAPLEY

LET us get off our planet and look in at the earthy mess. Let us try to evaluate this mixture of biological and physical conflicts in the light of the stars—in the light of those parts of the universe that best exemplify stability and endurance. In other words, we shall seek perspective and orientation. First we shall consider the position and duration, in the physical inanimate universe, of the organism man. Then let us note his place in the biological world. Finally, quite disillusioned, I hope, and discouraged, perhaps, let us grope about a bit for a working philosophy.

As to the relation of the organism to the physical world, the astronomer can easily set us thinking—thinking thoughts that are long and sadly inspiring. Personally, I am somewhat bored by the astronomical insistence that the material world is big and hard. I cheerfully accept that this universe is a hard one—but it is the only one we have. I would not match my strength against the physical powers of earth. Even Mohammed, you remember, had certain difficulties with a mountain.

The thing that appalls me is not the bigness of the universe, but the smallness of us. We are in all ways small—little in foresight, shriveled in spirit, minute in material content, microscopic in the vastness of measured space, evanescent in the sweep of time—inconsequential in every respect, except, perhaps, in the chemical complexities of our mental reactions. In that alone our advance may surpass that of other terrestrial organisms.

But the sanctity of all protoplasm has practically disappeared in this, the heroic age of the physical sciences, when knowledge of the material universe, its content, structure, and dimensions, has so completely overthrown egocentrism. It should sufficiently deflate the organism, you would think, to find that his fountain of energy, the sun, is a dwarf star among thousands of millions of stars; to find that the star around which his little parasitic earth willlessly plods is so far from the center of the known stellar universe that sunlight, with its incomprehensibly high velocity, cannot reach that center in a thousand generations of vain men.

The deflation, however, is not stopped at that point. We now reach much deeper into space than a few years ago, find millions of stars mightier than our sun, find greater velocities, larger masses, higher temperatures, longer durations than we have previously known. Even more illuminating, in this orientation of organisms in the physical universe, is the revelation that the earth, whose surface we infest, is not a parcel of grand antiquity. Rather recently, as astronomers now measure time, a singular incident happened in the life-history of the sun. Before that time the earth was not, nor were the animals of the earth. Nevertheless, for trillions of years, in the absence of the “Lords of all Creation,” the stars had poured out their radiant energy, the celestial bodies had rolled on, law had governed the universe. Before that event, you and I, the material of our bodies, were electrons and atoms in the solar atmosphere. Since then we have been associated with the inorganic and organic evolution of a smaller concern.

The earth, as I have intimated, appeared only a few thousand million years ago. Our sun, it seems, had already passed its prime of radiance when in its wanderings through celestial space it met up with another star—a stellar romance—a marriage made in the heavens. From that affair—realistic astronomers call it an encounter—the planets of the sun were born. The passing star, ruffling up the exterior of the sun, detached some relatively small fragments of the solar atmospheres. Now we strut on one of the surviving fragments and wonder and speculate and discuss: "How can we better the world?" Crown of absurdities—we repairing the world! That cast-out fragment, the ancestor from which and on which we descend, was composed wholly of gas! An emblem for us, that ancestral hot vapor—"How can we straighten out the world?"

The gaseous planet quickly liquefied as out in cold space it began its tireless revolutions around the parent sun. Soon after a crust formed, and, we may thank our lucky stars, the distance from the sun was right, the atmospheric and crustal chemistry was right, and other adjustments of the physical environment happened to be suitable for an elaboration of chemical reactions. The energy of the everflowing sunlight aided in complexifying this protoplasmic chemistry, a green mold formed in spots on the planet, and here we are—parasites on the energy of the sun that cast us forth. How can we better the world?

So far the scientist has let us down rather gently. We are, it seems, merely nothing, born of disaster. But it is a distinction to be discussed along with stars. We proceed, however, to a comparison with cockroaches and ants; we shall seek biological perspective.

Man, as a species, has had a short and brilliant career on the face of the earth. From ape-like ancestry to the editorial board of The Nation is at most a few million years. There are some cynics who think it is much less than that. Thousands of other species of animals besides homo sapiens have also risen rapidly to a high specialization, and then ceased to be. They paid for their brilliance with extinction. The dinosaurs lasted but a single era in geological history; they rose to a great climax of size, laid their eggs, and were gathered unto their fathers. They left no lineal descendants.

But the cockroach has a straight-line ancestry of two hundred million years or more. His is a stock sufficiently strong to carry him through numerous terrestrial upheavals, through desiccations and glaciations—and the cockroach today is just as good as he ever was. He and many other types of paleozoic animals so successfully adjusted themselves to the bitter universe that they have attained an enviable persistence. They had lived for ages before the sun passed the Orion nebula. They were well attuned with physical law and the environment's seeming caprice.

Still more instructive, in our problem of perspective, are social insects, such as the bees, the wasps, and the ants. Long before eocene time the ants had so fully and firmly developed a social system—a system involving military and worker castes, instinctive altruism, birth restriction, communism, food conservation—that even now, fifty million years later, their descendants can carry on as of old with the assurance of an ample future. "Go to the ant, thou sociological sluggard," a great authority almost said. Many an intriguing lesson can there be learned, but not always adapted to the transient civilizations of man. In reasonable harmony with the physical restrictions and with the biotic world are these persistent societies of ants. Theirs is, I claim, a splendid social development—the work is all done by the females! The males, when they are permitted to exist at all, are mainly decorative. The governmental details are in the hands and antennae of widows and spinsters.

Biologically, it seems, we are as inexperienced as physically we are frail. Moreover, we are hampered with brains. We have mentality to burn, and many of us do burn it, at both ends. Our more or less primitive bodies cannot keep up in the evolutionary progress with our abnormal mentalities.

So much for the perspective. How about foreign policy within the species? For man to attempt salvation through physical force seems absurd. The panaceas that ignore the immutable physical rules are to be classed among man's minor futilities. Probably my view is of no interest whatever to Arcturus, nor to the nitrogen molecule, nor to the descendants of the beautiful Paleodictyoperids recently exhumed from the lower Permian in Kansas. It may be of interest, however, to the organisms who have read thus far. Take it as the view of a transient fellow-parasite who uses physical science habitually, and the stars, as points to look in from.

There is a fundamental drift, essentially unidirectional, in this universe—a drift that is partially comprehended or felt by man, beast, vegetable, star, and matter. It is a tendency that seems more significant than space or time or atoms or protoplasm or knowledge. It is, in a sense, Law. It is, perhaps, recognized by you (according to your various inherited traditions and spiritual tenets) as the Tendency or Evolution or God or Fate or the Will to Live or the Second Principle of Thermodynamics. I would call it the Drift and resist the impulse to define it. It is the Drift that dissipates all the available energy of the universe, that runs down the heat supplies toward an eternal cold, that gathers stars into states of equilibrium, that evolves complicated organisms on the face of propitious planets, that impels even us vaguely to aspire.

The keyword of the Drift, in the animal world, is survival—survival of the individual, of the species, of protoplasm. The individual, alas, is doomed! One revolution of Neptune, and you and your children and your children's children will be laid aside. The individual is not worth troubling about (in our cooperation with the Drift) except in so far as he contributes through deed, thought, or progeny to the survival of the species. Our concern mainly should be with the species—can it survive? It has no chance against the stars, of course; but can it long hold its own as a surviving form, or be ancestral to surviving forms, against other organisms, against primitive microbes and advanced insects? There is a fair chance, an optimistic scientist would say, if it were not that man's worst enemy is man.

The cockroach survives because it stands pat on form—it avoids experimental progress. Man, however, cannot stand still. He is delicately balanced in an unstable chemical complex; his abnormal mentality has led him to create an environment in which stagnation means extinction. Survival of the species appears to depend upon uninterrupted progress. Resignation is cowardice. Bended knees cannot help. The continued development of the reasoning intellect—our one conspicuous advantage—seems to be the only possibility.

Our policy toward foreign organisms should therefore be, according to this interpretation, one that looks directly toward man's survival. If you believe that savage and un-intellectual mankind has a better opportunity in the existing implacable, man-made environment, then you should proceed to promote savagery and eliminate the intellectual. If war stands for continuation and upward transformation of the species, aim to encourage it.

On these points the stellar perspective is clear. Proto-plasm appears trivial and transient; but for man, the Drift prescribes progress and survival. If progression halts, we go to join the dinosaurs. If stagnation enters, in a million years or so, by the light of those undisturbed stars that heed life not at all, some conservative cockroach, crawling over the fossilized skull of an extinct primate, may be able to observe: "A relic here of another highly specialized organism which failed to recognize the laws of the universe, which preferred the current minor whims to the search for survival, and which missed its great opportunity to inherit the planet, perishing an early victim of the world's subtle chemistries."

Revolutionary Christianity

By ALEXANDER STEWART

"I HAVE the conviction that something is going to happen, that history is going to be made, and that it behooves red-blooded men to get in if they are going to be leaders and not followers." This prophecy made by a prominent Methodist layman, prior to the National Conference of Methodist Students, proved true.

The more than five hundred students who came together at Louisville, Kentucky, April 18-20, to study "Methodism's part in the world's task and how we, as students, may relate ourselves to that task," came as representatives of the 110,000 Methodist students in the colleges and universities of the United States. Their earnest, sincere desire to challenge present social evils, with the searching test of Jesus's way of life amazed the older men present. Again and again old "wheel-horses" of Methodist conference experience gasped at the ease with which these alert young people disposed of knotty problems with a minimum of delay or ill-feeling. This conference demonstrated that there is a student movement in America, that students are not only ready for but are demanding a place of leadership in our national and international life.

The youth of the church had felt the need of a conference to set forth some of the things which they believed the Methodists should do at their General Conference in May. Young people the world over are questioning much of the so-called guidance of their elders. They are demanding a right to stand on their own feet. "If the older generation had been right on any important point," they say, "why has it got the world into its present state of misery and fear? The world is in a mess. How shall we put it right unless we are first prepared to discover where and why it is wrong? In order to discover this, we must inevitably challenge old standards and ask for a reason to be given why we should accept them."

Church unity, industry, race, and war were each examined, in turn, in the light of the teachings of Jesus. The result of the examination was none too comfortable for the status quo. The committee appointed to frame resolutions on the industrial situation returned a statement filled with the usual platitudinous generalities, a product of what some call the "Epworth-League mind." The delegates simply repudiated it and demanded that the committee give them something with "teeth" in it. They returned a resolution which was adopted unanimously, the more important points of which were: To work for continuous employment for labor; to support a constitutional amendment on child labor; to stand against the use of the injunction in industrial disputes as a violation of the rights of citizenship; to support the increased socialization and control of public utilities; and to place the Methodist Book Concern on a basis of service rather than profit.

The discussion of race questions quickly centered on the Ku Klux Klan and its policy of "White Supremacy." The high light in this discussion was the ringing denouncement of the Klan Creed by Susie Ward Robertson of North Carolina Woman's College. In a fervent protest that the basic principles of the Klan are unchristian she swept the audience into a storm of applause. Defenders of the Klan asserted that opponents of "White Supremacy" failed to understand the interpretation of that phrase. The resolution finally adopted on race condemned the activities of any organizations in the United States which thrive upon the stimulation of racial or religious prejudices, without specifying any by name. In even the hottest debate upon the race question, the spirit of self-control and right-seeking was prevalent.

The challenge of war to the Church of Christ and to the youth of America was answered decisively. To do justice to the militaristic elements in the church an opportunity was given to Major Addams, national advocate of the American Legion, to present the appeal of nationalism to the student conference. His presentation was exceedingly effective. In the forum which followed the address, however, his argument was warmly challenged. Several of the delegates who had been ex-service men and are now pacifists asked for proof of the major's assertion that most pacifists are cowards and that pacifist propaganda comes from bolshevik sources. Others inquired if God and Uncle Sam are always to be identified. Major Addams stood his ground, but had difficulty in answering the fusillade of questions. The three student speakers on the war question handled it so successfully that Professor Holmes of Swarthmore, who was to answer Major Addams, declared that his job had been done for him.

The resolutions dealing with war adopted by these students included:

1. A memorial urging the Christian church never to bless or sanction another war.
2. An indorsement of the Council of Cities' memorial to the Methodist General Conference, which declares "unalterable opposition on the part of our church to the entire war system—economic exploitation, imperialism, and militarism," and recommends "that we dedicate anew our life and resources to the building of a world brotherhood."
3. A resolution that the Methodist church should immediately set as its aim the abolition of military training in all its colleges and universities.

4. A resolution by the ex-service men present that other Methodist ex-service men show all tolerance for those working for the cause of peace.

Following the resolutions a motion was made to take a census of student attitudes toward war, preparedness, and pacifism. The votes ran: Preparedness—31 in favor of it as an effective means of preserving peace; 197 against it; 99 non-committal. Pacifism—79 for it as an effective means of keeping peace; 106 against it; 141 non-committal. At the request of certain delegates who felt that the wording of the statement on preparedness did not represent their point of view, a vote was taken on the question of the advisability of preparedness for defense. For it 132 voted, against it 101, and 64 were non-committal.

Thus the Methodist students have made a serious and significant attempt to apply the principles of their religion to the world in which they live. They are beginning to realize the gap between modern life and those principles. For some time there have been weak expressions of a desire to do just this thing. We have long been told the principles of Jesus contain social dynamite and that they are dangerous to the security of entrenched greed. If this is true, it is for the young people of the church to dare apply this test to our pagan civilization.

Germany Throws the Dice

By FRITZ KUMMER

ON May 4 a new German Reichstag will be elected, to serve four years. Never was electoral propaganda more rabid in Germany, never did the newspapers, paper trumpets of the parties, blare so loudly, or so many candidates seek to win the favor of the voters. When pictures and caricatures and cinemas were used for electoral propaganda before the war people declared in horrified tones that Germany was being "Americanized." The term is no longer adequate to the intensity of political excitement. No election in German history has ever been so important; for all parties know that the issue for the German republic is—to be or not to be.

The voters lose the fundamental question in a mist of words. It is not easy for the average German citizen to cast his vote wisely. The English have been practicing democratic politics for two centuries, the Germans not ten years. Between elections political parties mean very little to the average citizen, and when an election draws near he is bewildered by the fog of speeches, programs, and parties. Further, he has to choose not from two or three parties but from twenty-five! Germany has never before known such a wealth of parties, and one may dare prophesy that it will never happen again. Most of the twenty-five parties will die even more rapidly than they were born. Most of them owe their existence to the reaction, which acts upon the ancient maxim: Divide and rule! If this maxim serves, the fledgling parties will return, after the election, to the old nest, and the deputies of the new parties will vote as their reactionary parent-parties tell them to.

Yet it is probable that the next Reichstag will have the same seven principal parties as the old. The last elections produced the following results:

	Votes	Deputies
Reactionary parties	Deutsch-Völkische ?	3
	Nationalist 3,740,000	66
	People's 3,610,000	62
Middle parties	Centrum 4,779,000	89
	Democratic 2,202,000	45
Labor parties	Social Democratic 10,512,000	173
	Communist 441,000	18
Various	800,000	10
	<hr/> 26,084,000	<hr/> 466

There is a tendency in German politics to pay less attention to the individual parties and to classify the votes in two great groups: the bourgeois and the proletarian. The last election gave the bourgeois groups 58.5 per cent and the working-class groups 41.5 per cent.

Of course this is a summary method of classification. It is not true to say that the bourgeois parties form a "single reactionary mass" or that the working-class parties have the same nature and goal. There are important differences. We can note only the sharpest distinctions here.

Three parties can be classed as unqualifiedly reactionary. In Kaiser days they formed the ruling class and supplied the Reich with its ministers, officials, and army officers. They changed their names after the revolution of 1918 in the vain hope of wiping out unpleasant memories. They still face toward the past, toward the days when the laws, the courts, the administration, and the police worked together for them. They all hate the republic, which took away their special privileges, their dominant power, and their joy in life. They strive to end the republic and to establish a "strong Germany," a military state with a monarchical head, in which the workers will take their proper place as servants of a ruling caste. Yet like as these three parties are, they seek their goal by different methods. The Völkische, the most violently nationalist in philosophy, in which ex-officers are dominant, is devoted to the fascist method; the People's Party, which unites big business and the war profiteers, believes the trade unions to be the strongest bulwark against the monarchy and seeks to destroy them; and the Nationalists, who include the great land-owners and conservative Junkers, form a bridge between Völkische and People's Party.

The Centrum is the political expression of the Catholic population and the Democrats represent the liberal part of the middle classes (bankers, merchants, manufacturers, doctors, teachers, engineers). These two middle parties are usually considered as bulwarks of the republic. Their republican sentiment, however, first manifested itself after the republic had been proclaimed; previously they had cautiously criticized the monarchy without calling for its abolition. When the revolutionary wave swept away the monarchist house of cards they "accepted the facts" and worked, if hesitatingly, for the development of the new democratic state. Whether their republicanism will stand a storm remains to be proved. Each party is torn by a conflict between capitalist and proletarian philosophies. The Centrum includes the Catholic employers and their near-Socialist employees, and is blown now in one direction, now in the other. The Democrats are torn by the same conflict between bankers and merchants, on the one hand, and white-collar workers on the other. The side which shows most ability and contributes most heavily to the party treasury is likely to dominate in such a situation, and that is usually the conservative. Neither party has any real reason to wish a return to monarchy—their members had slight chance for advancement under the old regime—but they are afraid of a socialist republic dominated by the working class. This fear has led them to wish to include the Right parties in the government coalitions as an offset to the Socialists, and has been responsible for most of the German government crises, and thereby for the weakening of the republic.

The most progressive hand-workers and petty officials form the bulk of the working-class parties, and considerable numbers of small tradesmen, peasants, and white-collar workers are associated with them. The Communist Party follows the leadership of Moscow; it is opposed to democracy and exalts the dictatorship of the proletariat. Whether the Communists will be able to pursue a positive democratic policy in the absence of the possibility of such a dictatorship remains to be seen. The Socialists are the surest support of the republic; they have a well-developed party machinery, innumerable officials, and 150 daily newspapers. The vast majority of the trade unionists belong to them, and to their millions of members is due credit for the survival of the republic. Whenever the reaction attempts to overthrow the republic it is met in every town and street by the determined masses of the Socialist workers. A return to monarchy is possible only if the Social-Democratic Party can be destroyed, and the reactionaries, therefore, concentrate all their hate, their anger, and their talent in combating and calumniating it and its trade unions. But if the Social Democrats are too revolutionary for the Right they are too reactionary for the Communists, for they reject the theory of dictatorship and see salvation only in democracy and believe that military methods are worth far less than the political education and intellectual development of the working class. The Social Democratic Party, like the others, is passing through a crisis. Younger and more vigorous men are replacing the old leaders, and the philosophy of the party is being remodeled.

The political prophets are as busy as the politicians. They foresee great gains for the two extreme parties, the Völkische and the Communists; some say that the former will have 60 deputies instead of 3, and the latter 50 instead of 18. Certainly these parties will gain, though perhaps not so much. There are many reasons for this sweep to the extremes. The war and its miserable aftermath, the Versailles treaty, the occupation of the Ruhr, inflation, economic crises, the pauperization of the middle classes, and the impoverishment of the industrial proletariat combined with the hesitating and helpless policy of the parties which have for five years formed the successive governments have led large circles of the population to a discontent which borders on despair. Things cannot be worse, they say, and thoughtlessly turn to the parties which carelessly promise betterment by the use of force. The politically untrained expect from force what a pacific policy has failed to win. The desperate members of the middle class turn to fascist methods; the desperate, hungry workers to the Communist program of dictatorship. And as things stand now only a bitter experience can undeceive them.

If one rises above party politics one sees that while the German parties changed their signboards after the revolution they retained the old political ideas and leaders. These could not meet the needs of the new democratic era, and the parties have been going through a process of transformation. Gradually—slowly, but clearly—a division along economic lines has been taking place; both political and economic contrasts have been accentuated in the last five years. The consciousness has been growing that a solution of the difficult problems which trail after the war and the peace is impossible if what is politically the freest democracy in the world is at the same time ruled economically by the old, brutal, short-sighted autocracy. The new democracy cannot meet the needs of the state and of the people because it is faced by an omnipotent economic autocracy. Unless the democracy succeeds in controlling industry the economic autocracy will control the democracy, and eventually democratic rights and liberties will give way to the old system.

There are great things at stake in this election—the fate of the German people, democracy or autocracy, whether a new Germany shall really rise or the old return. In recent months the conflict between democracy and autocracy has come to the verge of open conflict; on May 4 the voters will be called upon with their votes to award the decision.

In the Driftway

AT last something new under the sun. The kitchen-slavey has become the economic barometer of Europe. During the last years most of the Drifter's friends in the neutral countries of the Old Continent had provided themselves with German cooks and German parlor-maids. They came cheap. The guilder and the crown and the Swiss franc were worth one or two billion marks, and the faithful handmaidens flocked to Copenhagen and Stockholm and Amsterdam by the wagon-load. And the Drifter, remembering excellent meals at hospitable houses, used to end his correspondence with Danish and Dutch friends with a tribute to the excellent Mädchen who dwelt in the Küche. But this chapter of domestic migration now belongs to the past. Three letters recently say that the Mädchen are gone and the mademoiselles have come. The rentenmark went up. The franc went down. The Friedas and Elsas and Berthas hastened home. The Maries and Berthes and Paulines went forth into voluntary exile among the barbarians. If this exchange business lasts only long enough all the little kids of Europe will become polyglots. But what constitution can stand the sudden change from Arme Ritter to Crêpes Suzette and—who knows—to Yorkshire pudding?

* * * *

THE Drifter's faith in the plain people of these United States has revived since he read that the crowds which jammed Pennsylvania Station to greet President Coolidge and Jack Dempsey were tiny compared with the hordes which gathered to celebrate the homecoming of the bobbed-haired bandit. There was a girl with the old frontier blood in her veins! Scientifically trained athlete and a secret-service-guarded statesman seem pale indeed beside such a wild, red girl, quick on the trigger, adventuresome, cool, courageous. It was just nine days after her baby was born that she faced the detectives who broke down her door in Florida, and four days after the child's death. But she did not whimper; she faced the detectives, as she later faced the more exacting reporters, with a smile; and when arraigned in court she refused the formality of a lawyer. The Drifter is, on the whole, a law-abiding soul, but he has a venerable admiration for her youthful revolt, and he wishes he had been in the front rank of the crowd that cheered her arrival. It may be that she is merely an amoral moron, but if the courts will be finicky the Drifter would prefer to have them put the Daughtertys and Sinclairs in jail and leave the young things free.

* * * * *

THE Drifter reads in the New York World an advertisement which says: "Within the next ten days a petition will be offered looking forward to the allotment of opposite sides of the streets to opposite sexes. Slow-moving women impede progress of busy MEN." All men who favor "Giving East Side of All Streets to MEN" are asked to sign their names and return the coupon. The Drifter passes this on willingly to his friends of the male sex. For himself, he never hurries, nor could he possibly be classed with "busy MEN," so that he dares not sign the petition himself. Moreover, he has received another petition which conflicts a little with the above. It is from a young woman who claims that it represents the sentiments of 98 per cent of her sex, and it reads: "Within the next nine days a petition will be offered looking forward to the allotment of half of the mirrors in chewing-gum boxes to WOMEN. At present they cannot reach a mirror without standing in line behind the men who are straightening their neckties." The Drifter does not yet know what the lady's comment will be to the suggestion about sidewalks; the petition seems to belie the "Tired Business Man" slogan; or can it be that the business man is tired, first, because he walks too fast, and, second, because he looks at his own image too often?

Correspondence

Against Compromise

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read with interest the two letters in your issue of March 26 regarding the conditions for release accepted by some of the political prisoners at Leavenworth. As I was one of the politicals (released last November 17, on expiration of sentence) I feel it my duty to state the facts as I know them. It seems to me a matter of deep concern and regret that Mr. Ward's letter, defending the position of the Civil Liberties Union, ignored all the fundamentals. Similarly, Mr. DeSilver's letter in your issue of January 2, I think, did not do justice to the ethical and spiritual aspect of the matter as a whole—the loyalty to principle of those who refused to sign away any phase of civil rights. The terms offered by the Government were: "If he [the prisoner] violate any of the foregoing conditions, of which the President shall be the sole judge, he, the President, may revoke," etc., "and return the prisoner to prison to complete his original sentence." This plainly put a man so released on a lifetime parole. Those who accepted these conditions definitely signed away the hard-won and now widely threatened civil right of public trial by jury, and to that degree undermined all civil liberty.

One not a member of an organization definitely pledged to uphold civil liberties, or a man pledged only to uphold liberty of individual choice or conscience, or one seeking merely to get men out of prison on any terms, ethical or not, might countenance such signing away of civil liberty, or condone it, by treating those who did so as equally entitled to support. (Mr. Ward's letter says plainly that the Civil Liberties Union "worked equally" for these as well as the others.) But it seems to me that no clear-minded person could call this upholding "civil liberties."

Mr. Ward says that "no effort was made to destroy the group's solidarity." I think that mere justice would require that the prisoners' statements as to what was said and written to them should at least be accorded equal weight by anyone who really desires the truth. To my mind the point to be emphasized is that while those who countenanced the signing away of certain civil liberties may claim credit for the release of those who did sign these away, the uncompromised and unconditional release of those who refused all compromise was due solely to their own courage and loyalty. It seems to many rather a petty and unworthy attitude not to have generously accorded this, their due, to men who gave six years of their lives in support of civil liberties—in some cases their whole lives: William Weyh has recently died of tuberculosis contracted in prison.

To me the gravest aspect in the whole situation is that the deepest, the spiritual values are apparently unsensed and ignored.

The Dawes Plan

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Let me emphasize my sincere admiration for the high structural and operative qualities of the Dawes presentment. It is a marvel of constructive workmanship. How nicely and logically part dovetails into part, until we have before us a most impressive and harmonious edifice! But it is an edifice which is all structure, with one pervasive flaw—it lacks the base.

It is inconceivable that such master-builders as the members of the Dawes committee proved themselves should have failed to realize what lies patent to even a casual observer, namely, that the fixation of the total constitutes a basic postulate of any arrangement that is not presently to snap, to wobble, and then fall apart altogether of its own weight.

Can it be—I am most reluctant to advance the conjecture—that the omission was the result of a prearranged concession made to France in order to secure her assent? More specifically expressed, Can it be that the full reparation amount was again left in abeyance, so as to leave France in the continued possession of her stranglehold? The provision for the retention of her army in the Ruhr in itself would seem to warrant such conclusion. Why, indeed, this extra army? As if the Rhine army of occupation as countenanced by the Treaty of Versailles was not sufficient for purposes of coercion, or as if anybody could stop France from sending another army anywhere in Germany if the contingency actually arises!

I don't care how hard within the limit of possibility it is deemed necessary and advisable to make it for Germany—whether of right or no—but do let the game be fairly played, in a spirit of far-sighted statesmanship.

The more Germany is trampled under foot, the higher her rebound will some day be in the ripeness of time. By pressing a just cause with wrong measures we cause the host of moral forces to swing over to her side.

It becomes France in particular to heed the lesson of history and to remember that it was the succession of the repressive strokes of the Napoleonic campaigns which eventually welded the disparate national fragments into an united and powerful Germany.

The Murder of "We Moderns"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: By the same mail that informed me of the closing down of my new comedy, "We Moderns," I received a marked copy of your valuable organ in which your critic, Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn, provoked by its conventional outlook, angrily predicted it would have a long run. I was very glad to receive this involuntary testimony to the justness of the apprehension I had expressed in the New York Times, while the play was still in the writing, that it would become the scapegoat of my sin in criticizing America. As Mr. Lewisohn rightly saw, it had every factor of success: entertainment, popular ethics, a happy ending. He omits to add a splendid company, rehearsed by Mr. Harrison Grey Fiske, organized by that master in casting, Mr. George C. Tyler, and containing at least one player of genius in the person of Miss Helen Hayes, whose girlish comedy and pathos are surely unmatched on the English-speaking stage. When a play with such abounding elements of vitality—a play I myself saw hold Washington and Chicago audiences spellbound—is found dead in New York, the verdict can only be "Murder." As one New York critic reports gleefully: "Our cantankerous critic has brought upon himself his own punishment." And indeed to be torn to pieces by wild asses is no enviable doom.

Genuine failures are allowed to slip out quietly. But as if to put their motives beyond dispute, some of my critics even devote articles with big head-lines to the obsequies, full of indecent jubilation. Of course a play is delightfully easy to assassinate, especially in New York, where takings that would delight a London manager scarcely suffice to pay the rent of the theater. The patriotic gunman, who poses as dramatic critic, runs no risk of exposure, for the corpse is spirited away, post-mortem investigation precluded, and any protest like the present can be interpreted as the vaporings of mortified vanity.

I do not assert that all the New York critics were out to kill; on the contrary, I am profoundly grateful to the magnanimous minority that acclaimed my work, and whose praise was maliciously suppressed or distorted by organs professing to summarize opinion. Nor do I object to the criticism of thinkers like Mr. Lewisohn or Mr. John Corbin, who write like gentlemen, and whose world-vision differs so curiously from mine that they can honestly believe a story and characters in which I closely copied life to be utterly unreal. But I do resent Mr. Lewisohn's intolerant assumption that I—nay, that every thinker—must share his sex-view, and that I am sinning against my own light when I am doubting the quality of his. Of course no work of art can prove anything. But one of my earliest novels, "The Master," exalts the Hebraic ideal over the neo-Pagan; while my latest, "Jinny the Carrier," has been hailed as the harbinger of reaction against our super-morbid sex fiction. Mr. Lewisohn himself has recently confessed to a classical taste in art: why then can he not understand a classical taste in conduct? That taste on my part is not due to convention but to experience and observation. Few people have sufficient love, pity, or understanding of life to be trusted to hew out paths of their own: even Shelley failed.

In this situation, where the pieties of optimism and orthodoxy have been replaced by an equally shallow heterodoxy of unchecked impulse and experiment, it was the object of my comedy to offer an eirenicon to the warring generations, to hold the balance between the old and the new, and to resolve the discord in the common pity and tragedy of life. So far from grasping my purpose, Mr. Lewisohn accuses me of immoral artistry in trying "to discredit a good doctrine by having it practiced by a rotter." But, as we have seen, even a Shelley's practice of free love did not leave that "good doctrine" utterly undiscredited. Its apostle in my play was not painted as a rotter: merely as a logical observer of his own gospel.

Books

From Wisdom's Mountain Height

A Cure of Souls. By May Sinclair. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

A Pedlar's Pack. By Roland Kenney. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

NO English novelist has more calm, keen intelligence than Miss Sinclair, and she has never had a subject better suited to her talent than that of "A Cure of Souls." To me she seemed in her last book before this to be quite lost when she ventured into dim emotional regions and attempted effects which intelligence alone cannot reach, but here she returns to her own field and, seizing upon a perfectly definite character, she reveals its every turn and traces out its effects with a skill and finality which are completely satisfying to the mind.

Canon Chamberlain had a single master passion—his own comfort—and Canon Chamberlain fills the book. There is really only one other character of any importance and there is nothing which does not bear directly upon the canon's lust for ease. From the moment when we first see him contentedly performing his morning toilet while he dreams of breakfast until that when he sinks with a sigh of relief into a wealthy marriage which will remove forever all, even minor, cares, he holds the center of the stage, and picture after picture unfolds the story of his petty sensualities and his relentless shifting of all burdens onto other shoulders. Only once does passion, in the person of an infatuated old maid whom he uses and then casts aside, touch the book; it is the story of one man and one trait. Yet so skilful is Miss Sinclair's analysis that, though we know from the beginning what the result will be, the interest never falters and each incident has in its perfect fitness the charm of surprise. There is no reason why the canon should not become the standard example of a type of character—too indolent for any sin or crime as these things are ordinarily understood and yet, beneath a refined and comfortable exterior, as completely selfish and as utterly incapable of any save sensual interests as the dullest lout that ever, in humbler station, earned the name of worthless reprobate.

If success in achieving the end proposed were, as it is sometimes said to be, the sole test of literary greatness, then "A Cure of Souls" would be superlatively great. But it is hardly that, for it comes too largely from the mind and is addressed too nearly exclusively to it. When Miss Sinclair decided long ago to watch life rather than to live she imposed upon herself certain limitations not of intellectual but of emotional understanding. Ignorance is the last thing that one would accuse her of. Indeed, because of her aloofness she probably knows more about life than most who have been more passionately concerned with some part of it, but she understands more than she feels, and her triumphs are triumphs of penetration rather than of participation. The great passions of humanity do not sweep through her books, but seem to come to her as things heard of and then thought about, analyzed, and evaluated rather than as resistless and compelling to herself. Even the old maid, a genuinely tragic figure, is dissected with cruel detachment. Miss Sinclair seems perched above the tumult on Lucretius's Mountain top and here there is a kind of greatness which she does not achieve. When one has finished a great novel of another tradition, "Crime and Punishment" or "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," the tumult within will not die down when the book is closed, and one is driven into the streets or fields to recover peace of soul. But no one will be compelled to walk off "A Cure of Souls." When he has finished the book his feelings will be not disturbed but calmly content, and he will be more in the mood to think quietly, to take all human life as an interesting story than to live intensely. If the power to create a tumult in the soul is the test of the supremely great artist, Miss Sinclair is not supremely great. But no one lacking this final attribute ever wrote more thoroughly admirable books.

"I first met Crump in a sewer at midnight." Thus begins one of the group of tales which compose "A Pedlar's Pack," and the sentence will serve to indicate both the milieu described and the character of the dramatis personae. Mr. Kenney writes with the direct simplicity of a practiced man of letters, but there is something in his calm acceptance of the incidents which he describes which indicates more than a mere writer's familiarity with the lives and characters of navvies, longshoremen, sand-hogs, and members of those other professions whose technique is brute labor. The sixteen pieces which go to make up his slender volume are sketches and incidents rather than stories, but they are crowded with life and full of the sounds of hammering drills, swinging cranes, laboring dray-horses, and sweating men; and full, too, of the humor, brutality, kindness, and ferocity of the men to whom the most driving, monotonous, and meaningless physical labor under the most unfavorable conditions is the ordinary routine of life. Mr. Kenney is by no means a romantic, but neither does he seem to be consciously trying for a dark picture. He is apparently tough-minded enough to enjoy the unsqueamish gusto of the men and to accept a life which is violent and uncertain in the same matter-of-fact spirit as do those who know no other; and his sketches lose nothing by this calmness. "A Pedlar's Pack" is not intended to be exactly terrible, and yet it is, even in its humor, for it brings vividly to the mind that savagery which, kept for the most part carefully out of sight, does the roughest of the work on which our civilization rests.

J. W. KRUTCH

Governmental Problems

Federal Centralization. By Walter Thompson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THE subject dealt with in Mr. Thompson's book is easily one of the most important problems not merely of American government, but of government in general, for the questions raised in this book relate not so much to the matter of constitutional division of powers between a national government and the component units of a federation, as to that of the actual partition of functions between central and local government. In this broader form the problem is raised, as the author points out, in the movements for "devolution" in Great Britain and "regionalism" in France.

This volume originated, as Mr. Thompson remarks in the preface, as a legal treatise on the police power of the federal government. Later on, before publication, the scope of the work was enlarged to include social, economic, and psychological factors as well as legal. In this way the study undoubtedly gained in interest, for few things could be more barren, so far as any progress toward a solution of the big problem is concerned, than a mere exposition of the constitutional questions involved. As Mr. Thompson himself suggests, even if the constitutionality of the past and proposed expansions of federal legislation were granted, or were put definitely beyond the possibility of question by the adoption of amendments granting such powers in clear terms, the real question of their wisdom or expediency would still remain. From the point of view of the author's presentation it might well be said: "All things are lawful, but not all things are expedient."

Nevertheless, the author devotes the whole of Part I of the work, more than a quarter of the entire volume, to the "constitutional basis for a federal police power," passing in rapid review the opinions of the Fathers and the principal clauses of the federal constitution under which doubtful expansions of federal power have occurred, viz., the commerce clause, the taxing power, the postal clause, and the treaty power. This is a brief but interesting summary of the main principles laid down in the more or less familiar decisions of the Supreme Court with reference to the exercise or attempted exercise by the congress of powers only indirectly related to the purposes for which these clauses were inserted in the Constitution.

Parts II and III of the book, comprising half of the entire volume, deal with the scope of congressional action in the fields of social and economic legislation. The regulation of public morals exemplified by congressional action with respect to lotteries and vice, the promotion of public health through the food and drugs acts and the attempted prohibition of child labor, and the promotion of education through the policy of federal grants-in-aid are all briefly reviewed and criticized. But federal legislation in respect to intoxicating liquors, and especially the Eighteenth Amendment, come in for a major share of criticism from the point of view of the propriety and wisdom of central control. With the growing federal control over economic subjects, such as the regulation of transportation, the author has more patience. It is curious that even in such a brief survey of the growing field of central control as this, no mention is made of the Nineteenth Amendment, one of the most striking extensions of federal power into a domain formerly left to the States.

In Part IV of the book Dr. Thompson discusses the hazards and possibilities of centralization, with special emphasis, however, on the hazards. Though he has here attempted, as he says in his preface, to approach the problem in a scientific spirit as distinguished from the polemic spirit in which it is too frequently discussed, his own conviction that the hazards of centralization are, in such fields as morals legislation, and the police power in general, greater than the benefits is not left in doubt.

Many scientific and unbiased students of governmental problems will no doubt differ with Dr. Thompson in his conclusions, or even in some of his interpretations, but the presentation is worth while and well fitted to accomplish the main purpose which he had in mind, namely, to stimulate other minds to grapple with the problem of finding a more accurate delineation between federal functions and state functions.

HERMAN G. JAMES

Ship Ahoy!

The Merchant Marine. By E. Keble Chatterton. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

Gloucester by Land and Sea. By Charles Boardman Hawes. Little, Brown and Company. $6.

We Explore the Great Lakes. By Webb Waldron. The Century Company. $3.50.

Of all the wimming doubly blest
The sailor's wife's the happiest,
For all she does is stay to home
And knit and darn and let 'im roam.

Of all the husbands on the earth
The sailor has the finest berth;
For in 'is cabin he can sit
And sail and sail—and let 'er knit.

PERHAPS the sailor's wife is, and always has been, about as Wallace Irwin thus pictures her, but the sailor himself has been a changeling whose character and condition have shifted with every development in seafaring, every alteration in the little world called a ship in which he lives and works. And as one reads the story of the merchant marine in the fascinating and informative pages of E. Keble Chatterton one realizes that although the sailor experiences less hardship and danger nowadays than ever before, he is relatively less well off than he was a hundred years ago. It is the fault of the passenger, with his bulging money bags, that this is so. Up to a hundred years ago almost nobody traveled by sea except professional sailors. Their life may have been hard, but it was the best that existed aboard ship. Then for fifty years—roughly speaking, from 1825 to 1875—increasing relations between America and Europe, as also the rush of gold diggers from England to Australia and from the Atlantic to the Pacific seaboard of the United States, laid the beginnings of passenger traffic. As yet, however, the passenger went not for pleasure but solely to get somewhere, and his life aboard ship was no better than, if as good as, that of the sailor. After a voyage to England in 1847 Emerson wrote: "I find the sea life an acquired taste, like that for tomatoes and olives."

Well, in the half century since, the taste for olives and tomatoes has become hereditary rather than acquired, and so has the appetite for sea life. In fifty years—more especially in the last twenty-five—we have developed a vast system of travel for pleasure, and it is this traffic which has conditioned and caused the great changes in ships and sea life that the twentieth century has witnessed. But although the sailor's career is safer and less rigorous in consequence, it has become relatively a poor life beside the luxurious and care-free existence of the modern passenger.

Commander Chatterton, himself an Englishman, devotes most of his space to the British merchant marine. This is as it should be, since the development of modern ocean commerce is predominantly a creation of Great Britain. American ships played a great part in the trade of the last century, but their role, however brilliant, was brief, and although they are now trying to resume their old part, the outlook is not propitious. In so far as the United States can claim an authentic, native development on the water today it is in the fishing and coasting fleet of its seaboard and in the unique commerce of the Great Lakes.

Gloucester is the Grimsby of America—the focus of our salt-fish industry and a cradle of native seamanship. Mr. Hawes gives the factual background of Gloucester's fisherfolk just as James B. Connolly, in his short stories of several years ago, gave us a breath of the romance. Mr. Waldron, on his part, has written of those all too-little-known "seacoasts of the Middle West," of their vast trade in iron ore and grain, of the special type of ship and sailor that these turbulent inland waters have produced.

ARTHUR WARNER

From the British Point of View

The Nations of To-day. A New History of the World. France, Japan, Italy, British America, Yugoslavia and the Baltic and Caucasian States. Edited by John Buchan. Houghton Mifflin Company. 6 vols. Each $5.

THE title indicates the ambitious attempt made in a series of an undetermined number of volumes, of which twelve have been assigned and six have been issued. It promises much, yet a question is raised by the selection of John Buchan as editor, a writer known by a history of the Great War, excellent in itself and enjoying a publication in advance of any like serious history of the subject. The question, however, becomes more emphatic when it is seen that the six volumes here noticed have been "compiled under the care of Major General Lord Edward Gleichen." With Buchan's known leaning toward military history and Lord Gleichen's military standing and quite undetermined literary ability, does not the make-up of the series suggest an undue bias on the military side? The past may be retold in the light of modern problems, but this is a difficult and delicate task, particularly as the "living present" produced by the war is itself beyond definite description.

A reading of the volumes only increases one's doubt of the ability of the corps of writers—more than one hundred and twenty in number—to accomplish their aim. It is not necessary to dwell upon the inequality in treatment, for that is inevitable in collaboration, where no editing can produce uniformity. In each volume there is an identical introduction by Mr. Buchan, generalities on historical writing. In each volume there are three sections: the history of the past, the Great War, and statistics on the present economy of the nation described. The clearest section in each is that of the part played by the nation in the Great War, the section which evidently formed the immediate purpose of the series. The statistics undertake to give a picture of the immediate economic situation, but space will not permit a full account and what is given is certain to be out of date in a year's time, so rapidly are conditions changing. These chapters are suggestive, but inconclusive.

This leaves the true historical section of each volume to be considered. The volume on France may serve as an example. Good histories of France are accessible and a new one should offer something so distinguishing it as to justify its existence. The history from 800 to 1871 is written by Arthur Hassall, of Oxford, known by his creditable history of Europe in the eighteenth century. The story of the Third Republic and later years to 1914 is told by the late J. R. Moreton Macdonald, author of a three-volume history of France, which ended with 1871. The combined contributions of the two give a history of more than eleven centuries in about one hundred and fifty pages. Mr. Hassall has been obliged to compress beyond reason and Moreton Macdonald barely sketches the outlines of his subject. Major General Maurice describes France in the Great War; Mr. Adam, one-time Paris correspondent of the London Times, supplies chapters on France behind the War Zone and Peace and After. Six other contributors add their portions. The casual reader will find something of interest, but the trained reader will marvel at the more or less confused plan and its execution.

The test is naturally severe when applied to a nation like France or Italy—the Italian history begins with 330 A.D. More successful are the volumes on "Yugoslavia" and "Baltic and Caucasian States," where it is not necessary to go so deeply into the past and where the history of a race or people is more consistent and easily told. The terrible story of these smaller countries, the successive conquests, oppression, and almost extermination of their inhabitants by their stronger neighbors, presents a lesson applicable in its warning to the present time. Mr. Longford, long a British consul and now emeritus professor of Japanese in London University, is wholly responsible for the volume on "Japan," and the gain in flow and consistency is notable, for he knows his subject and handles it in a readable manner, with certain personal qualities. In "British America" two competent writers—A. G. Bradley and W. S. Wallace—give a welcome summary of a history too little known in the United States, intimately concerned as we are in the development of mutual interests and prejudices.

Absolute impartiality cannot be expected in these compilations, so plainly British in their plan and scope, but more careful editing would have lessened a tendency to express opinions dubious in taste as well as improper from an historical standpoint. Napoleon III's venture in Mexico is stated to have been an attempt to "check the Teutonic Republic of the North and prevent the American continent from falling definitely under the commercial control of New York and the political influence of Washington," a statement indefinite and difficult to prove. Does Mr. Longford write history when he says: "A general arbitration treaty was under discussion between the governments of Great Britain and the United States, one of those fantastic chimeras of visionary apostles of universal peace which crop up at intervals in the world's history and always prove scraps of paper"; and when he speaks of the League in re Japan's membership in it: "But even if the League were not the illusory dream of benevolent optimists who are altogether out of place in this materialistic world, even if it had not been damned by the apostasy of its own father's country at its genesis . . ."? Mr. Bradley in "Canada" might better have expressed himself in a different manner: "King George [III] and his officials, once the war was over, had frankly accepted the position of losers and behaved with dignity and like gentlemen. It was left to the Americans, though winners, to do the other thing . . . maintaining a consistently vindictive attitude till the War of 1812 taught it a crushing lesson." Great Britain as a teacher of manners under Perceval and Canning presents a rather ludicrous picture. Mr. Bradley's account of the War of 1812 is not unduly severe, but his language could be improved, and his carelessness in the spelling of familiar names is matched by his making Sims responsible for the Trent affair instead of Wilkes. The series of volumes will no doubt serve an immediate purpose, but it is wanting in permanent qualities.

WORTHINGTON C. FORD

An Eager Life

Lily Braun. By Julie Vogelstein. Berlin-Grunewald: Verlagsgesellschaft Hermann Klemm.

ALTHOUGH she quarreled continually with the leaders of the Social Democratic Party from the time of her public espousal of its cause in 1895 till she was practically read out of the party a dozen years later, Lily Braun wore the name of socialist with loving pride till the day of her death. Temperamentally she was an anarchist. Doctrinally she was cloudy, rhetorical, and contradictory. She no doubt exercised considerable influence on the paternalistic German legislation of the early years of the century; but for the most part she was an inspiration rather than a guide. The greater part of the attacks on her were certainly undeserved. If she was dishonest, her dishonesty was never shrewdness or malice, but the riotous imaginings of a grown-up child; if she was vain and dictatorial, her vanity was the rebound of her enthusiastic charity, and her imperiousness, which too often offended, only the active expression of it.

Her friend Julie Vogelstein has exercised remarkable self-restraint in limiting herself to this sober and quiet study of a feverish propagandist and a life which was one breathless sensation after another. Great-granddaughter of the ill-starred Jerome Bonaparte, granddaughter of Goethe's brilliant protégée Jenny von Pappenheim, daughter of General Hans von Kretschman, and herself a social butterfly for six or eight years from her debut, crushed for a few weeks by her father's downfall, but soon emerging as a buoyant and indefatigable wage-earner, careless ever thereafter of herself but a spendthrift for suffering society; married first to a deformed paralytic who had saved her from the Slough of Despond, and, after his early death, to the first Social Democrat to reach the Reichstag; a devoted wife and mother, but in her later years pooh-poohing the foolish and pernicious institution of marriage; a violent enemy of war, but, from the fall of 1914 till her death the next summer—death brought on by this strain, labor, and excitement—the most ardent and eloquent of those traveling speakers who kept German patriotism so long and marvelously aflame; sister of a notorious German spy who met her death on American soil; and with all her fiery apostleship, her prophesying, pleading, and quarreling, pouring out a stream of remarkable volumes, literary history, politics, romance, drama, imperfect but powerful; this remarkable life may some day be told brilliantly; here it is only sketched in its general outlines, and commented on moderately, with too much about Goethe and theories and too little about a life which was far less theory than white passion.

Lily Braun died heroically in harness, believing that Germany was winning the war. A letter of hers to her young son at the front, written at the Christmas season, assures him that he is fighting for peace on earth. The war is not won yet, because it was not fought for that end; but the long war in which it was merely the hottest and bitterest engagement, will be won when men and women in general become convinced, as was the generous author of "The Memoirs of a Socialist," that men and women, even in so short a life, are on this earth not to get but to give.

ROY TEMPLE HOUSE.

Books in Brief

Looking After Joan. By John Palmer. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

The announcement that Joan, unschooled in the accepted social defenses of women, is about to plunge into a flirtatious Paris colony of British officialdom should rouse the weary victim of commercialism from his veriest Sunday-afternoon boredom. Yet the book fails in its most important aspect, that is as a narrative, and the story, if not cheap, is at least no more than mediocre and uninspiring.

Black Bryony. By T. F. Powys. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

"Black Bryony" is a little bewildering. There are a number of rustic characters and scenes sketched in a subtly sophisticated manner and there is a lurid rural melodrama casually indicated as a plot thread, but the parts do not fuse and it is a little difficult to know just what the author is driving at. "Mr. Powys in Search of a Manner" we hazard as the best title for a book which is fine in spots but more freakish than impressive as a whole.

The Rover. By Joseph Conrad. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

Too much has been said about "The Rover" already. A well-written mystery story, it is pleasant enough reading but hardly more significant than a detective yarn. Its tremendous success proves once again that a second-rate book within the mental means of everybody, but written by a famous author, is the publishers' one best bet.

Doomsland. By Shane Leslie. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

At the beginning "Doomsland" is a spacious background of Irish botany, ornithology, politics and religion, with a number of Orange figures sketched lightly in by way of justification for its being called a novel. The lines, suggested at first with so much restraint, are gradually filled in. The characters become more tangible and vitalized until, at the last, they are very forcible and dramatic realities. "Doomsland" is a carefully written cross-section of Irish thought, hope, and disappointment, descriptive, analytical, and at rare times whimsical. Its author has done what Irishmen are commonly thought to be racially incapable of doing: he has shown that he cares very deeply for the country of which he writes, and yet he has not taken sides.

The Constitution of the United States. An Historical Survey of Its Formation. By Robert Livingston Schuyler. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

A concise and eminently readable account of the origin, formation, and adoption of the Constitution and the establishment of the Federal Government under it, based on lectures given in 1921 at Cambridge University and the London School of Economics and Political Science. Its distinguishing features are its careful use of recent authorities, its avoidance of "Constitution worship," and its quiet setting aside of theories which still persist notwithstanding their proved lack of historical foundations.

My Garden of Memory. By Kate Douglas Wiggin. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

Mrs. Wiggin appraises her work modestly and her friendships generously; her impressions of life and of literature are alike suffused in the warm glow of a gracious temperament. As an autobiography this volume is continuously entertaining; what it lacks in depth it compensates for in breadth, and if its author appears to have gone through life with a minimum of self-searching, her success at least came with a minimum of self-assertion.

Souls in Hell. By John O'Neill. Nicholas L. Brown. $2.50.

This novel possesses at least the merit of not being as lurid as its title; its other claims to distinction are not so readily discovered. The author has a theme which bends its neck ungracefully to the yoke of his imagination; with the best will in the world his progress is slow and creaking. As a "mystery of the unseen," it carries more elements of extravagance than of conviction.

Letters From a Distance. By Gilbert Cannan. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.

Knocking about in queer corners of the earth after the war, Mr. Cannan exposed his mind like a sensitized plate, and thus made a record—not alone of his own impressions—but of the shifting panorama of world bewilderment through which he passed. These papers are graceful in form and rich in observation; they reflect the irony and the despair of the times.

A House Full of People. By E. and M. Scharten Antink. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.50.

Life has been shrewdly observed in this novel; the motley group of people sheltered under the roof of a Parisian rooming house emerges with color and distinctness. The talk is racy and the character drawing swift and competent—altogether a novel of more than ordinary power.

A Municipal Exploit in Music

By HENRIETTA STRAUS

IF our municipalities were given generally to adventures in the arts there would be no need for this article. But when such adventures are almost isolated instances they cannot be localized in value. For this reason an organization like the Baltimore Symphony takes on a certain national significance, for it is the first and, I believe, only municipally endowed and managed symphony orchestra in the country. Its history is doubly significant in that its entire existence has been the triumph of art over politics and that it was due originally to a concert manager, Frederick R. Huber, and to a politician, James H. Preston, the latter one time mayor of Baltimore.

In the autumn of 1915 these two got together and laid their plans. Mr. Huber offered his services as manager gratis for the first year. Mr. Preston engaged to extract from the city council an appropriation of $7,000. It was a brave pledge on the part of the mayor. But then, what was such a pledge to one who had dared to have the streets of Baltimore paved? The miracle was somehow performed, and the orchestra became a fact. A conductor was found in Gustav Strube, head of the theory and composition department of the Peabody Conservatory, and for twenty-five years an assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony; and a concert-master located in Joan C. Van Hulsteyn, head of the violin department of the Peabody, and formerly concert-master of the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris. As only $1,500 and five or six rehearsals were allotted each performance, high-class symphonic men were out of the question, for the players were on no fixed salaries, but were paid by the performance and the rehearsal. And so the orchestra, numbering, the first year, fifty-three in all, had to be recruited from the Peabody faculty and from the various theater orchestras throughout the city.

The first concert took place in February, 1916, with Mabel Garrison, a native Baltimorean, as its soloist. This established its future policy, which has always been definitely constructive toward the community. Not only are local musicians encouraged as soloists but also as composers, the latter at times even being invited to conduct their works. There are no subscription and no free tickets; the prices range from fifteen to fifty cents. There were a few years, during the war, when the prices went up to a dollar, and attendance fell off in consequence; but now that the old scale has been resumed the orchestra plays to sold-out houses. It initiated the plan of holding its final rehearsals at some high school, which the students could attend, free of charge, and which were always followed by explanatory talks on the program. And it has followed up this educational work by inaugurating this year, besides its regular series of eight concerts, a supplementary series of children's concerts, which have been indorsed by the Public School Association and which are prefaced by explanatory remarks by Mrs. Henrietta Baker Low, a member of the National Board of Music Supervisors. The program notes are written by a sixteen-year-old Baltimore boy named Richard Moses.

As is to be expected, an orchestra so dependent on the benevolence of city politicians has had many ups and downs. First, there was the question of its home. Its only logical one, the Lyric Theater, was in danger of being sold to commercial interests. After much agitation Mr. Otto H. Kahn, who owned the theater, generously waved aside these interests and gave Baltimore a chance to buy it for artistic purposes. And so a stock company was formed called the Lyric Company, and the hall was not only saved for the cause of music but is today on a lively paying basis. The next problem to be met was that of Baltimore's "blue laws," for it was found that the day most desirable for concerts was the one day forbidden, namely, Sunday. The city finally solved the problem by breaking its own ordinance, giving permission for concerts on the Sabbath, provided that no tickets were sold on that day.

The orchestra's greatest difficulty, however, is the uncertainty of its appropriations, for which it has to depend upon each succeeding administration. And it speaks well for both itself and its management that both have already successfully weathered three political changes. Moreover, through them all, Mr. Huber has not only remained Municipal Director of Music—as his title goes—but he has also gone ahead with his plans. The city now has a special budget for musical expenditures. These were in 1916 about $30,000 to New York's $24,600. This perhaps is not surprising considering that a New York manager computed recently that out of the ten million people who make up the population of New York and its surrounding territory only sixty thousand support its musical enterprises. Today Baltimore spends $100,000 annually upon music. Under Mr. Huber's budget comes not only a park band of thirty-five men, but also a municipal band of like number, which plays almost nightly for sixteen weeks during the summer months in various parts of the city. And one summer it furnished the music for open-air street dancing which took place, under municipal supervision and instruction, in localities where there were large, open areas of asphalt paving. But this brought down the condemnation of Baltimore's ever watchful churches, and so the experiment was never repeated.

The possibilities evoked by such a budget are, of course, endless, and Mr. Huber is fairly driven by his visions. He would like to found a community orchestra, conducted on the principles of community singing. He would like to establish a manuscript society, for which he has already laid the foundation by the liberal local policy of his orchestra. And he would like to combine the activities of that orchestra with a municipal opera company. With this end in view, and to stimulate local interest, he has already arranged with a visiting opera company that for one night each week, during its spring season, the principal roles shall be taken by Baltimore singers. More than this he cannot do at present, because his orchestra is hampered by the impermanence and inadequacy of its support. But when our fine, endowed orchestras do as much for their respective communities, when they cease posing as the objets d'art of the musical world and abandon their roles of social stepping-stones, then perhaps we may develop from a nation of scattered music lovers to a music-loving nation. In the meantime it is interesting to note that the first step has been taken not by the new and progressive West, but by an old, conservative Eastern cultural center whose musical experience dates back to the eighteenth century.

Drama On Reality

AT the Neighborhood Playhouse, where every production is a model of both sensitiveness and scrupulousness, they are presenting Lenormand's "Time Is a Dream" and, since the play is short, it is preceded by a showing of the film that illustrates the Einstein theory of relativity. This film is a marvel of exposition and must bring home to the least mathematical some inkling of this vision that surveys the nature of things from the center of the universe and not from the parishes of earth. But it was curious, after this bracing experience, to witness the Lenormand play in which the terminology of relativity is used to bolster up and give a pseudo-scientific background to the old, old juggling with astral bodies and clairvoyance. If a play by Mr. Shipman would end at any moment in which any character showed a gleam of common sense, so would "Time Is a Dream" have been brought to a close if, at any moment, someone had sent for a physician. This wealthy young Dutchman who succumbs to the oppressive atmosphere of his native land and drowns himself because his betrothed has seen him do so in a prophetic vision is obviously a little mad. When he says that it is too late for him to flee to Java, my instinctive comment is: "Did no steamers sail? Couldn't he afford the passage? Was he too weak to travel? No. Then how could it be too late? And if it was a case of the inhibition of melancholia, the summoning of a psychiatrist was obviously the thing indicated." Let us not be put off with hocus-pocus and call it mystery. The universe, as the Einstein film shows is unthinkably mysterious; the brain reels, and the imagination shakes at these sidereal spaces and magnitudes which are themselves but shadows and symbols of still other vastnesses and these themselves but symbols of we know not what. Betelgeuse is ninety thousand times greater than the sun. Stand upon Betelgeuse and all things would assume shapes, sizes, speeds, temporal relations unheard of—unheard of and yet an organic part of the universal realities given to the mind. The wonder and the mystery is that a psychiatrist could probably have cured Lenormand's young Dutchman. Reality is mysterious, unfathomable, great. Clairvoyance is trivial, foolish, childish. There is no such thing.

These reflections bring me to what I have for some time been wanting to say about "The Miracle." In that gorgeous and beautiful pantomime there is a terrible discrepancy. The cathedral soars; so does Humperdinck's music; the masses surge as only the hand of Reinhardt can make them surge. And from all this visible and audible grandeur, from these rich ceremonies, there issues, though swathed in cloth of gold, a story and a notion of the most trivial kind. The Middle Age that dreamed this story did not know Betelgeuse. We do. It had no conception of the relativity of moral values. We have. Symbol and poetry do indeed hold the highest reality, the loftiest truth in fee. All that is transitory, we know, is a symbol, even as space and time and shape are now seen to be. But the poor little nun in the story can symbolize no truth to us. At least not in this story. There was no reason, except a superstitious and foolish one, why her love of life should have been crushed between walls and smothered in incense. Had the Virgin really liberated her and thus vindicated the claims of life and change and freedom and beauty, there might have arisen an action that could satisfy the rational mind. But the phantasmagoria of the Nun is one created by a sense of sin. She returns. The mercy of the Virgin was in permitting that return. The story has meaning, has poetry only if we can assume the mental outlook of the thirteenth century. Otherwise it has not any. And I was amazed at the attitude of the audience at "The Miracle" that seemed to be hushed and awestruck by this trivial fairy-tale. No, not even a fairy-tale.

For in the authentic folk-tales one usually finds some touch of that universal human nature that links all epochs, races, creeds. Not so here. What we find here is the moment of profoundest ignorance and superstition in the history of the West.

I shall be thought to be displaying an irreverent mind. Reverence should be wrung from one. I feel it for the fortitude that suffers ill and is unbowed, that fights injustice and is serene even in defeat, that faces desolateness and is unafraid, or the madness of superstition and does not lose the spirit of love. . . . But incense and a nun. . . . Or a young man who needed a doctor. . . . Reality is too noble to permit one to be put off with such claptrap. I think of someone hung up by the wrists in a noisome prison and not recanting his opinions; I think of Betelgeuse, and I turn from such fables as those of "Time Is a Dream" and "The Miracle" to things that matter.

The French "Teapot Dome"

By HENRI MARTIN BARZUN

PUBLIC opinion in the United States has been so absorbed in the revelations of the naval-reserve oil leases that it has paid but scant attention to the simultaneous discovery, brought before the French Parliament, of a scandal quite equal in financial magnitude and similar in national consequences. Recent revelations, brought before the Chamber of Deputies through the persistent efforts of a Socialist representative from the liberated region of northern France, show that graft at public expense is carried on quite as scientifically as in the United States, and throw upon the government of the Bloc National a moral and political stigma which it will be difficult for the electorate to forget before the general elections of May 11.

At the very moment when M. Poincaré was putting through a general "supertax" of 20 per cent, destined to obtain four billions to counter-balance the drop of the franc, the Socialist opposition brought forth proofs that nearly 20 billion francs had been the booty of the plutocrats, the "reconstructors" of the North, since 1920. In vain did the opposition demand that the funds necessary to balance the budget and compensate for the low value of the franc be obtained from the profiteers. The nationalist majority could not see it in that light. The taxes required were voted, and then they contented themselves with passing a law providing for a reconsideration of all settlements made for war damages in excess of one million francs.

It is interesting to consider the vicious circle within which the present majority has revolved since the Ruhr invasion. In the name of reconstruction, the national budget has been swelled by 100 billions additional, placed to the pending account of the German reparations. It is, therefore, the French taxpayer and investor who has subscribed this amount. From this sum of 100 billions, one-fifth has been shamelessly grafted by profiteers, at the expense of the small claimants of the North. As the Ruhr invasion has caused the fall of the franc, it is again the taxpayer from whom the Bloc National demands 4 billions in taxes to effect the balance.

The invaded region of northern France constituted one-eleventh of the country's territory. One-fourth of the taxes were collected from it; it contained 160 steel mills, 55 coal mines, 150 textile plants, 45 electric-power plants, 70 sugar and oil refineries. As for agricultural riches, these figures suffice: 15 billions in arable land and 3 billions in property destroyed on this land. To these wrecked industries and devastated land must be added 350,000 houses and buildings entirely or partially destroyed in the 3,256 communities evacuated before the invasion.

Moreover, if we mention the thousands of miles of roads, railroad lines, waterways, as well as local public works, we may begin to form an estimate of the desolation wrought in this district so fertile, so rich economically, so thickly populated. It is here that the "war sharks" since 1920 found a remarkable field for their activities. It was a second invasion: credit corporations, building and loan associations, raw material and contracting companies, created for the emergency, corrupting everything around them—public officials, local commissions, legal advisers, judges, experts.

At the outset, the 100 billions must have appeared barely sufficient, so great was the enthusiasm of these reconstructors. The total amount of the claims soared in the clouds at about 146 billions. It was necessary to compress this sum within the limits of the credit voted by the nation. We must believe, however, that the master grafters found the sum ample for their needs, if we consider a few of the 446 most notable cases brought before the Chamber of Deputies during the recent revelations.

An investigation showed, in effect, that with the excess damages disbursed, groups of industrialists had been able to triple the working area of their plants, to build themselves mansions, country estates, chateaux with parks, seashore residences. In a certain file, an overestimate of 63 millions has been discovered; another claim amounting to 190 millions could have been reduced without trouble to 127. The file relating to an important firm, having already made more than 100 millions in war profits, revealed the fraudulent accounting upon which it had established its damage claims.

Premier Poincaré Resigns

A sugar refinery, bought for 335,000 francs in 1914, received 7 millions indemnity, having asked for 10; the same company received 3 millions for another factory purchased for 275,000, and finally 2 more millions for damages actually amounting to 540,000. The investigation and compilation of data offer a few edifying facts:

A director of claims, manufacturer of damage files, has been given six months in prison. Another has been condemned for "larceny in war damages."

Fourteen files were manufactured by an architect who was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, at present a fugitive from justice.

Two tons of files and documents, revealed by chance, had been left to rot in the yard of an administrative building; they have been submitted to expert examination.

Action on 13,000 cases had to be stopped by the investigation commission. Public officials were involved.

The destruction or disappearance of documents and files of settled claims cannot be estimated in figures.

Finally, the appointment of different local commissions of distribution has given rise to such abuses of power, collusions between attorneys for the claimant and members of the commissions that justice had to be set in motion in hundreds of towns and communities.

We can readily imagine how much political pressure the recipients of this graft exerted in order to prevent their unmasking. There is a notable case in which the relative of a former Minister of Reconstruction has been found involved. This particular file has proved to be full of surprises.

But the situation is in fact an indictment of a policy and of the majority, which so long compelled silence on this crime against the liberated regions.

"Is it true that the governments we have been following for three years with eyes shut have failed in their duty?" cried an indignant member of the Bloc. Indignation somewhat belated, as was that of the chairman of the investigating commission who, when confronted with proofs, reproached the Minister of Reconstruction for having refused his assistance.

Credit is due to two members of the Socialist Party, Messrs. Inghels and Ringuier, representatives from the liberated regions, spokesmen for the democracy of the small claimants, "whose damages were disputed to the penny, in order to be able to pay more liberally the master grafters." Mr. Inghels—the Thomas Walsh in the case—devoted four years to a lone investigation, despite the attacks, insults, supplications, and threats it brought him. He stuck to it, and, by five "interpellations" in the Chamber, from 1921 to 1923, he compelled the majority to listen to the overwhelming proofs which he had dug up.

"It is a lie," a member of the Cabinet once answered him. "You are joking," replied another one. The majority laughed, and the standing parliamentary committee said there were "no grounds for investigation."

But when the papers of the North and of Paris were moved, when they stuttered a few words about the truths which it was impossible longer to smother, the Minister of the Liberated Regions then declared before the Chamber that Mr. Inghels was "playing into the hands of Germany"—purely and simply.

And then, last March the committee, the majority, the Minister, and the Government accepted the law introduced by the Socialists, "ordering the revision of war damages," but it was in order to kill it more easily. What did Mr. Inghels and his party ask? Immediate action upon the 446 important cases, so as to enable the Government to regain in three months, from the grafters, the 4 billions now demanded from the country in surtaxes.

What did the Bloc majority vote? Revision of all cases amounting to more than one million francs—a revision which will take several years, thus enabling the grafters to escape in the maze of the 25,000 cases to be examined.

After the failure of the law of 1920, which was to have revised the war contracts, and effected the restitution of hundreds of millions by the profiteers, no one will entertain any illusion about the fate of this new law. But the scandal of this destructive reconstruction is not over. The Senate has not yet spoken; neither has the nation now going to the polls.

Russia's Budget

THE International Press Correspondence prints in its issue of March 20 an article describing the budget estimates for 1923-1924 of the Union of Soviet Republics:

The estimates of the Soviet Union for the current economic year could not, as had been planned, be submitted in final form to the Second Soviet Congress of the Union which ended a short time ago. The necessity of solving complicated questions, of which not the least was that of the relation of the budgets of the individual republics to the total budget of the Union, led to a certain delay in the work, and this will have to be dealt with by a special commission which has been appointed by the Soviet Congress. The main outlines of the budget are, however, already fixed, and the published figures are regarded as an important symptom of the financial recovery of the Soviet republics, not only by the Soviet press, but also by the press of our opponents.

In its outward form the new budget represents an advance over the previous ones. While individual items of last year's estimates were entered in the complicated Goods Ruble reckoning, the new estimates are brought together on the basis of a stable currency, that is, the chervonetz. The grand total amounts to 1,709 million gold rubles, against 1,346 gold rubles, or about 25 per cent more than last year.

Fundamental progress in comparison to last year is visible from two points of view, namely, financial and class. As regards the financial aspect, both the absolute as well as the relative raising of the normal state income is to be emphasized. The income derived from taxes shows an increase from 378 to 498, the income from the productive state industries from 48 to 141, that from transport from 376 to 598, and posts and telegraphs from 25 to 39 million gold rubles. On the other hand, the making use of extraordinary sources for the covering of the deficit is, both in its totality as well as in its composition, much more favorable than last year. The credit operations are about double those of the year 1922-1923, that is, 253 instead of 129 million; on the other hand, the sum that is to be covered by the issuance of notes is only 180 million, which is 10 per cent of the total budget, as compared with 30 per cent of the total budget last year.

From the class point of view, the progress of this year's budget over that of last year consists chiefly in the composition of the revenue from taxation. Although the Soviet Government is endeavoring in every way, in the interest of financial restoration, to achieve a budget without a deficit, it did not fail to use the first opportunity of lightening the load of the proletarian and small peasant classes and the poor classes in general. The consumer's tax upon articles of general use, and before all on salt, sugar, and petroleum, was considerably reduced this year in spite of the financial difficulties which still exist.

ECONOMIC PRIZES

Twenty-first year

IN order to arouse an interest in the study of topics relating to commerce and industry, to stimulate those who have a college training to consider the problems of a business career, and to aid in constructive economic thinking, a committee composed of

Professor J. Laurence Laughlin, University of Chicago, Chairman

Professor J. B. Clark, Columbia University

Dr. Edwin F. Gay, New York

Hon. Theodore E. Burton, Washington, and

Professor Wesley C. Mitchell, Columbia University has been enabled, through the generosity of Hart Schaffner & Marx of Chicago, to offer in 1925 prizes for the best studies in the economic field to certain classes of contestants

CLASSES A AND B

Class A includes any residents of the United States or Canada, without restriction; the possession of a degree is not required of any contestant in this class, nor is any age limit set. Class B includes only those who, at the time the papers are sent in, are undergraduates of any American college. Attention is expressly called to the rule that a competitor is not confined to topics proposed in the announcements of this committee, but any other subject chosen must first be approved by it. As suggestions, a few questions are here given:

- 1 The Effects of Excessive Issues of Inconvertible Paper Money on Social Classes
- 2 The Theory and Practice of a Minimum Wage Law
- 3 The Economic Effect of a Tax on Inheritance
- 4 The Problem of Controlling Immigration Into the United States
- 5 Unemployment Insurance by Industries
- 6 The Issue of Tax-Exempt Securities in a Country Having a Progressive Income Tax

A First Prize of One Thousand Dollars and

A Second Prize of Five Hundred Dollars are offered to contestants in Class A

A First Prize of Three Hundred Dollars and

are offered to contestants in Class B. The committee reserves to itself the right to award the two prizes of $1000 and $500 of Class A to undergraduates in Class B, if the merits of the papers demand it. The winner of a prize shall not receive the amount designated until he has prepared his manuscript for the printer to the satisfaction of the committee.

The ownership of the copyright of studies to which the right to print has been awarded will vest in the donors, and it is expected that, without precluding the use of these papers as theses for higher degrees, they will cause them to be issued in some permanent form.

Competitors are advised that the studies should be thorough, expressed in good English, and, although not limited as to length, they should not be needlessly expanded. They should be inscribed with an assumed name, the class in which they are presented, and accompanied by a sealed envelope giving the real name and address of the competitor, together with any degrees or distinctions already obtained. No paper is eligible which shall have been printed or published in a form to disclose the identity of the author before the award shall have been made. If the competitor is in Class B, the sealed envelope should contain the name of the institution in which he is studying. The papers should be sent on or before June 1, 1925, to

The progressive restoration of industry and transport also finds expression in the budget. For the first time since the revolution, industry appears as an asset with about 25 million gold rubles on the credit side. The subsidizing of industry has been considerably decreased.

The state support of coal mining is 16 instead of 32, that of the metal industry 25 instead of 39.5, while the transport deficit is between 30 and 40 instead of 140 (all in millions of gold rubles). The naphtha production, which last year required a subsidy of 25 million gold rubles, will this year cover its own expenses. Important progress has been made in the forestry department, where the profits have increased from 15 million to 45 million gold rubles, which is already half of the pre-war surplus.

We give below a condensed statement of the chief items of the estimates. The figures in parentheses are the corresponding figures for last year:

INCOME		In millions of gold rubles
Taxes	498	(378)
State industries (with exception of posts and transport)	141	(48)
Transport	598	(376)
Posts and telegraph	39	(25)
Credit operations	253	(129)
Note issue	180	(390)
	1,709	(1,346)
EXPENDITURE		Per cent of total budget
Transport, post, and telegraph..	670	(542)	39 (38.49)
Army	313	(226)	18.3 (16.05)
People's commissariats	420	(371)	24.7 (26.35)
Industry	69	(116)	4.0 (8.24)
Agriculture	47	(66)	2.7 (4.69)
Electrification	39	(24)	2.3 (1.70)
Cooperatives	20	(9)	1.1 (0.64)
Treasury operations (amortization of loans, etc.)	130	(54)	7.9 (3.84)

TO READERS OF THE NATION:

As a result of joint conferences held in Chicago, St. Paul, Omaha, Denver, and elsewhere, it was agreed to call a National Farmer-Labor-Progressive Convention in the Twin Cities on June 17 next, to nominate new party Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates.

This Convention is pledged to the Abolition of Special Privilege, and the conferees designated as their platform: (a) public ownership of railroads; (b) control of money and credit by the people, through government and cooperative banks; (c) public control of natural resources; (d) preservation of civil rights guaranteed by the Constitution; (e) prevention of judicial abuses.

We will appreciate your filling in your answers to the questions following and returning to the above headquarters.

Returns received from Nation readers to date are as follows: La Follette 166, Borah 118, Norris 114, Amos Pinchot 52, Wheeler 49, Brookhart 48, Shipstead 26, Frazier 25, Murdock 19, Ladd 6, Hopkins 5, Senator Walsh of Montana 3, Underwood 2, Owen 2, James Harvey Robinson 1, Charles Beard 1, Justice Brandeis 1, Senator Reed 1, Gifford Pinchot 1, and "A Socialist" 1. FRANK A. PATTISON, Chairman.

ELECTION QUESTIONNAIRE

1. In view of the admitted corruption, lack of principle, subservience to special privilege, and practical identity of the Republican and Democratic Parties, as graphically illustrated in the recent Sugar, Oil, and Department of Justice scandals, do you favor a new political party?
2. Are you in general agreement with the national platform which has been adopted as the unanimous expression of the organizations affiliated in the new party movement?
3. Do you endorse the National Farmer-Labor-Progressive Convention called for June 17 in the Twin Cities?
4. Will you attend this Convention and serve as a delegate if selected?
5. Any local unit comprised of 25 people or more, who subscribe to this platform, is entitled to one delegate. Shall we send you a blank petition so that you can obtain the necessary signatures and qualify as a delegate?
6. Whom do you favor for President on the new party ticket? Indicate your choices by marking an X in each column.

GERMANY'S VOTERS showed an unexpected political maturity, disappointing M. Poincaré. French nationalists had been predicting an overwhelming sweep to the Right in Germany, and expected it to provoke a similar trend in France. The German voters, however, seemed to understand the significance of their action. Even the Nationalist Party, which gained most ground in the election, did not dare, at the end, to come out flat-footedly against acceptance of the Dawes report. The fire-eating party of revenge headed by General Ludendorff will enter the new Reichstag only thirty strong. The fact that Ludendorff, Admiral Tirpitz, Prince Otto Bismarck, Count Westarp, and Count Reventlow, a variously assorted group of reactionaries, will sit in the new Reichstag, is unimportant; they cannot dominate it. The Socialists lost less than was expected, although their strength in the Reichstag dropped from 173 to 99; the Communists, rising from 18 to 61, took up part of the loss, and the rest went to the parties of the Right. The three Center parties lost some forty votes between them, but a republican majority remains. Enabling legislation for most of the Dawes measures can be passed, but the constitutional amendment required to transfer the railroads to private ownership is not sure of the necessary two-thirds majority. A Socialist-Center coalition is still possible; or a Nationalist-Center combination may replace it, in which case, back in their natural role of Opposition, the labor groups may regain their lost prestige.

BLAIR COAN has suddenly become a figure of national importance. With him a gentleman named George B. Lockwood leaps into the limelight. Lockwood is secretary of the Republican National Committee, and Coan is the man whom Lockwood hired, early in the days of the Washington investigations, to "get something on" Senators Wheeler and Walsh. Lockwood sent Coan to Denver for affidavits and then on to Montana for an indictment, "fixing him up," apparently, with the proper introductions. Coan got the indictment of Senator Wheeler, but if the Republican National Committee thinks that the American people will long permit that sort of blackmailing it is about as mistaken as politicians can be. Senator Wheeler will not be frightened off by an indictment, and the revelation of this indecent attempt to stop his investigation will only increase the public interest in it. Similarly, when Harry Daugherty resorts to court action to keep the Senate Committee from reading the telegrams he sent while in office, ordinary folks become suspicious—both of Harry Daugherty and of the courts. Honest men are not so afraid of the light. The new Attorney General has named an assistant to help Senator Wheeler force Harry Daugherty's brother Mel to reveal his secrets; if President Coolidge is looking about for a method of regaining popular esteem he might do worse than to volunteer some advice to Harry Daugherty and the Republican National Committee.

ABOUT THIS TIME a year ago a committee headed by Elbert H. Gary, president of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation, reported against abolishing the twelve-hour day in the industry, as it would necessitate raising prices by 15 per cent and would call for 60,000 additional employees whom it would be difficult or impossible to obtain. President Harding asked for a reconsideration of the question, and public sentiment expressed itself so unmistakably that experiments with the eight-hour day were begun last summer. Today the shorter day is in effect virtually throughout the plants of the United States Steel Corporation and almost as generally in independent establishments. There has been no increase in prices and no lack of labor. The workers have sustained some losses, because although their hourly rate of pay has been generally increased, it has not been raised to a point which makes the total earnings what they were before. In spite of this, the Iron Age recently made a survey from which it concluded that the change was giving "general satisfaction" among the workers and had increased efficiency at many plants. Now comes a report from the Steel Corporation showing that the first quarter of 1924 produced the largest net earnings of any similar period in time of peace in the company's history. In addition to the regular dividends, fifty cents extra was declared on the common stock. As a general rule what is right proves to be possible.

MUSCLE SHOALS! Henry Ford's desire to buy for a song, and control upon his own terms, the amazing possibilities of the water-power there has had at least one good effect: it has turned public thinking from the hazy glorification of superpower in general into consideration of one important instance and the need of acting wisely in regard to it. The Nation is emphatically opposed to turning over Muscle Shoals to Mr. Ford on his terms, partly because those terms offer inadequate recompense and protection to the public, but still more because of a conviction that the country, while there is still time, ought to take steps to own and administer this vast new source of energy latent in water instead of permitting the growth of another anti-social and inefficient private monopoly such as now rules our coal fields. We commend to our readers and to Congress, therefore, the bill of Representative Keller of Minnesota, which provides for a Federal Public Service Commission of three members with full power to take over Muscle Shoals and other water-power, making fertilizer and furnishing electricity to the public at cost. The new body would supplant the existing Federal Power Commission. A bond issue of $500,000,000 would be authorized to be used as needed by the new commission.

THERE is something pathetic as well as nationally humiliating in the sight of the Governor of one of our great States sentenced to ten years in prison and a fine of $10,000. Warren T. McCray was never a notable figure in public life, but he had made money in business in Indiana, and in the present organization of our politics cash is necessary to run campaigns and keep parties alive. In return for it, Democrats and Republicans alike have long been accustomed to barter government places, the most distinguished and honorable going to the largest givers without any nice regard for their moral or intellectual qualifications. Why be surprised, therefore, if now and then we get a governor who is convicted on thirteen counts of using the mails to defraud; who, in the words of the judge who sentenced him, had violated hundreds of times the statutes he had sworn to uphold? Inevitably we shall have governors sent to jail from time to time—and deserving of it even oftener—until we put men in government offices because of what we think they can do for the public instead of what they have done for the political machines.

MUSSOLINI'S THUGGERY knows no diminution or decency. On the eve of the Italian elections, which the dictator was doubtless determined to win at any price, Giovanni Giglio, the Rome correspondent of the British Labor Party's Daily Herald and a contributor to The Nation, was expelled from the country without warning. Routed out of bed one morning, he was taken to police headquarters, where a government decree was read to him requiring that he leave Italy in twenty-four hours. As he tells the story:

This decree was passed at a cabinet meeting, upon the motion of Signor Mussolini. The reason given was public security. I asked the commissary if I could be granted twenty-four hours more to make the necessary arrangements, but he replied that I was to leave by the first train. I was forbidden to go home, and I was forced to wait at the police station until I could be escorted to the train. I was not allowed to get in touch with the British Embassy. I was only allowed to see my wife and ten-year-old son in the presence of the commissary. Before I left the commissary in my presence told the carabinieri that I was to be handcuffed if I tried at any point in the journey to speak English or communicate with anybody. . . . At the frontier station I was received with the greatest insolence by the Fascist in authority there, who told me "never to enter Italian territory again." "The atmosphere of Italy is not good for people like you," the bully went on. "The Fascist stick rules here with absolute power."

MR. COOLIDGE IS APPLYING to Cuba the same policy in regard to arms as was inaugurated in connection with the revolution in Mexico. He is authorizing the sale of munitions to the Zayas Government, but putting an embargo on similar exports to the revolutionists. In spite of its pacific tendency, we are disturbed at this action, especially as it evinces the arrival of a fixed policy in Latin-American affairs. There is much to be said in favor of the exclusive manufacture and control of munitions of war by the governments of the world, and perhaps of restrictions on their sale to other countries. The monger of munitions is certainly a breeder of war, but if the trade is to be controlled, it ought to be done by a policy debated and enacted by Congress—not by a President's fiat. Since the war our Department of State has prevented loans to Latin America without its approval, and it has now adopted the same policy in regard to munitions. In other words, it defines what are "good" and what are "bad" governments, and makes or breaks them accordingly.

OF COURSE THE EXERCISE of a power like this sets us up as dictators of the Western Hemisphere and enables us to mold governments and policies in the interest of our imperialism and our capitalism. From diplomatic meddling we have passed to military interference in Santo Domingo, Haiti, Nicaragua, and finally Honduras. American sailors are still in Tegucigalpa, the capital of the latter republic, having been sent in last winter to "protect" our "interests." In spite of a reported agreement upon a provisional president by the revolutionary factions, conditions in Honduras are still chaotic, and are likely to offer a long-continuing excuse for the presence of our troops and our bossism. In fact, troops will probably be kept there until we have clamped a loan upon Honduras, and afterward to assure its payment.

NOT SINCE THEIR COMMON FIGHT for independence more than a century ago have the Latin-American republics felt, as they do now, that sentiment of solidarity upon which their life was founded. Their two representative heroes, Bolivar and San Martin, demonstrated that the independence of each of those republics was conditioned on the independence of its neighbors. To have restricted their efforts to the liberation of their native states would have been considered as narrow as if Washington had fought for the liberation merely of his native Virginia. The continental sentiment that has slumbered for a century amid hatred and fratricidal strife is again awakening. It is as if some obscure instinct was warning of a future in which there would be no independence unless there was solidarity. The five countries comprising the former Great Colombia—Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia—will celebrate in June the centennial of the battle of Ayacucho, victory in which was for the natives the closing chapter of their long fight with Spain. President Leguia of Peru has been sounding the other republics as to the possibilities of renewing Bolivar's negotiations at the Congress of Panama for the unification of the five states into one confederation. Treaties covering boundary disputes, commercial concessions, and navigation facilities may open the way to broader agreements.

"TO KNOW MEXICO is almost a moral obligation," writes Frank Tannenbaum in the special Mexican number of the Survey Graphic, which helps make the task easy. Of the many distinctive contributions by this magazine none exceeds this issue in richness and variety. Here speak Plutarco Elias Calles, probably Mexico's next President; José Vasconcelos, whose achievements as Secretary of Education in the Obregon Cabinet The Nation recently described; Manuel Gamio, Mexico's leading archaeologist and ethnologist; Ramón de Negri, the Secretary of Agriculture, under whose direction Mexico's tangled agrarian problems are moving toward a solution; Diego Rivera, Mexico's foremost painter and one of the great artists of our time; Dr. Atl, expert on Mexican arts and crafts; Felipe Carrillo, the martyred governor of Yucatan; Elena Landazuri, who has been called "the Jane Addams of Mexico;" and American missionaries and travelers add their word. The synthesis of these widely varied interpretations is that our neighbor, Mexico, is entering a new epoch; that a social, cultural, and spiritual renaissance has begun south of the Rio Grande which is of profound significance to the two American continents.

THE LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS, because it is a huge national organization engaged in practical politics, is wary about the issues it selects for attention and support. It can work for better babies; but it cannot work for fewer babies or even for more wisely spaced and distributed babies. It can stand for law enforcement and, in a fairly general way, for peace. It can be enormously useful in certain progressive fields. But no one need hope that it will be able to support a revolutionary feminist program or fight for a measure that might give offense to any large number of respectable middle-class women. All of which explains why the recent convention of the League at Buffalo refused to include birth control among the planks of its 1924 platform. Meanwhile a small group of women backed by an enormous, unorganized, inarticulate demand is fighting for the passage of the Vaile-Cummins bill at Washington, to lift the ban on birth-control information. It is a slow, desperate fight, chiefly because the great organizations of women do not dare to help, although a victory would mean infinitely more to their millions of members than to the valiant little band which is carrying on the fight.

IT IS DOUBTLESS EASIER to attack the Eighteenth Amendment before a Missouri Society dinner than anywhere in the State of Missouri itself, but we are ready, none the less, to credit Nicholas Murray Butler with courage and conviction in his recent vigorous attack on prohibition. The enforcement of the Volstead Act is a scandal, both where it succeeds and where it fails, and few public men have been found with enough gumption to say so. President Butler of Columbia University is one of the few. Another is Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania. Their similarity, however, stops almost at the point where it begins: President Butler would solve the problem by throwing the law out of the window; Governor Pinchot would throw out the official non-enforcers of the law. President Butler, it may be assumed, would keep the responsible authorities pretty nearly intact; Governor Pinchot would keep the law. Supporters of the Governor might say to the philosopher and university president: What sort of logic is this, anyway; what sort of morals? If you tell your child not to eat candy and he goes right on eating it, are you going to solve the problem of law enforcement by telling him to go ahead and eat as much as he wants? And the supporters of the university president would answer: Are you going to tell your child not to eat candy and then pretend you have done the trick when you know that he is eating it on the sly and that other people are waxing fat off his deceit and dyspepsia? There is more to be said in the matter, but it is good, in any case, to have it discussed openly, with a refreshing lack of political hedging. We would be willing to go some distance with either or both in the general direction of lawful behavior and political honesty.

JANE ADDAMS, like Galileo, believes that the world does move. She has a right to believe it, for she has helped valiantly to make it move. In opening the Washington conference of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, of which she is really the founder as well as the international chairman, she reported impressively upon attempts, here and there in the midst of chaos and disorder, to live according to the principles of a new international order:

Austria has freely renounced a piece of Hungarian territory assigned her by the peace treaty; we recall the success in Holland of opposition to the proposed naval expansions; the decision of the British Government to abandon the construction of a naval base at Singapore; Gandhi has shown that a national movement for self-determination may be successfully conducted by moral energy ignoring brute force; the Conference on Naval Disarmament in Washington with its practical results; the withdrawal of the Japanese from the Chinese province of Shantung; the rising peace movement throughout the churches and theological schools; the "No More War" movement, rapidly increasing in so many countries; the peace resolutions of the International Education Conference held in San Francisco in 1923; the new note of decision in the peace committees connected with all women's organizations; the announcement of President Coolidge ten days ago that he contemplates calling a world conference for further limitation of armaments and the initiation of plans for the codification of international law.

FOUND AT LAST! The Baltimore Evening Sun, as our readers will recall, recently offered a prize for the solution of the perplexing problem, What is the difference between a Democrat and a Republican? Mrs. Esther Hollander won the prize. "A Republican," she explained, "is a person who thinks a Democratic administration is bad for business; a Democrat is a person who thinks a Republican administration is bad for business; both are right." It was to be assumed that the witty editors of the "Sunpaper" would award the prize to some such answer; the amazing fact is the unanimity of their readers. Some thousands are reported to have replied; of these 77 per cent discovered no difference whatever between the two great standard-bearers of the nation; 14 per cent painstakingly delved into history to prove that at least there had once been a distinction; and only 9 per cent boldly proclaimed belief in the existence of distinguishing-marks today. When Senator La Follette gets around to announcing his candidacy, he might take a hint from the spirited Marylanders and avoid the ancient hoodoo of third parties. Why not just call his new group the Second Party, and be done with the hoary myth of Democratic-Republican discord?

Submarines, World Court, or What?

IT is the same old, old story, whether you dwell in Washington, Tokio, London, or Timbuctoo. Whenever anyone talks disarmament there is always someone else to discover that the nation's navy, or army, is deficient in cruisers, or submarines, or javelins, or something. Poor old Admiral Coontz, commander-in-chief of the United States fleet, is deep in gloom because—as he sees it—the Panama maneuvers proved that the fleet was too slow and was short of aircraft carriers, submarine and destroyer tenders, modern submarines, and almost everything else. Admiral Coontz is shivering in his sea-boots for fear the British and the Japanese will outclass us. Worst of all, he finds, is our deficiency in submarines.

Japanese newspapers take time to reach the United States, but fortunately the British papers come more rapidly and can be read even by admirals. We suggest to Admiral Coontz that he put on his spectacles and read the accounts of a debate in the House of Commons on March 18. There he will find a speech after his own heart. Mr. Amery, sometime Tory First Lord of the Admiralty, told the House how unhappy he felt about the modest naval program of the Labor Party. The government estimates were £2,200,000 below those of the previous year, and still further below those which Mr. Amery would have regarded it as his duty to present had he still been in office. He would have spent five million pounds more for new cruisers; he would never have dreamed of abandoning the Singapore naval base, and he would have provided for more submarines. England had only 20 cruisers equipped for commerce destruction, he said, although the United States had 29 and Japan 28; she imperatively needed 18 new cruisers in the next two years. And England's submarine position was appalling. By 1929 she would have only 29 effective submarines, while the United States would have 122, Japan 73, and France 63. The poor man shivered as he thought of England's danger. Admiral Coontz would have sympathized with his every shudder.

Professional navy men, like professional army men, are always discovering danger, pointing to inadequacies, demanding more and ever more millions. It is a healthy antidote to these scares to read the newspapers of other countries and discover that their army and navy men are mongering the same scares. The Nation does not pretend to know whether Admiral Coontz is right in saying that America is short of submarines, or Mr. Amery in declaring that we are far ahead of England and Japan; but The Nation does know that in such matters it is never safe to heed "expert" advice. Ramsay MacDonald's reply to Mr. Amery was a masterpiece of calm common sense:

There must first be an allaying of international suspicions and anxieties such as exist today, and the construction of the naval base at Singapore would hamper the establishment of confidence and lay England's good faith open to suspicion. . . . This country has a short time in which it can rest secure that no war will overtake it within a certain limited number of years. We can use that time in developing military defenses, and thereby encourage others to do the same. Or we can keep our military forces as a nucleus only, and pursue other methods of security, such as agreements, good-will, and disarmament. The Government proposes to adopt the latter course. (Cheers.)

That, in our judgment, was sound statesmanship, and we hope that the American Congress will pay no more heed to the pitiful pictures painted by Admiral Coontz and his friends than Ramsay MacDonald paid to the unhappy Mr. Amery.

The real problem, of course, is how to move toward "agreements, good-will, and disarmament." A band of high-hearted crusaders have been preaching the World Court to the calloused ears of Senator Lodge and his associates on the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. We wish that we could join more wholeheartedly in their crusade. It seems to us that the peace-seeking forces which have concentrated their drive upon this issue have lost perspective.

We should like to see the United States participate in any effort to extend the scope of international arbitration. The fact that the Court is related to the League does not appal us; we know no better way at present available of selecting an international body of judges than through the Council and Assembly of the League. It is ridiculous to propose, as Mr. Lodge is reported to do, that the same individuals who compose the Council and Assembly should meet under another name to elect the judges. Once elected, the judges are utterly and absolutely independent—the politics of the League does not touch them, and their record of action, if slight, is to their credit. It is not their fault that important issues have not been submitted to them: that is the fault of the nations of the world. And it is precisely there that the insignificance of this issue of joining the Court appears. Until the peace advocates of this country are ready to couple their demand for adherence with a demand that the Court be given compulsory jurisdiction over all international disputes they are asking so little that their effort is almost wasted. There is a vast work of popular education to be done, and it should be done honestly. Americans berate the nations of Europe for their bellicosity, yet the very people who complain most loudly of the Europeans enact Japanese exclusion laws, cry for more destroyers and more submarines, and applaud American occupation of Haiti, Santo Domingo, Nicaragua, and Honduras. Until this country is ready to submit its own acts to international discussion the world-court issue seems a little vague and platonic.

We have not dangerous frontiers, like France and Germany. Our capital is not within easy airplane flight of a possible enemy's air bases. It is harder for admirals and captains to scare us by beating upon their tom-toms. We should be the natural leaders of the world movement for compulsory arbitration, for disarmament, for the outlawry of war. There is so much popular sentiment behind the cry for disarmament that even President Coolidge felt it wise to suggest another disarmament conference if Europe accepts the Dawes plan. The Dawes plan is, in principle at least, accepted. There is a lull in Europe's alarms—the defeat of the alarmists in Germany's elections shows the existence of a moment of appeasement. The time is ripe—will not the people who have so earnestly argued the somewhat academic issue of the World Court demand, now that an immediate opportunity is at hand, that our Government seize it?

Philip Snowden's Triumph

PHILIP SNOWDEN scored, according to all the dispatches, a triumphant success in presenting in the House of Commons on April 29 the first Labor budget. Newspapers of all shades of opinion admit, on both sides of the ocean, that no British chancellor ever showed greater mastery of his subject or presented it in a clearer or more interesting manner. This despised pacifist, this man who opposed his country's policy all the time that it was at war, this radical socialist without either the banking or business training usually expected of a chancellor of the exchequer, this visionary idealist who actually believes that an end can be made to the kind of acquisitive society which has made such a mess of the world, showed that he could take the cards from conservatives and beat them at their own game. For one hour and three-quarters this crippled man leaned upon his crutches to make his appeal, all but collapsing at its end. He was assisted to his seat amid the cheers of all parties and it is in keeping with the finest English parliamentary traditions that some of the first words of congratulation came from the lips of Austen Chamberlain, a former chancellor, now in opposition. That is the British sporting spirit. You differ from a man, you may even call him traitor for a time, but when he does a magnificent job you congratulate him out loud on his personal achievement before you undertake to show wherein you think he erred in his facts or his proposals. We fancy that those cheers must have paid Philip Snowden for many a slight and insult, if so brave and noble a spirit needed reward for having been true to his conscience and the right.

But there is more to this budget than a personal triumph for Snowden. It is a long step back toward the historic policy of free trade from which England departed under the pressure of the war and of her debt burden, aggravated by the mistaken economics of Lloyd George and other compromisers. With one blow the Chancellor went far toward "freeing the breakfast table." The coffee, cocoa, and chicory duties are to be heavily cut; that on tea, the greatest of English beverages, is cut in half and a reduction of three halfpence a pound is made on sugar—something to make every Britisher sit up and take notice. Every one of the war duties imposed by Reginald McKenna goes by the board on August 1. Thus the protection camel, which had got its head and neck well into the British tent and would have got half its body in had Stanley Baldwin won the last election, is ejected down to his nose. Even the high tariffs on foreign motor cars are to go; Englishmen may be allowed to buy cheaper automobiles than their fellow-countrymen can produce. That, some will say, is an outrage: anybody who would help his fellow-citizens to obtain cheaper methods of transportation must be first cousin to a Bolshevik!

There is no denying the fact that the Labor Government will have hard sledding on that issue. Already they are being charged with wishing to add to the unemployment that they went into office to reduce. Indubitably the workmen in this and other industries will protest. But that is to be expected if you cleave to free-trade principles and deal with an industry that has been created by artificial support and kept alive by artificial heat. The onus is not on the legislator who prefers the welfare of multitudes to that of groups but upon those who made the original error. We shall doubtless hear, too, that the budget is more one of expediency than of principle and there will probably be extremists in England to declare that there is no socialism in this budget, that it is a mere compromise, a sop to all classes to prolong the life of the Government and to win Liberal support. We are not much worried by that charge. It is sound reform policy, whether you call yourself Liberal, Labor, or Tory, to set your financial house in order and undo the glaring errors of your opponents. From any point of view that must commend itself as good business. There can certainly be no such far-reaching change as taking over the English coal mines unless the possibility of adequately financing them is present.

When one reads that in addition to all the other taxes to be cut the Socialist Chancellor proposes to do away with that upon excess profits which some of our politicians are eager to reimpose in this country, we can understand that the British business man must feel after reading this budget like a child who finds his Christmas stocking filled when he had expected nothing. As for the householder, he ought to be Snowden's friend for life because of the abolition of the hoary old inhabited-house tax, which has persisted for a century and a half, perhaps because nobody thought to do away with it. Truly Mr. Snowden has a right to claim that his budget is scientific, that it is reasonable and just, that it is aimed at no classes, and that it means a sturdy return to the only honest and sound fiscal policy for any country—free trade. We venture to prophesy that it will have an immediate and stimulating effect upon England's general economic situation, that it will speed her recovery from her present depression, and that it will be recognized for years to come as a great piece of statesmanship, wisely conceived, and executed with superb ability and superlative courage.

Fooling the Farmers

THE greatest American industry is the making and selling of gold bricks. Beside it the steel industry is a child and the cotton trade a babe in the crib. The gold-brick industry is a national one whose product enters every home in good times or in bad, but its sales campaigns are concentrated especially upon farmers and its boom periods are campaign years.

Heaven knows our farmers are this year, as perhaps never before, ready to grasp at anything which glitters. They were wholly deflated after the war, while the rest of industry had only part of the air let out of it, or none at all. Farmers are selling their produce, especially great staples like wheat and live stock, at about pre-war prices, while the levels of other commodities are more than 50 per cent higher. As we noted recently in these columns, more than 8½ per cent of the owner-farmers in fifteen corn- and wheat-growing States lost their farms between January, 1920, and March, 1923, while others to the proportion of 15 per cent were insolvent but held their land through the grace of their creditors. Farmers' banks have become the great landlords in the grain belt, the foreclosure of mortgages having made them the unwilling possessors of acres of land which they cannot rent or sell. A report made to Congress last March notes that in 1920, before agricultural depression set in, eight State banks failed.

By July 1, 1921, 100 State and 21 national banks had closed their doors. By July 1, 1922, the total was increased by 85 State- and 9 national-bank failures, and 111 State and 16 national banks were added to the list in the next twelve months. Between July 1, 1923, and February, 1924, 367 State banks and 66 national banks have failed. There were more bank failures in the past seven months than in any preceding five-year period.

Assuredly the farmers need help. Early in the present session of Congress the Norris-Sinclair bill was introduced for their relief. It provided for a federal commission to build, buy, or lease grain elevators and storage warehouses, and to purchase and sell farm produce at home or abroad. In other words, it proposed a government market system to reduce the present unreasonable middlemen's profits between producer and consumer to the benefit of both the latter. This measure stood a good chance of passage until another, the McNary-Haugen bill, was shoved in front of it. The McNary-Haugen bill has the approval of Secretary Wallace of the Department of Agriculture, but President Coolidge is believed to be against it. The Federation of Farm Bureaus and the National Grange have indorsed it, but the more democratic and near-to-the-soil Farmers' National Council is in opposition. The McNary-Haugen bill will probably fail and is doubtless intended to do so by many of its sponsors. Its only effect will be to sidetrack and defeat the Norris-Sinclair bill, and thus preserve the profits of the agricultural middlemen. The McNary-Haugen bill is a gold brick intended to attract the farmers and give the impression that the politicians are doing something for them in a campaign year. The measure will be touted in the agricultural sections, but at last will probably be quietly dropped. There will be no McNary-Haugen law, no Norris-Sinclair law, no law at all for the farmer's relief. His gold brick will turn out to be worthless stone.

Should the McNary-Haugen bill by some chance become law, it would be harder than stone on the community at large. The bill provides that artificial prices be set on certain staples so as to make them bear the same relation to other prices as the average of farm prices from 1905 to 1914, inclusive, bore to general prices during that period. A commission is authorized to buy and sell farm produce to the extent necessary to maintain these prices at home, while the President is instructed to clap on tariff rates to a point that would prevent the entrance of foreign products in competition. The commission would dump all surplus agricultural produce abroad for whatever prices it would bring. In short, the McNary-Haugen bill proposes to subsidize the farmer at the expense of the consumer—to support an expensive hothouse industry out of the pockets of the general public. Even so, the farmer is just as much entitled to this kind of coddling as are the manufacturers protected by our existing tariff, and it is hypocritical and absurd for newspapers and politicians who support the Republican protective system to object to its extension to agriculture. But The Nation does not believe in subsidizing either manufacturers or farmers. The McNary-Haugen bill proposes to reinflate the farmer, whereas the actual need is to deflate all industry.

The farmer ought to have a government-directed market system such as the Norris-Sinclair bill proposes, and he ought to have the benefit both in buying and selling that free trade would bring. Give him a fair field by these means, and he will be able to live without artificial respiration. Diversified farming and cooperative organization are already giving some farm regions new life; what the farmers want is not more pap but less middlemen.

What Is a Park?

WHAT is a park? New York City is having one of its periodic brain-storms in regard to the proper use of its matchless Central Park—still a bit of unsubdued nature in the midst of man-ridden Manhattan Island. The Mayor and his friends are for introducing a "civic center," a "war memorial," and the like; others are for keeping them out. Similar controversies are going on in other cities. Perhaps it would help to begin by defining a park.

A child once defined salt as something that makes food taste bad when you leave it out. Similarly one might define a park as something that a city isn't. It should be the antithesis of and the antidote for the city. Geographically it should be as close to, and in character as far from, the city as possible. The best park is that which gives one most quickly and completely the illusion of having left the city miles away. Granting this, one can put his finger at once on some things which as far as possible should be kept out of a park: noise, hurry, buildings, business, and amusements such as the city itself offers. On the positive side one wants quiet, repose, trees, grass, water, sunshine, air. Too much artifice is the ruin of many parks: too many formal "drives," too many statues, too many "lawns" with warnings to keep off the grass. The Parisians, with their fine sense for such things, are especially successful with their small parks. There are not many walks and often not much grass. Instead there are great trees, with fine sand spread over the ground; one may wander at will or sit where he pleases.

Generally speaking, New York's Central Park has been well preserved and handled. The smaller parks have not all been as fortunate. The great mistake in Central Park was to admit the automobile, with its spirit of hurry and unrest, its danger to pedestrians and its vitiation of the air along the roadways. Some day when we are better civilized, when the automobile has ceased to have the right of way over everything else, this particular evil will be banished from Central Park. Band concerts may be legitimate, for they do begin and end, they cannot be heard in the home, and are really musical; but could anything be more deadly than the proposal to introduce radio entertainment by means of loud speakers into New York's small parks? The city about them contains plenty of such entertainment and far too much loud speaking.

Loud speaking! Yes, the city roars at us on every hand, and in every way. It is relief from its merciless overtones that we most want in our parks. As Matthew Arnold put it in his Lines Written in Kensington Gardens (that rare survival of nature in the midst of London brick):

Calm Soul of all things! make it mine
To feel, amid the city's jar,
That there abides a peace of thine,
Man did not make, and cannot mar.

Children, lovers, and the aged—it is these that use most and most appreciate our parks. None of them belongs precisely to the city. Each one is living in his way a life apart from that of the throngs about him—the throngs preoccupied with making and spending money, mesmerized with the loud speaking (human and mechanical) of the age. Children, lovers, and the aged—all of us should belong, at least in spirit, to one of these classes. If we make and keep our parks for them we shall not go far wrong.

New Morals for Old Changes in Sex Relations

By ELSIE CLEWS PARSONS

THE other day I listened to a conversation on marriage and divorce between a well-known feminist, her daughter, and an Episcopal clergyman. The celibate cleric and the younger woman were in fair accord: the institution of marriage was invaluable to society and had to be protected. Let there be no divorce, said the cleric, on any ground, at least within the church; children should be cared for by both parents, divorce being sought only as an ultimate recourse, said the girl, who was two years married and had a son.

The feminist was bidding her time. Finally she said: "So much for the institution. What of the actual sex life? No divorce and continence or no divorce and intimacy with another?"

"The first, of course," said the cleric.

"Not at all; the second," said the girl. "And you, mother?"

"Oh, on the whole I'm for the brittle marriage as against the lax, the American way against the European. But most of all I am for tolerance in sex relations and for respecting privacy. Why not all kinds of relations for all kinds of persons? Just as there are now, but with respect or tolerance for the individual and without hypocrisy."

"Even if we did not agree," the cleric said later to the feminist, "we could talk about it as twenty years ago we could not. So much to the good."

"So much to the bad," said the girl's father, still later; "better for all of us the old reserve." The speaker was a lawyer with divorce cases in his practice.

Had we not here a mingling of currents from law, the church, feminism, and the younger generation which illustrates what divergency of attitude on sex and sex institutions or practices may exist today, even within the same cultural and local circle? Include circles of different education and locality and although the range of difference would be no larger the expressions of opinion would vary. Is the variation in opinion due to variation in experience or is it due to that contemporaneous lifting of the taboo on discussion which characterizes not only our talk about sex but about other interests as well? A remarkable and indisputable change of attitude, this release from verbal taboo, which often gives us a sense of change in general greater perhaps than the facts themselves warrant.

In the conversation I quoted the women were on the whole the radicals, the men on the whole the conservatives. This alignment was far from typical, I think, and yet in contemporaneous life, whether or not in opinion, women have been the exponents of cultural change in sex relations. The increase in the divorce rate, it seems probable, has been effected predominantly by women; about two-thirds of the total number of divorces are granted to women. (Of course the tradition that it is decent for the man to let the woman get the divorce must not be ignored in this connection.) This increase in divorce may indicate a changing attitude toward the criteria of marriage on the part of women. Women may be demanding more of marriage than in the day when they had little to expect but marriage. In other words, marriage standards mount as marriage has other relations to compete with. At any rate in the talk of women it seems to me that desire for integral satisfactions in marriage is more consciously or realistically expressed than ever before. Emotional and sexual appeasements are considered as well as social or economic advantage. What of the part played by women in changes in sex relations outside marriage?

Unfortunately, we have no dependable statistics of prostitution, but whatever decrease there has been in prostitution, and opinion is that with the passing of segregated districts there has been a decrease, may be, on the whole, put down to women, if only indirectly through an increase in illicit relations. Illicit relations are not subject to statistics, but that there has been an increase in them in this country in this century will be generally accepted, likewise that in this, too, the increase is due to women, alike more willing to participate in such relations and more tolerant of them in others. Again those curious suits for alienation of affection appear to be brought against women as much as against men; and theories of seduction by men have long since been sounding archaic to our ears. Even on the screen, the great present vehicle of traditional manners and morals, although rape is always in order, seduction is infrequent. Seduction with its complement of marital honor has been rendered an anachronism, through women.

The theory of seduction is affiliated with the proprietary theory of woman and, needless to say, this general theory has been undergoing considerable change for several decades. Today women are not only not property, they are property holders, and property holding has become a significant factor in the social independence of women. Of this social independence, independence in mating is the most recent expression, more recent even than political independence, and less fully realized or accomplished. Indeed it would be rash to predict how this type of independence may be expected to come about; apart from the gesture, sometimes gay, sometimes merely comic, of keeping one's name in marriage, there is no conscious feminist movement, in this country at least, toward freedom in sex. The political emancipation of women came to us as a reflex from abroad, largely through England. Whatever the political effect of militancy in England, without the advertisement of the British suffragette American women would be voteless today. Quite likely the direction of emancipation in mating may be determined likewise from abroad, perhaps from innovating Scandinavia or from Soviet Russia, where the last legal word has been said on sex equality.

This article is the second in The Nation's series on New Morals for Old. The first, Styles in Ethics, by Bertrand Russell, was printed in the issue of April 30. The next article will be Floyd Dell's discussion of Friendship Between the Sexes. The series will continue through the summer.

In the soviet laws on marriage and domestic relations there is no mention of suit for breach of promise or for alimony whereby woman proclaims herself a chattel, and according to the soviet code husband as well as wife is entitled to support if incapacitated for work. Incapacity for work is the sole condition which entitles either spouse to support. In other words, the Russian state has interested itself not in maintaining the proprietary theory of woman; but in providing for the care of man or woman in distress. Of such clear distinction American law is innocent. In American law the husband is still the provider and in this law lags but little behind current opinion, which holds that a married woman should work only when she has to. Dr. Herskowitz tells me that this American attitude is so well represented in the Negro population of Harlem that in gathering statistics of employment as soon as he learns the occupation of the husband he can predict whether or not the wife is at work. Low-paid employment for the husband means wage-earning by the wife, and highly paid employment means that the woman is not a wage-earner. Surveys in other parts of the country have shown the same condition. These surveys have been made among wage-earners, and concerned primarily with the margin of subsistence; but familiar enough is the record in other economic classes of the persuasion that marriage exempts a woman from industry or professional activity. The standing controversies about married women as school-teachers are fully documented instances. The Harvard prize play acted last year on Broadway hinged on the rigidity of the alternative of a man marrying and sacrificing his career or pursuing his career and sacrificing his love. There was not the faintest suggestion that the woman might contribute to the family income and so render marriage and career economically compatible. The young couple, to be sure, belonged to smart Suburbia, economically a conservative circle; but there was no indication in the play that the university intelligentsia did not hold to the theory of wifely parasitism, nor that audiences might question the theory. And I incline to think that few in those Broadway audiences, although drawn as they were from fairly composite circles, did question. Wifely parasitism is holding its own.

In less invidious terms, where income permits, the wife continues to be the consumer, the husband the producer. Conjugal partnership in production, familiar in Europe, remains by and large unfamiliar in this country. Outside of marriage, on the other hand, the last years have seen considerable lessening in our American forms of segregating the sexes. Not only has there been an increase of women in gainful occupations together with an increase of occupations open to women, but between men and women in business and in the professions relations are increasingly less restricted, influenced less by sex taboo. There is more co-operation, more good-will, more companionship.

Possibly this companionship between the sexes at large will have a reflex upon marriage, and marriage will become a more comprehensive partnership. The question of the married woman in gainful occupations is related, however, to a larger economic issue. Our capitalistic and competitive economy not only suffers parasites and drones, it compels them by reason of its inelasticity in providing for part-time labor. The whole workday or no work at all is the notice given to women who would be part-day homekeepers, either in their child-bearing years or because of other family exigency, as well as to men who are aging or invalid. For this economic waste and loss to personal happiness and welfare there seems to be no promise of relief in prospect. Just the opposite, in fact, for women, since, given the increasing mechanization of housekeeping and the ramifying organization of hospital, nursery, and school, women at home may have a larger and larger part of the day on their hands and their functions become less and less significant. In this connection birth control has been for some time an important factor. As knowledge of contraception becomes surer and more widespread and births more spaced, even during her child-bearing period the home-staying woman will have less and less call on her vitality and energy.

Discussion of contraception has been active in the last decade or so; but curiously enough its significance aside from contributing to directly saner ways of life* has been little realized. Birth control makes possible such clear-cut distinctions between mating and parenthood that it might be expected to produce radical changes in theories of sex attitude or relationship, forcing the discard of many an argument for personal suppression for the good of children or the honor of the family, and forcing redefinition of concepts of honor and sincerity between the sexes. In such redefinition reciprocity in passion, emotional integrity, and mutual enhancement of life might share in the approval once confined to constancy, fidelity, and duty, virtues that are obviously suggested by the hit or miss system of mating and reproducing our social organization has favored. With little or no self-knowledge or knowledge of men, a girl often marries in order to find out how much she cares or whether or not she qualifies, and then when her experience has but begun she finds herself an expectant mother, and maternity begins to supersede other interests. She may become a parent without the assurance of being well-mated, if not, more tragically, with the certainty of being mismated. Advocates of the monogamous family would do well to consider how essential to an enduring union, at least in our society, experience in love may be, together with restraint from child-bearing before experience is achieved.

That neither such considerations nor other changes in the theory of sex morality have yet come to the fore in current discussion is perhaps because the technique of contraception is still in the experimental stage, perhaps because in popular consciousness the morality of contraception in itself is not fully established. How is it going to be established? I doubt if through rationalism or rationalistic propaganda. Social changes, we begin to know, are rarely due to deliberation, in any society. In our society they are due mainly to economic causes. Housing congestion in New York will in time affect birth-control legislation in Albany; and fear of an overpopulated world will drive church as well as state into a new attitude toward multiplying to the glory of God.

As in birth control so in other matters of sex intimacy the growth of cities and the complexity of our economy may be the more potent factors of change. In very large communities there is an ignorance of the personal relations of others, an inevitable ignoring which contributes unconsciously to tolerance toward experiment and variation in sex relations. Indifference to the private life of others is almost an exigency of our economic organization. Attention is directed to the efficiency of the personality encountered and away from the individual means taken to induce that efficiency. What difference does it make to an employer how clerk or stenographer lives after hours provided he or she is competent, alert, and responsive to the business need? In office or in factory one may be but a cog in the machine and yet left larger personal freedom than in a more independent job in a small place or than in a household. Out of such urban influences—negatively, of indifference, and positively, of attention to personality per se—come opportunities for personal freedom that will set men and women to ordering their sex life to please themselves rather than to please society. That is, ordinary men and women; certain outstanding figures will have to continue to forego freedom. The President of the United States, presidents of banks or colleges, cinematograph stars, "society ladies," now and again a clergyman or a prize-fighter—all these will continue to be observed closely in their private life, and, like the gods and goddesses of other cultures or times, will have to conform to popular preconceptions of marriage or celibacy, chastity or libertinism. For them, as for other personages in folk-lore, individual adjustment or variation would be out of the picture.

* Dr. Ogburn informs me that his recent and still unpublished analysis of the census of 1920 shows that in localities where birth control is presumably practiced the marriage rate mounts. He states also that in the country at large there has been a higher marriage rate in the last census decade and that the age at marriage is earlier.

Shall We Remake the Supreme Court?

II. The Practice of Other Countries

By CHARLES GROVE HAINES

(The Nation began last week this series on the United States Supreme Court with an article on The Origin of Its Power, by Charles Warren. The series will be concluded next week with A Program for Reform, by Beulah Amidon Ratliff, and by an editorial article expressing the views of The Nation.)

IT is difficult to compare the American practice of judicial review with similar features of other governments, for comparisons prove misleading in dealing with the rather unusual powers of courts to declare legislative enactments void. Differences in the evolution of government and of legal traditions render this practice markedly different when adopted under circumstances varying greatly from the conditions prevailing in America.

Among the features that modify provisions for judicial review of legislation, the first is the fact that under continental European systems of government, or those whose legal foundations have largely been based upon the influence and traditions of the Roman law, governmental authority emanates from and is guided largely by the executive and not by the legislature as in Anglo-American countries. Certain conditions naturally result from this fact, namely, the establishment of separate courts or councils to deal with controversies between individuals and public officers; the courts as a rule are not permitted or in practice do not follow strictly earlier precedents or decisions; the natural deference to the executive officers and a traditional non-contentious habit of mind resulting therefrom lead to the acceptance of the authority of administrative officers rather than to a frequent contesting of their authority; and, finally, provision is made for a "state of siege" to be declared by the executive at his discretion, or sometimes subject to the consent of a committee of Congress, when individual rights and guaranties may be completely subordinated to the executive power. Under the "state of siege" the civil authority is taken over by the army, military tribunals try offenses against public peace and order, homes can be searched, arms can be taken from the citizen, and public meetings can be prevented. The frequency of the establishment of this condition, particularly in Latin-American countries, militates strongly against well-defined checks upon executive or administrative powers. Martial law in Anglo-American countries, which is the only thing comparable to the "state of siege," is seldom resorted to and is commonly held in strict subjection to the civil authorities unless public necessity requires military action.

Again, judicial review of legislation can have relatively slight influence in countries where constitutions are frequently revised and are readily amendable. There has been a progressive tendency to make the amendment of constitutions easy and to revise them completely at frequent intervals. Such a condition leaves little room for judicial review of legislation to develop.

Finally, where countries adopt written constitutions, and either do not insert extensive bills of individual rights or guaranties or do not include general phrases such as due process of law or the equal protection of the laws, by which legislation is to be tested, judicial review again has little opportunity for growth. There is no basis for the courts to construe implied limitations on legislative and executive powers. Making due allowance for these differences the governments of the world may, with respect to judicial review of legislation, be roughly grouped into the following classes:

1. Governments in which the legislature interprets finally the fundamental law. Examples: England, with an unwritten constitution; Chile, France, Italy, and Switzerland, with written constitutions.

2. Governments in which the authority to interpret finally provisions of the constitution, and as a consequence to invalidate acts in conflict therewith, is implied as a necessary requirement to maintain the equilibrium between federal and state governments. Examples: United States, Australia, Canada, Brazil, and Argentina.

3. Governments in which the constitution grants authority to the courts to interpret the constitution and to prevent violations of its provisions. Examples: Colombia, Czecho-Slovakia, Honduras, Irish Free State, Portugal.

4. Governments in which the power is considered as belonging to the courts to review the acts of coordinate departments but in which the power has been exercised so infrequently as to have little significance. Examples: Greece, Norway, and South Africa prior to 1910.

In group one the English system of guaranteeing individual rights is unique. After the great charters of liberty such as Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, and the Petition of Rights were issued in England and served to check the royal powers and prerogatives, a revolution occurred by which parliament became supreme and the king subordinate. After this change Coke's theory, proposed in the great conflict with James I, that reason and the common law as interpreted by the courts must be looked upon as superior to both the king and parliament, was discarded and by a gradual process parliamentary supremacy was established. Practically, then, since the beginning of the eighteenth century, the executive and legislative departments in England, under the designation King, Lords, and Commons, combine to legislate and to administer the laws. The judiciary and all other public authorities are bound to obey the mandates of parliament as the highest power of the state. In the words of an eminent jurist: "The corrective of the action of parliament as a human and fallible institution is not a legal corrective, lies not with the judiciary, but lies with parliament itself, acted upon by a fresh wave of public opinion, a higher sense of duty, a wider range of experience, or a broader perspective in the range of applied justice."

Parliamentary supremacy in England is modified to a considerable extent by what is known as the "rule of law." All officers are held strictly within the law as laid down by parliament, and the courts of England exercise an extensive review of the acts of public functionaries to see that they keep within the powers granted by law. Under this rule English courts recently held that not even the King in Council by executive order could take the property of a citizen during war time for military purposes without awarding just compensation for losses incurred. This practice of the courts, however, stops short whenever parliament expresses a clear and unequivocal mandate. For example, the courts of England decided that labor unions were corporations in the sense that they might be sued before the English courts. After an active campaign before the people and in parliament, an act was passed in effect reversing this decision; the courts thereafter were bound to follow and accept the act of parliament. But England has no written constitution, and it is generally believed that parliamentary supremacy is a natural result where no definite fundamental law has been formulated.

Chile, having modeled her government in certain respects after the English system, specially provides in the constitution that congress shall settle all questions as to the interpretation of the constitution.

A different plan of securing individual guaranties was developed in France, where a form of government and of legal principles was adopted, based, in large part, upon Roman principles and practices. Though a declaration of rights was framed in 1789, including most of the individual guaranties of the English charters, the method of securing these individual rights was placed on an altogether different basis. The same theory of separation of powers which was thought in America to require judicial review of legislative acts to preserve written constitutions and to protect individual rights was interpreted in France to forbid the judges from interfering in the exercise of legislative power and of preventing them from suspending the execution of laws. Owing to the resistance of the courts to executive orders and decrees prior to 1789, it was made an offense for a judge to interfere in the affairs of public administration. The result of these provisions and their interpretation is that France and certain other governments which are based to a large extent upon the French system of law expressly prohibit the courts from refusing to execute laws duly made and promulgated. Though there are today many Frenchmen who favor some form of judicial review of legislative acts, in practice, the parliament of France is regarded as supreme. Most Frenchmen who favor the adoption of the principle of judicial review of legislation emphatically declare that they do not wish to adopt the American theory of the separation of powers, the American doctrine of affording protection to vested rights, the broad rule of reason as a requirement for legislative acts under the due-process clause, and other implied limitations which American judges have interpreted as restrictions upon the exercise of legislative powers.

This does not mean that private rights are without protection in France. The courts, as in England, enforcing the rules of law, exercise an extensive review of the actions of public officers in that they possess the authority of holding executive ordinances illegal and of annulling administrative acts either for an excess or misuse of power.

France, unlike England, has a written constitution. This constitution, which provides for only a part of the actual framework of government and includes nothing as to the protection of the rights and liberties of the individual, has seldom been amended since its enactment in 1875. France looks upon her constitution as a rigid document, whereas the Constitution of the United States is thought to be quite flexible. France is one of the chief examples of a government with a written constitution and legislative supremacy; that is, where the protection and guaranties of the constitution rest with the legislature itself, guided and tempered by public opinion as the source of legislative power and authority.

Austria, Germany, Italy, and Poland have followed France in denying to the courts the power to examine into the validity of laws. To this list could be added many other countries with written constitutions, such as Japan, Spain, and Sweden, in which it is taken for granted that the normal functions of courts do not include the power of examining into the validity of legislative acts. So common is this impression that unless such power is expressly granted to the courts, or is regarded as necessary to adjust federal relations, it is assumed that the functions of the courts are confined to the interpretation and application of the laws, and this does not include an examination of their validity.

A modification of the English and French systems was adopted in Switzerland, where since the Middle Ages some form of federal government has prevailed. In Switzerland the legislature has been regarded as supreme, and has in its power the final interpretation of the constitution. But in order to render a federal system effective and to adjust the relations between the nation and the cantons, the courts were given the authority to review the acts of the cantonal legislatures. The guaranty, then, of individual rights in Switzerland, as in France, rests with the legislative bodies as influenced and guided by the public sentiment of the nation. The legislature of Switzerland is the final interpreter of the constitution, subject only to a referendum by which such a decision may be changed. It is worthy of note that Switzerland with a federal form of government and a written constitution deliberately rejected the main feature of the American plan of judicial review after a careful study and report on the plan by a group of experts. Switzerland, having in large part adopted the French administrative system, provides for the protection of private rights and individual guaranties on a basis similar to that of France.

The federal systems of Canada and Australia, among the governments in group two, carry the principle of judicial review of legislation one step farther than is done in Switzerland. The courts of these countries are regarded as having the right to review all legislative acts both of the state and of the central government in order to maintain the balance of powers as defined in the constitution. There is also in both of these countries judicial review of the acts of the provinces or of the states to see that these subordinate bodies do not overstep their jurisdiction; but judicial review of legislation in such countries as Canada and Australia has a narrow and limited application, for their constitutions contain few, if any, provisions guaranteeing individual rights and no general phrases such as due process of law, equal protection of the laws, or other language from which extensive implied limitations may be interpreted.

Citizens of Canada also take pride in the fact that their courts do not meddle with matters of economic or social policy, as did the Supreme Court of the United States in the Lochner or New York Bake-shop case, the Child Labor case, or the Minimum Wage case. Having no special provisions in the constitution for the protection of acquired or vested rights, corporations or citizens cannot appeal to the Canadian courts for the protection of such rights unless a branch of the government attempts to assert authority entirely beyond the scope of its jurisdiction. Rate-making, the control of public-service corporations, and most other economic or social affairs are regulated by Canadian legislatures or commissions established by these bodies, which act subject only to review by the legislative bodies themselves or an ultimate appeal to the electorate.

Certain South American countries such as Brazil and Argentina not only provide for the review by the courts of acts of the states which may be in conflict with national powers but also have accepted the American practice of declaring void the acts of coordinate branches of the government. The Brazilian courts, following the general purpose to adopt the American system as defined by Chief Justice Marshall, do not hesitate to declare void acts of the national congress. Eight acts have been held invalid since 1915. Though similar authority is exercised by the courts of Argentina, the power is used less frequently and, as compared with either Brazil or the United States, such decisions are exceptional. Similarly the provincial or state courts of Argentina have shown great reluctance in declaring acts invalid. This reluctance is thought to be due to the fact that the citizen, following Spanish traditions, prefers to abide by the law rather than to test its constitutionality. Another reason is thought to inhere in the greater authority accorded to and confidence in executive agencies which is characteristic of most Latin-American countries. The rather common practice in Brazil and Argentina of instituting by executive order the "state of siege," previously referred to, interfere with the development of traditions favorable to the establishment of effective individual guaranties. Moreover, the fact that the courts in South American countries follow the French practice of according comparatively little weight to precedents renders the basis for judicial review insecure and vacillating.

A somewhat limited form of judicial review of legislation has been devised in the writ of amparo used in the neighboring republic of Mexico. The original purpose of the writ of amparo was designed so that the federal courts should aid every citizen in the preservation of the rights conceded by the constitution. In practice the application of the writ has been narrowed to the twenty-nine enumerated guaranties in the constitution, and laws will not be declared void unless one of these guaranties has been violated. The authority may not be used to pass on conflicts of jurisdiction, and suit can be brought only in an original action before the Supreme Court. Barring the difficulties which have militated against orderly judicial procedure in the determination of private rights in Mexico, it is obvious that legislative acts can seldom be held void under such a limited judicial review.

Among the governments in group three, in which the constitution grants authority to interpret the constitution and to declare acts in conflict therewith void, the courts in Colombia and Haiti seem to exercise the power so rarely as to have little effect on the course of public affairs. In other countries, such as Costa Rica, Cuba, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Venezuela, where Spanish-American traditions prevail, the exercise of such powers by courts cannot have results in any way comparable with judicial review in the United States. Czecho-Slovakia and Ireland have adopted the plan too recently to determine what form of judicial review may be adopted.

In comparing judicial review of legislation in the United States with this practice in other countries it should be noted that it is customary in almost all countries for the courts to exercise a limited control over the acts of corporations and subordinate units such as municipalities and similar public organizations. This control is usually referred to as declaring acts ultra vires, meaning that the acts of these subordinate corporations or public governmental bodies are void if they attempt to exercise powers beyond those which are expressly or by necessary implication granted to them. Furthermore, it is not uncommon for the courts to require that the acts of these subordinate bodies must be reasonable and to hold certain acts invalid if regarded as unfair or unreasonable.

Misunderstandings have resulted also from the failure to distinguish between review of legislation and judicial review of ordinances and of the acts of administrative and executive officers, which is common practice throughout the world. An extensive review of this character is exercised by the English courts under what is known as the "rule of law," to which reference has previously been made, and by review in France and other countries with similar political systems of all acts of executive and administrative officers.

Another basis for misunderstanding has arisen over the failure to distinguish between review over a central government from that over subordinate divisions such as states and provinces in federal systems of government. Where a federal government is established some agency must delimit the powers between the central and local governments. It has been quite common to place this delimitation of powers upon the courts, and in a number of federal systems the judiciary tests the validity of laws of the states or provinces to discover whether they are in accord with the fundamental written law. This is the practice in Switzerland, where the courts exercise such powers but are denied the greater authority of passing on the acts of coordinate bodies. Judicial review of subordinate divisions is established in Australia, in Canada, and in the new German constitution, and comprises the most important part of judicial review in these countries. A similar review has been established in the federal systems of Brazil and Argentina. This type of judicial review needs to be distinguished very carefully from the attempt of the courts to pass on the acts of coordinate legislative bodies. It is in the latter field where the courts exercise their most important function in the review of legislation in the United States.

In the government of the United States the courts exercise, first, an extensive surveillance over the acts of subordinate units of government, such as cities and counties, both to keep local authorities within their jurisdictions and to test their acts as to fairness and reasonableness; second, all acts, orders, or rules of administrative and executive officers are subject to review by courts to see that they keep within the law and that their powers are not abused to the detriment of the lives, liberties, and property of individual citizens; third, another phase of judicial review in the United States inheres in the control exercised by the courts over acts of the States which are regarded as in conflict with the federal Constitution, treaties, laws, and regulations (this authority is exercised frequently both by State and federal courts); fourth, by far the most important part of judicial review in this country is the practice of courts, federal and State, of declaring void the acts of coordinate departments, such as the Supreme Court in invalidating acts of Congress, and the State supreme courts in invalidating acts of the State legislatures.

Of even greater significance than the adoption of all four of the above phases of judicial review in the United States is the fact that much the larger part of the powers now exercised by the courts in reviewing legislation has resulted from the application to executive and legislative acts of judge-made concepts and restrictions. A considerable part of these restrictions has grown up in connection with the doctrines of vested rights and of implied limitations on legislative powers conceived as inherent in the American concept of free government. Free government, as understood elsewhere in the world, seldom requires the application of such judicial checks. But in the United States public sentiment in the main has approved the process of developing limits to legislative powers both by express provisions of written constitutions and by judge-made implied limitations.

It is in the exercise of this extraordinary power, not generally recognized as belonging to the functions of courts and not expressly provided in American written constitutions, that more than fifty acts of Congress have been nullified and from 1,500 to 2,000 acts of the States. It is the combination in this country of all four of these phases of judicial review, and of numerous additional express and implied restrictions on legislative and executive acts, which has given currency to the term "judicial supremacy," or as French commentators put it "government by judges," and that warrants the assertion that the United States is the prime example today in which a theoretically democratic political order is tempered and confined by a series of checks administered by an "aristocracy of the robe."

South Tyrol—Austria's Lost Province

By ROBERT DELL

(This is the first of a series of three articles on the situation in the South Tyrol. The next article will be on the Results of Fascist Rule.)

Bozen, March 20

OF the many violations by the Allied and Associated Powers of the conditions on which the armistice was concluded perhaps the annexation to Italy of German South Tyrol was the worst. It was not even supported by one of those shadowy historic or prehistoric claims by which some other annexations were excused. The Tyrol is and always has been German—it is indeed one of the oldest centers of German civilization—and there is no sort of racial or cultural difference between the Tyrolese living on the north of the Brenner and those living on the south. There is scarcely a Tyrolese living on one side of the Brenner Pass who has no family connections on the other. One brother of a family may live in Innsbruck, another in Bozen. It is true that the pre-war Austrian province—"die gefürstete Grafschaft von Tirol"—which stretched from the Bavarian to the old Italian frontier—from Kufstein in the north to Riva in the south—was not inhabited solely by Tyrolese. The Austrian census of 1910 showed that there were then in the Austrian territory south of the Brenner 363,413 Italians, 229,481 German Tyrolese, and 19,605 "Ladiner" speaking a dialect of Italian, also spoken in certain parts of Switzerland. These three nationalities were not, however, intermingled as different nationalities are in certain other parts of Europe, but were separated into sharply defined geographical areas. The northern part of the old Austrian province—South Tyrol proper—contained in 1910 215,933 Germans and only 6,704 Italians as well as the 19,605 "Ladiner" who all lived in the valleys of the Dolomites, where there were only 581 Germans. The southern part—the Trentine—had 356,709 Italian inhabitants and only 13,550 German. In accordance with the principles professed by the Allied and Associated Powers and accepted by both sides as the conditions of the armistice, only the Trentine should have been annexed to Italy, or at most the Trentine and the region inhabited by "Ladiner." The majority of the latter, however, expressed the desire not to be annexed to Italy in an appeal addressed to the German Tyrolese in October, 1918, in which as "the oldest native population of the Tyrol" they claimed the right of self-determination. "We are," they said, "no Italians, we have at all times refused to be Italians, and we will not be Italians in the future."

To do the Italian Government justice it has never contested these facts or made any hypocritical pretense of reconciling the annexation of German South Tyrol with the Fourteen Points. It claimed and obtained the Brenner frontier solely on the ground that a "strategic frontier" was necessary to the safety of Italy, although in fact such a frontier would have been adequately secured by the annexation of the Trentine alone. A small piece on the extreme east of German South Tyrol was left to Austria and the rest of the southern Tyrolese were handed over to Italy like cattle in defiance alike of their sentiments and their eco-conomic interests. It would have been no greater injustice to give the whole Tyrol to Italy, and that course would have inflicted less injury on the Tyrolese, for at least their unity would have been preserved.

The division of the Tyrol is, if possible, a greater crime against its inhabitants than its total annexation would have been, for it is the dismemberment of a living entity—of as perfect and as natural a political and economic unity as is to be found anywhere in the world. It has entailed both moral and material suffering. Families have been divided, some of their members becoming Italian citizens while the others remained Austrian. What must be unprecedented conditions have been produced by the provisions relating to the acquisition of Italian citizenship. Persons born and domiciled in the annexed territory became Italian citizens by right, unless they preferred to leave the territory, as many have. Persons domiciled in the territory but not born there could apply for Italian citizenship, but the application could be refused. On the other hand, all persons under eighteen born of parents domiciled in the territory were obliged to become Italian citizens. The consequence is that in some cases the father has been refused Italian citizenship and his children have been forced to become Italians. A typical case is that of a doctor born in Innsbruck who has practiced in Brixen for thirty years. He was refused Italian citizenship and was recently expelled from South Tyrol, so that he is obliged to begin life over again, while his two sons have become Italian citizens ipso facto and are actually doing their period of military service in the Italian army.

In some cases people have been granted Italian citizenship and subsequently deprived of it and expelled on the ground that they had proved themselves unworthy of the honor—which means of course that they had joined in political action distasteful to the Italian authorities. The worst cases of all are those of certain old Austrian officials who were given Italian citizenship and kept in their places after the annexation and have now been turned into the street. Being Italian citizens they have no longer any claim on the Austrian Government, and some of them are starving. Expulsions have taken place at forty-eight hours' notice. One such case—also a typical one—is that of a Tyrolese born in North Tyrol who had lived in Bozen for years and who had to sell his house and all the belongings that he could not take with him at a heavy loss. In other cases applications for Italian citizenship are left for an indefinite period without a reply. Meanwhile the applicant is kept under observation and is liable to be expelled if he does anything of which the Italian authorities disapprove. Austrian citizens owning property in the annexed territory but not possessing the necessary qualifications for acquiring Italian citizenship as a right have had their property confiscated under Article 249 (a) of the Treaty of St. Germain. Commercial men with places of business on both sides of the Brenner have now a frontier and a tariff wall between their two business houses and cannot go from one to the other without an Italian visa, which means, if they live in North Tyrol, that they must not offend the Italian authorities.

The natural economic consequences of the annexation are serious for South Tyrol, whose chief industries are wine and fruit-growing and tourists. South Tyrol produces on an average about 400,000 hectoliters (nearly 9,000,000 gallons) of wine a year and the production of fruit is very large. Of the wine about one-fourth is grown on the hill-sides and is of the best quality; that grown in the valleys is inferior. As the most southern part of Austria South Tyrol had an advantageous position and the chief markets for its wine and fruit were Austria and Germany, although the best qualities of wine and the choicest early fruits were also sent to Switzerland and elsewhere. As the most northern part of Italy, which has all the wine and fruit that it needs and more, South Tyrol is in a very disadvantageous position. There is no market for its produce in Italy and the Austrian market is now cut off by a tariff wall. The import duties on wine both in Germany and Austria are so high that the South Tyrolese producer can sell in these countries only at a price that does not give him a profit. The export trade of the cheaper wines is thus seriously diminished and prices are so low that it no longer pays to grow them and the vineyards in the valleys are beginning to go out of cultivation. This is also to some extent the case with fruit. The Trentine is suffering in this way as well as German South Tyrol. An Italian peasant in the Trentine said to a friend of mine recently that the bad of the Austrian times was better than the good of the Italian. As for the port of Trieste, it is ruined by the competition of Venice. Once prosperous and flourishing, because it was the only important Austrian port, it is now as an Italian port superfluous and decadent.

Since the economic factor is the most important in human affairs, even the Irredentists of the Trentine may begin to regret their victory if they find that it has changed their economic conditions for the worse. At least the rulers of Italy should do their best to compensate the inhabitants of the annexed territory for the inevitable economic disadvantages of the annexation and to diminish those disadvantages as far as possible, but they seem rather to be aggravating them by vexatious regulations and interference. For example, pressure is unofficially used to compel North Tyrolese firms with branches in South Tyrol to dismiss from the latter their North Tyrolese employees, whom they may find it difficult to replace. In the case of licensed trades—hotels, inns, and bathing establishments—interference has gone much further. By a decree of the prefect of the province of Trent "not more than 5 per cent of the entire personnel (director, cashiers, waiters, servants, porters, boots, interpreters, cooks, guides, etc.) may be foreigners," and failure to comply with the decree will be punished by the loss of the license. Although this law came into force at the beginning of last November I understand that it is not yet strictly applied. Should it be enforced, it will inflict serious injury on one of the most important industries of South Tyrol. Visitors from every country flock to Bozen, Gries, Meran, Cortina d'Ampezzo, and the many other tourist resorts in South Tyrol, and it is essential that the hotel employees should be able to speak foreign languages. It is equally essential that they should be well trained and competent. If the South Tyrolese hotels are compelled to dismiss a large proportion of their staffs, they cannot fill their places at a moment's notice with Tyrolese peasants. Moreover, some of the hotels are open only during a particular season and their employees go elsewhere for the rest of the year. On the Italian Riviera about 40 per cent of the hotel employees are foreigners, yet no such regulation as that imposed on South Tyrol has been made for the rest of Italy. If it were made, the Italian hotel-keepers would soon protest, for the regulation is impracticable.

Injunctions Don't Make Dresses

By JOHN NICHOLAS BEFFEL

DAILY for eight weeks the picket-lines have formed in the clothing district of downtown Chicago; have been broken repeatedly by injunctions, policemen, and thugs; and have formed again. Slowly, back and forth in a short space, in all kinds of weather, the pickets march. Twelve hundred strikers are still out; 90 per cent are girls and women. They are a determined lot; it takes high courage to go on the line when you know that you may be beaten or have your wrists twisted by burly men in uniform or out of it, and then be thrown into a small cell without medical attention.

Only fragments of the real story get to the great newspaper-reading public. The arrests of pickets, the oratory of the State's attorney are detailed, but the regular daily papers never portray the actual causes behind the conflict. They tell that so many pickets were fined or sentenced to jail for violating Judge Denis E. Sullivan's injunction against picketing, but they never explain why hundreds of strikers persist in defying that injunction day after day.

Back of the happenings in the dressmakers' strike are long-existent grievances—they complain of hours too long at tedious work which wearies eye and body; dissatisfaction with wages which, earned during seven or eight months in a seasonal trade, must be spread across a whole year; unsanitary conditions in many garment shops; and the thing known as the "American plan."

At first 2,500 quit their jobs, but about 1,300 have returned to work under union conditions in eighty-one shops which have agreed to the workers' demands. These are mostly small shops. There are two other groups, which are battling aggressively against the union. One comprises five big employing corporations which had a gentlemen's agreement with the union in 1919-1921, then broke off relations, and which have operated open shops ever since. This group uses what the unionists term a "yellow dog" contract, which provides that the employee must never even discuss unionism with anybody while she has her job. In the second group are about twenty-five employers who have conducted union shops for six years, but who are ambitious to deal individually with the workers in the future.

Sponsored by the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, the dressmakers struck at the beginning of the busy season. They demanded the right to organize, a 40-hour week instead of 44 hours, 10 per cent increases in wages for piece workers and specified flat increases for those paid by the week, unemployment insurance with the workers paying to the insurance fund 1 per cent of their wages and the employers the equivalent of 2 per cent, establishment of workable arbitration machinery, separate toilets and wash-rooms for women and men, rest-rooms for emergencies, and shop-floors swept daily and scrubbed weekly.

There are five divisions of work to be considered: cutting, operating (using a sewing machine), draping (pinning a dress together on a dummy figure), finishing (hand work, putting on snappers, buttons, and trimming), and pressing. Cutters were paid $39.50 a week—they ask $43; drapers, who received $23, want $29; finishers, whose wage was $18, demand $24. Operators, doing piece-work, were paid on a theoretical minimum basis of 85 cents per hour, with each operator expected to sew an agreed-upon number of garments every 60 minutes—as large a number as the employer could get the union's price committee to agree to. On expensive garments, on which the manufacturer reaped a handsome profit, it was possible to run the rate up to $1 an hour and sometimes more, but in small shops where cheap garments were made, the rate often was pushed below 85 cents, so the strikers declare.

Under the old agreement, wherever it existed, the employer had the privilege of discharging any worker during the first week of employment without specifying a cause; after that he could not dismiss any one without an adequate reason. But that tenet was frequently violated. And the agreement called for settlement of all job disputes within twenty-four hours, but the thing seldom worked out that way—for instance, in argument as to a unionist's right to a given job.

When the dressmakers walked out, the employers brought in a limited number of strike-breakers from St. Louis, while numerous others were recruited locally. But the picket lines turned many of them back, shaming them away. On the third day, Judge Sullivan issued his injunction, based on the Illinois anti-picketing law forbidding the union and everybody else from picketing or congregating near the premises of the complainants; from addressing any of the strike-breakers as "scabs" or applying any other epithets to them; and from attempting to induce any persons from entering into or continuing in the employment of the complainants, by means of threats, intimidation, force, violence, or coercion.

To enforce this injunction, about 125 policemen were placed on duty in the strike zone, six blocks square—plus numerous individuals in plain clothes known as "Crowe's men," these being from the State's attorney's office; and uncounted thugs hired by the dress manufacturers.

But the officers didn't wait for the strikers to use threats, intimidation, violence, or coercion, according to dependable eye-witnesses. Arrests of pickets on disorderly-conduct charges had begun before the injunction was issued. And as the strike continued, with the open-shop employers getting little production while orders from the trade were going to other cities, the police and the plain-clothes men brought hard-handed methods into play.

There have been about 750 arrests in eight weeks; 525 of these, it is estimated, were made by "Crowe's men." Some of the girls arrested were brutally beaten, and complaint has repeatedly been made that these girls were crowded into small unsanitary cells, and were kept there for hours without being booked. As a general rule, the men prosecuted before Judge Sullivan for defying his injunction were sentenced to fifty days in jail and fined from $200 to $450. The girls were sentenced to serve from five to forty-five days in jail and were fined from $25 to $350. A few were only fined. All convicted have appealed their cases and given bail. Others brought into court have demanded jury trials and gained postponements.

One advantage possessed by the strikers is that they have an energetic and fearless daily newspaper devoting extensive space to the conflict—the Daily Worker, established here in January by the Workers Party. Fragments from the news as delineated by the Daily Worker give a picture of the situation from the strikers' point of view.

Sarah Zelinsky was arrested at the request of a newspaper photographer so that he could get a good flash of a girl hustled into the patrol wagon.

Sophie Altschuler was beaten so severely by Officer 3181 that she has been under the constant care of a physician ever since. . . . Sophie lay on the hard bench of the cell from 4:30 p.m. till after 6 p.m. without being able to get even a bit of water to bathe her head. . . . Carrie Siever says that the policeman who arrested her and Sophie . . . told the officer in charge of the patrol to tell the matron . . . not to book Sophie and Carrie till after six o'clock. . . . Carrie called the attention of the matron to Sophie's condition. The matron said, after looking at Sophie through the bars of the cell, "Oh, she's all right. The skin has not been broken." The matron refused to call a doctor in spite of the fact that there was a city physician on the next floor. . . .

When he (Officer 3181) saw her (Sophie) brought into the hall Friday night he began to swear and curse at her. . . . He began twisting her arms and fingers. Sophie tried to defend herself. This infuriated him the more. He then took her head in the crook of his arm and squeezed it. He threw her to the floor and Sophie fainted. . . .

Rose Trimtz, Freda Ashkamezy, and Louise Huhm were slugged on West Adams Street. The Worker reports:

The girls were on the picket line in front of the Francine Frock Company's when four company gangsters rushed out at them with drawn straps flying. Mercilessly assailing the girls with their straps they shouted curses and threats. Several big policemen stood by complacently while the unprovoked assault was going on and made no effort to interfere, until—a girl wrested the strap away from her assailant and began thrashing him. . . . Then the police marched to the aid of the sluggers and arrested the girls.

Two committees have conferred with Mayor Dever about the strike—one a group of four from a committee of 15 appointed by the Chicago Federation of Labor, the other a citizens' committee headed by Father Frederic Seidenberg of Loyola University. In these conferences it developed that the police had no orders to protect strikers. The mayor was urged by the labor group to have the activity of the police confined to enforcing the law, so that further brutality to unionists might be prevented. Dever expressed the belief that State's Attorney Crowe's men and not the uniformed city police were doing the rough work in the strike zone. Three days later the citizens' committee read to the mayor a report made by observers from Hull House. These observers declared that the uniformed men, "Crowe's men," and private detectives alike, with few exceptions, "use profane, abusive, and obscene language in the presence of and addressed to women; . . . threaten strikers with violence and arrest; . . . violently handle passersby with no provocation and without arresting them; . . . arrest persons indiscriminately on the charge of disorderly conduct; and are often unable to state what constituted the disorderliness."

"The uniformed officers act largely under orders from the State's attorney's men," the Hull House observers continued, "and both groups act directly or indirectly under orders from the struck employers."

They recorded Arthur Weiss, one of these employers, as "giving orders in very strong language to officers in uniform and in plain clothes at Market and Jackson Streets, more than a block from his shop. They obeyed his orders and referred to him as 'the Boss.'"

One girl had been arrested (on March 7) and Officer No. 3181 was heard to remark, "Let's get some more in so we can fill the wagon." At 4:30 he roughly arrested three girls. When asked why he answered, "They were walking three abreast." . . .

Five days after Mayor Dever had expressed implicit confidence in the integrity of the city police, the charge that Sophie Altschuler had been beaten by Officer 3181 was published. The accused officer has made no demand for a retraction of the charge, but is quoted as saying that the girl attacked him and that he acted in self-defense. Miss Altschuler was in bed for four days after being let out of jail on bond.

There was a call for mass-picketing at a meeting of the Chicago Federation of Labor when the strike had been going three weeks. It upset the federation's tranquillity. John J. Johnstone of the Painters' Union sounded the call, declaring the local central body was bound by the tenets of the America Federation of Labor to support the fight against the Sullivan injunction. John Fitzpatrick, president, answered that no such action could be taken without invitation from the striking union. Anton Johannsen, chairman of the committee of 15, declared this invitation had already been officially extended. Johannsen reminded the meeting that the A. F. of L. in its 1914 convention at Philadelphia proclaimed that union men must ignore injunctions completely and should go to jail if necessary in defiance of writs against their freedom. And in 1916, it was pointed out, the A. F. of L., in convention at Baltimore, declared:

We recommend that any injunction dealing with the relationship of employer and employee . . . be wholly and absolutely treated as usurpation and disregarded, let the consequences be what they may. . . . Kings could be and were disobeyed, and sometimes deposed. In cases of this kind judges must be disobeyed, and should be impeached.

But the Chicago federation chose to help the strikers by raising money instead of reinforcing their picket lines.

Judge Sullivan was swung into office again at the last judicial election in the face of his well-known unfriendly attitude toward labor. Lack of vision on the part of the officials of organized labor in Chicago is blamed for Sullivan's reelection. Obviously the labor officials made a tactical error when they failed to put a labor ticket into the field with all the backing at their command. Instead they contented themselves with calling for the defeat of "enemies" and the rewarding of "friends" on the old party tickets.

National Public Opinion

By WILLIAM HARD

THIS country is widely and frequently supposed to be a country of great mental uniformity and of highly standardized sets of ideas and feelings. "Sheep, my dear fellow, sheep," is what a distinguished Englishman is supposed to have remarked to a fellow-Englishman while contemplating in 1916 our passion for neutrality in the Great War and while predicting our approaching and subsequent equal passion for belligerency in it.

It is also observed that women's styles of dress are spread with extraordinary rapidity from coast to coast and from the largest cities to the smallest hamlets, producing among us long ago the well-known, even if slightly extravagant, remark that in the United States the "jay town" has almost disappeared. It is further asserted that the newspaper telegraph wires, the newspaper syndicated features, running simultaneously in multitudes of newspapers in metropolitan communities and in the capitals of countries, together now with the radio, distributing its messages to the pure Irish or Boston and to the pure English of the fastnesses of the Alleghenies alike, have brought it about that the same thoughts dwell in all minds in this country from the rock-bound coast of Maine to the sun-kissed orange groves of southern California.

It is a theory to which this political writer pays a deferential homage, since it is widely held and since in politics a theory widely held should never be treated with discourtesy. On the other hand, however, this writer, in recent travels in the region between the valley of the Missouri and the valley of the Hudson, has been led to defend the thesis that in spite of all resemblances between Americans and sheep, and in spite of standardized patterns for women's clothes, and in spite of universal telegraph wires and of universalized newspaper daily and Sunday features, and in spite even of the educating and harmonizing influence of the radio, the amount of misapprehension and of misunderstanding and of variety and diversity of views and sentiments between region and region and between district and district in this country is enough to fill the beholder both with sympathy and with admiration for the politicians at Washington who have to manage, and who do manage, to bring the country ultimately to some sort of moderately united and moderately satisfying action.

In the valley of the Missouri it is for the most part thought to be simply preposterous that Al Smith of New York should even bother to have delegates in the Democratic National Convention. A similar view is entertained in many parts of the South. People in such regions largely refuse to believe that the effort put forth on behalf of Al Smith is serious. They think that there is a joke in it, a catch in it, somewhere.

In Britain J. Ramsay MacDonald can find a constituency, at need, in almost any geographical region of the island. In this country Mr. Al Smith would wander a long time in the States west of the Mississippi before his indubitable personal charms and high public capacities would win him a governorship; and in the region south of the Potomac he might pursue that governorship all the rest of his life and still find it eluding him.

To the dries and to the anti-Catholics of certain large areas of this country the state of mind of New York, in spite of the radio, is an inscrutable mystery. Also, and again in spite of the radio, the superstition that George Brennan, Democratic boss of Illinois, is a malignant machine monster pining to devour and to destroy the uprising democracy of a progressive people can, and does, continue unabated within a few hundred miles of Chicago on the other side of the Mississippi.

In Nebraska no conservative Republican, no matter how conservative he may be, and no matter how ardently he may admire the Esch-Cummins Railroad Transportation Law, is likely to dare to express that admiration while running for office unless he has the courage of Ajax, and he seldom has it. In New Jersey few constituents would stay awake to listen to any candidate who was denouncing the Esch-Cummins Transportation Law, although at that very moment, if his words were carried by radio to the banks of the river Platte, he might keep most of the population of Nebraska awake and thrilled almost all night long.

In Vermont it is virtually not known that the Federal Reserve System is an immense national menace which must be subdued and harnessed in the interests of the plain people before the plain people can be safe in their little properties. In Minnesota, however, the merest child can lisp the iniquities of the Federal Reserve System and can tell the pundits of Wall Street about the beauty and about the necessity of a popular control of the streams and currents of bank credit.

Kansas City is in quite a hubbub in its commercial circles on the subject of railroad consolidation. It is a great national subject in Kansas City. In Wisconsin, where the La Follette progressive Republican organization makes conscientious lists of all great national subjects to be settled by the informed will of an intelligent national electorate, the subject of railroad consolidation is not perceived as a vital issue.

When the Democratic National Convention meets in June Al Smith will thrill the hearts of a large block of delegates, almost all of whom will come from States on or near the Atlantic seaboard. Meanwhile William Gibbs McAdoo will thrill the hearts of another large block of delegates, the overwhelming majority of whom will come from south of the Potomac and west of the Mississippi. It will not be simply a conflict between two men. It will be a conflict between two diverse—and not only diverse but also bitterly hostile—sets of sectional ideas and ideals, ranging all the way from liquor to freight rates on agricultural products.

Any Englishman who thinks that this is a country of uniform sentiments need only take Calvin Coolidge's place for a moment and travel to New York and deliver a speech there which will make the welkin ring on the theme of personal liberty and of religious freedom and then wait to see what will happen in the little dry, anti-Catholic towns of Indiana.

He will then know precisely why an American presidential tradition of vagueness has accumulated almost into a tradition of presidential total blankness of speech except on topics where utterance has become unavoidable.

The reason is that this country is so far from being uniform in its political notions and is, in fact, so sectionally various that only a transcendent genius can have the top of popularity in certain parts of the country without at the same time falling to the bottom of popularity in certain other parts of it. Presidents, then, who are not transcendent geniuses walk cautiously along at neither the top nor the bottom anywhere; and variety of views in the country produces mediocrity of views in the White House.

In the Driftway

TWO women are engaged in suing a firm of famous hair-dressers because after treatment the hair of one turned pink and of the other yellow. The Drifter will not attempt to determine the merits of the cases in question; there are matters which he knows enough to let alone. But he feels competent to examine another aspect of the situation: namely, the absurd convention that hair or skin should be one of only few colors. Why should not hair be pink, or yellow, or purple, or green? Why should the Caucasian integument remain conventionally whitish with conventional touches of pink or red? Why should the pink or red grow or be applied always at the same spots? Why not, for example, pure white cheeks and a bright red forehead? Why not a dark blue nose?

THERE are certain tribes whom we like to call less civilized than ourselves who do not consider these questions rhetorical. To them red and white bands painted on a brown arm, or blue stripes diagonally on a broad back seem quite de rigueur. Perhaps in self-defense the pale Aryans have decided that to be beautiful means to imitate nature as closely as possible. Thus when the cheek's red fades they paint it the same old color; when age brings gray hairs, dye restores them to their natural brown: a proper enough proceeding perhaps, although uninteresting, if this were really imitating nature. On the contrary, however, nature plays a thousand variations on the conventional pink and white. The Drifter has seen faces which, with a little help, would have glowed orange, or pale green, or quince yellow. Instead of encouraging these fascinating differences their owners have whitewashed them down the middle and daubed red on the sides. Or else have left them alone, a dull drab putty color, which is perhaps even worse.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is not sure whether more credit or blame should be awarded the female sex in these matters. They are the ones who try to maintain a "natural" beauty by the use of artificial methods, and though they might be applauded for the attempt to change their colors at all, they have helped immeasurably to foster monotony. Men, on the other hand, have, altogether mistakenly, assumed that it was better to let well enough alone. The Drifter earnestly trusts that these words of his will inspire a few brave souls to experiment. Paint is cheap and the surface to be covered at first need not be large. Gradually, when the custom of brightly colored skin and hair spreads, as it undoubtedly will, clothing will cease to be necessary or interesting and the cost of coloration will increase. Unfortunately, the Drifter is very much occupied at present, or he would be only too happy to start the fashion himself.

Another Victim of the Newspapers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The newspaper reports of the "Allinson incident" were from beginning to end utterly misleading. So also were the syndicated press reports of the statement which I made to my congregation on March 30. I am very sure that you would not intentionally be unjust to anyone, but in your issue of April 9 you misrepresented the position for which I, and to a very large extent my church, have been standing. My statement concerning the inadvisability of inviting Mr. Allinson to speak under the auspices of the Epworth League was made, not because he was a conscientious objector who had served a term at Leavenworth but because I had been led by Dean Wigmore to believe that he had been guilty of disloyal conduct while a sworn officer of the State Department abroad. Dean Wigmore, during the war, was Judge Advocate and chief assistant to General Crowder. He wrote me that he was personally cognizant of Mr. Allinson's record. I now have a letter from the Department of State which disproves Dean Wigmore's assertion, and have given publicity to this letter.

I have told my congregation that "whatever attitude the state may feel obliged to take toward the 'conscientious objector,' the Christian church ought not to make more difficult his already terribly difficult path," and added that the church "ought never again in her official capacity to bless war."

ERNEST F. TITTLE

Sky-Songs

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The mail this morning brought me from the offices of The Nation a marked copy of Art and the Camera cut from The Nation of April 16. Coincidentally I received a copy of the April Arts. It is most amusing how very divergent are the reactions of Mr. Craven and those of Virgil Barker, the associate editor of the Arts. Mr. Barker says:

Can a photograph be a work of art? An entire number of that unperiodical periodical entitled Manuscripts was devoted to a symposium of that question. And all those words by all those writers, whether for or against, are turned into empty chatter by the wordless sky-songs of Alfred Stieglitz. To one individual they came as a revelation—a call to adventure, an enlargement of experience, a spiritual release. A perceiving soul has trapped sublimity in a machine and on sheets of paper a hand's breadth wide has fixed immensity.

In the number of Manuscripts referred to, Mr. Craven is one of the contributors. As for Mr. Barker, to whom the tiny "sky-songs" (they are not "photographs of clouds") came as a revelation, perhaps it will be of interest to your readers to know that they also came as revelations—to many hundreds of painters, sculptors, poets, writers, laymen, women and men, quite as sensitive, quite as critical as Mr. Craven. Among those agreeing with Virgil Barker are: Lachaise, Marin, Dove, Demuth, O'Keeffe, Ben Benn, Coomaraswamy, Eilshemius, Bel-Geddes, De Zayas, Varèse, Ernest Bloch, Halpert, Ornstein, Gilbert Cannan, Sherwood Anderson, Zona Gale, Professor Ehrenfest (of the triumvirate Einstein-Lorentz-Ehrenfest), now lecturing in this country, and many more.

I have a letter before me from Gilbert Cannan: "... I have grave doubts about the Woolworth Tower but none about your photographs. ..." In a letter from Leo Stein (December 4, 1922), he writes: "Your kind of photography seems to me essentially nearer the best of painting, the Giorgiones, the Rubens, the Renoirs—not of course in aspect but in spirit—than any contemporary painting that I know."

Incidentally I might quote Willard Huntington Wright in his "Creative Will" (Art and the Individual, page 246):

The emotionally limited critic denies the inherent existence of aesthetic beauty in a work unless he is personally capable of reacting to it and at the same time questions the sincerity of the man who responds as the result of a more highly developed sensitivity. For the meagerly equipped the science of aesthetics is useless: it is without the substantiation of emotional experience.

I have seen Mr. Craven stand before paintings as well as before photographs and I have every reason to feel that he belongs to the class of "critics" alluded to by Mr. Wright. As for his knowledge of photography in its significant sense I know it to be negligible—even if he may be the proud possessor of a Brownie.

ALFRED STIEGLITZ

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Just so often along comes the "Wonder Man"—he who puts us crooked—pardon—straight of course—at the cross roads—follow his pointing and you'll leave Worry behind—if you would want to hook up with worry again—assume you've been led astray—come back and you'll find your friend—Worry there awaiting you

Monuments—huge monuments to him—of him

at every cross road—with a push button—out comes an arm pointing—pointing the way—

Along came my friend Alfred Stieglitz—he was met with a bucket full of cold storage stuff always kept on tap—he says he heard shouts of glee back in the bushes—he got it for photography's sake or Art's sake or Creative Will's sake

They are all three nice sounding Academic terms

Some of it spills like this "Unusual selections beautifully printed"

—there we agree—

In one instance he addresses them as "pictures"—why this flattering appraisal too—the admission to a small amount of "creative thought"—this opening might lead some one to assume—a larger amount—

Seems to me selection covers quite a field—there can be a kind of selection

■ wh. of selection

and purpose of selection

Does he unwittingly give Stieglitz this privilege because when you haul in selection you're close to the tree of "Self expression"

One can follow discussions—admissions—convictions until one comes upon a stamp of self imposed finality like this "in the last analysis" then he himself proceeds to the putting of the stamp of "last analysis" on Stieglitz's work

So that one is forced to the term "Wonder man"

here's Something

Could it be that the work of Alfred Stieglitz wasn't seen by "Wonder man" after all

Mr. Farrar Competes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I nominate to win your hundred dollar prize and decipher the Coolidge blah, Mr. Johnny Farrar of the eminent Bookman. In the current number of that publication, Mr. Farrar professes to find in the presidential style the same elements of nobility that distinguish Lincoln's speeches and the Bible.

If this be prose, I am, Sir,

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The Son

By ROBERT WOLFE

When Jesus was a child, did people say,
"Oh, yes, I talked that way when I was young"?
Did Joseph storm and Mary maybe pray
Repentance for his keen irreverent tongue?
And all the bearded elders of the land,
Did they not urge diplomacy and tact,
And tell Him one could make a stronger stand
By not mistaking pleasing dreams for fact?

They must have wagged imposing Jewish chins
In such disapprobation of that youth
That all His playmates shuddered at His sins,
While one gray crony—laying down the truth,
Predicted God would punish Him and send
The gallows, or the cross, or some bad end.

Books

Pieces of Eight

Privateering and Piracy in the Colonial Period. Illustrative Documents. Edited by John Franklin Jameson. The Macmillan Company. $5.

AS indicated in the subtitle, we have here a collection of documents rather than a narrative history; but it is a "source-book" of quite unusual interest. There are indeed many documents of a legal or official character—a letter of marque, vice-admiralty commissions, extracts from court records, and the like; but a large part of the book is taken up with narratives of a less formal kind. Even the strictly legal documents often have a surprisingly "human" quality. The collection is remarkable also because of the extraordinary range and variety of the sources from which the material is drawn. Comparatively few of the documents here published have been printed before and these few are sometimes scarcely more accessible to most readers than if they were still in manuscript.

The special student of colonial history will find here new light on many aspects of seafaring life in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; on war-time commerce, legitimate and illicit; on the life of the ordinary seaman and his business relations with master and owner; on complicated international rivalries and relationships. The footnotes, prepared with the closest attention to details but enlivened by an occasional bit of dry humor and without a touch of pedantry, offer the reader who wishes to go further keys to a great mass of interesting and comparatively unused material.

It will be a pity, however, if this book is left entirely to the historical specialist. No reader with a taste for the literature of adventure can afford to miss these records of the freebooters and their victims. Some of the famous pirates like Bonnet and Teach (alias Blackbeard) come in only for brief mention or not at all, but there is new light on Captain Kidd and his scarcely less famous contemporary, Every. There are other personages, too, whose names are likely to stick in the memory of the reader. Here he will meet Captain Sawkins, the idol of his fellow-buccaneers, who, when peace came in 1679, turned easily, like so many others, from privateering to piracy. Called on by the Spanish Governor of Panama to show his commission, he answered that "we would . . . bring our Commissions on the muzzles of our Guns, at which time, he should read them as plain as the flame of Gunpowder could make them." "Legible, no doubt," our editor remarks, "but not legal." When the Governor challenged him to a fight on the shore, the doughty captain returned "this answer, that in case he would bring out one hundred thousand pieces of eight he would meete him with one hundred men against his, to fight him for the money, or elce resolved to die in that Place." One is hardly surprised that the governor "refused so to doe." With all his recklessness, Sawkins was something of a stickler for Sabbath observance and on one occasion threw his men's dice overboard, "finding them in use on the said day."

Quite up to the best standards of melodrama was Bartholomew Roberts with his "rich crimson Damask Wastcoate, and Breeches, a red Feather in his Hat, and a Gold Chain Ten Times round his Neck," whose men scorned "to be hung up in Gibbets a Sundrying as Kidd and Bradish's Company did." Before they would surrender, they would "put fire with one of their Pistols to their Powder, and go all merrily to Hell together."

In the eighteenth century, Boston, with its royal governors, was less hospitable to pirates than its neighbors in Rhode Island who had a bad reputation in this respect; but the citizens of the old Puritan capital did not altogether miss the spectacular and tragic aspects of the business. It was from Boston that Kidd was sent to England for trial and a few years later came the trial and execution of John Quelch and his fellow-pirates, noted with the keenest interest by Samuel Sewall and Cotton Mather. While the prisoners were awaiting execution, "Sermons were preached in their Hearing every day. . . . And nothing was left, that could be done for their Good."

The longest single document in the collection is the journal of the Newport privateer, Revenge, taken from the papers presented to the Massachusetts Historical Society by Charles Eliot Norton. The Revenge under Captain Benjamin Norton sailed in 1741 from Newport and New York to cruise against the Spaniards in the West Indies. The journal is in the main a business-like record of such matters as the recruiting of the crew, the shares of officers and men in the proceeds of the voyage, the taking and disposition of prizes, and other typical incidents of a privateering cruise. Even this record, however, has its picturesque items, like this one under date of October 1: "Brave Living with Our People. Punch Everyday, which makes them dream strange things which foretells Great Success in our Cruize, they dream of nothing but Mad Bulls, Spaniards and bagg of Gold."

The temptation to quote further must be resisted.

EVARTS B. GREENE

Twilight of the Vikings

In the Grip of Life. A Play. By Knut Hamsun. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.75.

Children of the Age. By Knut Hamsun. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IT is not as difficult as it might at first seem to reconcile the delicate sensuality of some of Hamsun's books with what appears to be the almost savage robustness of others. The man who rejoiced in the primitive vigor of unlettered pioneers and seemed to celebrate that animal vitality which does not even comprehend its own emotions is indeed the same aging wanderer who rambled over the scenes of his youth and dwelt with gentle melancholy upon the memories of past gallantry, for in both are to be found the romanticist who is the essential Hamsun. Though he may present himself in the guise of a preacher or moralist he is a poet, and when he pleads for a return to the simple virtues and a life close to the soil it is the poet who speaks. An illiterate peasant is a picturesque figure, but a half-educated clerk is not, and this fact more than any other explains his championship of the primitive. Himself of peasant stock, he grew up in a society where an indigenous peasant culture flourished in an almost feudal society. Within his own lifetime almost, patriarchal life gave way to provincial democracy, the products of peasant handicraft were supplanted by factory gewgaws, and the fisherboy turned into clerk or parson. All of his sensibilities and his essentially civilized admiration for the primitive rebelled against the change, and he made himself into a moralist in order that he might try to save the picturesqueness of the past which appealed to his poet's heart. In those of his books in which he himself appears we see him as he is—sensitive nearly to the point of being neurotic and almost an aesthete in his cherishing of sensations and experiences for their own sake; in "Growth of the Soil" we have not the record of the doings of a simple spirit but the desires of a very complex one. It is not so much a desire to live the simple life as to watch and describe those who do.

For a writer who, in spite of the apparent objectivity of some of his works, is as intensely personal as Hamsun the drama is not the happiest form. When he can neither speak for himself nor insinuate into the texture of the narrative his own point of view his work loses much of its most characteristic flavor. Hence "In the Grip of Life" is not one of his most important works although it deals with a favorite theme—the hopeless uselessness of age when the warmth of passion, which to a romanticist gives life its meaning, is drawing irresistibly away. "Children of the Age," on the other hand, is perhaps the best of his books to be translated since "Growth of the Soil," and it is in a sense a companion piece, for it is the situation in reverse.

The book tells the story of the downfall of a great family. The first Willitz Holmsen had laid the foundations of Segelfoss Manor on a solid basis of money and land; the second had added refinement and, without exactly sacrificing reality, had stretched out in the direction of culture and refinement; while the third, the hero of the story, completely loses his grip upon the soil and has only pride, culture, and helplessness to take the place of energy, power, and resource. Partly because of the exhaustion of his race and partly because of the current of the age, typified in an industrial adventurer who comes to start a mill in sight of the ancient manor, he can do nothing except shut himself up in physical and spiritual isolation. His lands slip away until in the end there is only a whirling manufacturing town where once there was a complete feudal unit, and the hardy peasants turn into vulgar "hands" or "rise" to be clerks and provincial parsons. Leaving the moral of the tale aside, it is magnificently done and a perfect whole. The solemn grandeur of the remote self-sufficient community, the gradual encroachment of the tawdry vulgarity of factory and commerce, and the character of the unhappy lord of the manor, who is driven back more and more upon himself until he is estranged even from his wife, are all projected by an extraordinarily powerful imagination, and, touched as they are by the constantly but unobtrusively hinted scorn of the writer, they not only tell the story but produce exactly the effect which he desired—a sort of twilight of the gods. All the fair old things seem to be passing away, virtue is going out of man, and an irresistible tide of noisy vulgarity is sweeping the earth.

The power of imagination and the subtlety of the character-drawing make it easy to forget Hamsun the moralist and Hamsun the unconscious aesthete. Indeed it is hard to remember them, and perhaps it is not worth while to quarrel with either, but one thing may be said. Those of us who are, quite without regret, children of our age realize that the adventure upon which we and our times have embarked, sweeping away old societies and old cultures as well as old ideas, is still only an adventure. We know that the society which our age has built lacks much which other times and societies have had, that the factory is less comely than the castle, and that the cocky underclerk has less of dignity than the peasant rooted in the soil. It may be, indeed, that in attempting to substitute prosaic fact for charming legend and the vulgar bustle of democracy for the decorum of ordered subserviency we have created a permanently ugly world. But we have not lost hope. Far as we have gone astray, we have done these things quite sincerely in the names of truth and justice and we are not sure but that, ultimately, they will produce a society from which the artist will not wish to turn away.

The American Game

The Great Game of Politics. By Frank R. Kent. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

There is a man in your neighborhood who knows your name, your business, the amount of your income . . . and a good many other things that you consider quite personal . . . That man is your Precinct Boss. He knows all about you. . . . But Frank R. Kent of the Baltimore Sun knows all about him.

AND, after perusing Mr. Kent's engaging account of precinct, ward, and State bosses, the reader will be inclined to agree with the announcement of the book that he does speak from a rather more intimate acquaintance with the ways of a politician with a constituency than most of the rest of us can claim.

Nor does he stop at discovering the puppeteer himself, but displays how his tricks are done, what makes the marionettes—candidates and voters—perform so automatically at the ends of their leading-strings. Press agents and campaign contributors, candidates and lobbyists, legislators and executive officials are directed by the coach in the dugout, out of sight of the applauding multitude—the electorate. Each plays his part in the "game" that seems so very real, a part skilfully prepared and closely synchronized. Only rarely does teamwork break down; very generally the game is played off with a precision that is the despair of the professional coaches in other sports.

Mr. Kent speaks from a quarter-century of experience in journalism which probably brings the non-professional closer to the realities of politics than any other kind of work. He is not afraid to say what he thinks and writes with quite refreshing frankness of the motives, methods, and machinations of politicians. His book is not, and is not meant to be, a history of politics in America or a dissertation on the metaphysics of the state. But, as a straightforward account of actual conditions written from the "outside," from a rich background of "inside" information and observation of our political life, it fills a conspicuous gap in our materia politica. To some it will come as exposure, to others as an indictment; there will be many both in and out of college classrooms (it should do about equal service within and without the walls of Academe) who will derive perhaps some profit and certainly much enjoyment from its reading. Would that Mr. Kent could append a symposium in a future edition of the opinions of the book of Calvin Coolidge, Mayor Curley of Boston, H. J. Ford of Princeton, Mr. Anderson, late of the Anti-Saloon League, and Charles F. Murphy!

PHILLIPS BRADLEY

In St. Stephen's Chapel

The Journal of Sir Simonds D'Ewes, from the Beginning of the Long Parliament to the Opening of the Trial of the Earl of Strafford. Edited by Wallace Notestein. Yale University Press. $7.

THE Historical Department of Yale University deserves the gratitude of every student and reader of English history for including among its historical publications this volume containing the journal of Sir Simonds D'Ewes, dating from the beginning of the Long Parliament to the opening of the trial of the Earl of Strafford, November, 1640, to March, 1641. Mr. Notestein has done a model piece of editing, and, though the volume is a portly one, the type is clear, the paper light, and the volume attractive and easy to use.

Mr. Notestein has given us for the first time in printed form the most important part of what is probably the most remarkable private journal of any parliament in any century of English history, one which deals with months of revolutionary legislative and judicial activities, the most serious ever entered upon within the same short period of time by any reforming parliamentary body. D'Ewes was himself a member of this parliament and recorded what he heard from day to day, adding also abstracts of his own speeches. He was scrupulously painstaking and accurate and, having in mind the writing of a history himself, he made his record for the especial benefit of historians. Reading what he has set down—here supplemented by footnote enlargements from the diaries of other observers—one gets an intimate knowledge of the course of events, a familiarity with the appearance, manners, and mentality of men whose names are well known—such as Pym, Hampden, Cromwell, Strode, Holles, and the like—and a sense of nearness to things as they actually happened, which no amount of reading of Rushworth, Whitelocke, and Clarendon, among the contemporary writers, or of Carlyle, Forster, or Gardiner, among the modern historians, can possibly give. There are scores of such vivid scenes as the following:

The Lords being sett in ther roabes and the king come, the Speaker was twice or thrice called for. Being placed at the reule, I standing alsoe next, the king spake to this effect; . . . As we weere in the midst of this dispute Thomas Earle of Strafford Lieutenant of Ireland came in a barge to the Upper Howse from the Tower; and divers ranne to the East window of the Howse who, with those that sat by looked out at the said windowes, opened them, and others went with some noise and tumult out of the Howse soe as wee weere almost whollie interrupted: which made us call the Speaker to the Chaire againe and the mace was laid on the table, and the Clark came againe into his chaire; . . . Mr. Cromwell stood upp next and said, Hee knew noe reason of these suppositions and inferences which the gentlemen had made that last spoke; upon this divers interrupted him and called him to the barre. Mr. Pymme and Mr. Hollis therupon spake to the orders of the Howse that if the gentleman had said anie thing that might offend, hee might explaine himself in his place. I alsoe spake to the orders of the Howse; and shewed that I had been often readie to speake against the frequent calling of men to the barre in this Howse upon triviall occasions. For to call a member to the barre heere is the highest and most supreme censure wee can exercise within these walls.

Out of their settings these extracts lose some of their force, but taken as a whole they transport us, as if by magic, into the midst of events transacted in St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, during those exciting months of 1640-41, when a body of grimly determined men came together to be, as Pym said, "of another temper than they were the last parliament," and of a mind not only "to sweep the house clean below, but to pull down all the cobwebs which hung in the top and corners, that they might not breed dust and so make a foul house hereafter."

CHARLES M. ANDREWS

Highbrow Ku Kluxism

Ethics and Some Modern World Problems. By William McDougall. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

IT is all very simple. There are two systems of Ethics: the Universal and the National. (The capitals are Mr. McDougall's.) The first is exemplified in such world religions as Christianity, Buddhism, and Islam; the second, in modern times par excellence by pre-war Germany. Out of the conflict between the two has come much of progress and culture, but more of social danger. Moslem civilization deteriorated because it was too universal; European civilization has so far escaped that fate because it was imperfectly Christian. Germany, however, was led to her doom by National Ethics, "unsoftened, unrestrained by an admixture of Universal Ethics."

Mr. McDougall's chief fear is Universal Ethics, which he sees embodied in the Christian gospels, democracy and socialism. The biological effect of these forces unchecked will be disastrous since they will result in a deterioration of the human stock by the overbreeding of inferior races, nations, and classes at the expense of the superior. It is therefore mistaken ethics for the superior nation or class not to assert itself. In the long run such assertion makes for eugenic progress. "Our goal . . . must be the enduring and highest happiness of the greatest number." Emphasize the "enduring," and Nordic supremacy (the idea though not the phrase is the author's) and the capitalist system can be justified to those who benefit by them. And of these elect McDougall is the prophet.

As a matter of practical organization we should be governed by a responsible aristocracy. Nations (which are the true social units rather than individuals or classes) must be preserved, but as members of a society of nations. Only the literate—and the test for literacy should be high—should be enfranchised citizens. Between them and the illiterate intermarriage should be illegal. Children of the illiterate on passing an educational test may graduate into a probationary class where after twenty years of satisfactory conduct they may be admitted into the rights and duties of full citizens.

Let us hasten to add that McDougall's aristocratic republic, unlike Plato's, sees no necessity for a communistic standard of plain living for the rulers lest they be tempted to use power for their own advantage. On the contrary, he is deeply exercised lest high wages should cause "our bacteriologists to become bricklayers."

This brief statement does less than justice to the absurd simplifications and downright falsehoods of Mr. McDougall's historical interpretations. Germany only was responsible for the war, and Germany was misled solely by an excess of National Ethics. Burma is what she is, modern Moslem culture is what it is, because of Universal Ethics. Climatic and economic conditions and the inadequacies of universal religions as far apart as Buddhism and Mohammedanism are not considered. Great Britain, which had not "drifted so far down the slope toward ultra-democracy as had the United States," delayed not a single day in coming to the rescue, not of her imperial interests, but of "international morality," while America hesitated three years, during which the noble aristocrats tried to get the backward democracy into action.

Such a book as this hardly deserves serious review except that the reputation of the author, his plausible style, and his skill in pseudo-scientific statement make it a welcome defense to all the hoary old prejudices and outworn modes of economic organization that menace the peace of the world. McDougall in this book is the Imperial Wizard for a more or less highbrow Ku Klux Klan. Significantly, his book was first delivered in the form of lectures at Northwestern University. Despite the aberrations of a few pacifists there, he must feel that on the whole his seed fell on needy but fertile soil.

Lloyd Osbourne's Portrait of R. L. S.

An Intimate Portrait of R. L. S. By Lloyd Osbourne. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

A QUARTER of a century has gone by since the withdrawal by Mrs. Stevenson of the material placed in the hands of Sidney Colvin for a biography of her famous husband, with Mr. Colvin's dilatoriness as the chief explanation of her action. After her son, Lloyd Osbourne, had suggested that he would himself write the Life—and to this Mr. Colvin strenuously and successfully objected—and after Mr. Colvin stated that he might feel obliged to write, at a later date, the Life of Stevenson that he had in mind (but which still remains unwritten), the alteration found its solution in the biography written by Mr. Balfour under the supervision of Mrs. Stevenson. Since that time a misleading picture of Robert Louis Stevenson—constantly more misleading through an accretion of uncritical adulation—has been allowed to form in the mind of the public. The major responsibility for the Stevenson myth rests on Mrs. Stevenson, who suppressed hundreds of his biographically illuminating poems; who insisted on the elimination of significant facts, the veiling of personal characteristics, and a misrepresentation of Stevenson's general attitude toward art and life—altogether, a course of action that Stevenson himself would be the first to resent.

In the papers originally published in magazine form, and now, thirty years after Stevenson's death, brought forward as a separate volume, Mr. Osbourne has done what should have been done long ago. In the portrait that he gives of R. L. S. there is not a single line that could ever have given any offense to anyone not interested in the suppression of a true portrayal.

Stevenson is shown at various ages from twenty-eight on, and in various places he visited and in which he lived during the long journey in search of happiness and health. His charm, his playfulness, his courage, his wit are set forth, as are also his vanity, his moods of discouragement, and his whims. Nor does Mr. Osbourne disguise Stevenson's attitude toward the limitations imposed on his art by Victorian England, or hide the propensity of R. L. S. in the direction of colorful swearing. He significantly quotes Stevenson as saying: "A child should learn to judge people and discount human frailty and weakness. I have no patience with this fairy-tale training that makes ignorance a virtue." Mr. Osbourne speaks (and this is decidedly admirable) of his own idolizing of the poet Henley, the man who most fearlessly attacked the Stevenson myth in its incipency. He shows himself willing in this "intimate portrait" to depict, not the "seraph in chocolate," but Stevenson himself, as he was with all his faults and all his virtues.

The main limitation of Mr. Osbourne's engaging book is one inherent in the circumstances. Quite obviously to the initiated, there are some things that Mr. Osbourne cannot be expected to relate. When (Scribner's, October, 1895) he wrote Mr. Stevenson's Home Life at Vailima; when (Century, July, 1899, and March, 1902) his sister wrote Stevenson in Samoa and In Samoa with Stevenson, they both dealt almost exclusively with the life of the Samoans and only in comparatively insignificant manner with Stevenson himself during this most important period as his life drew darkly toward its close. Mr. Osbourne now gives some vivid sketches of Stevenson's last years; but a fuller picture must yet be undertaken by a less circumscribed pen. All this does not lessen the obligation of students of Stevenson's character, and of all other broad-minded admirers of that lovable author, toward Mr. Osbourne for having (even at so late a date) produced a book well worth writing and very well written indeed.

GEORGE S. HELLMAN

Tales

The Cathedral Folk. By Nicolai Lyeskov. Translated by Isabel F. Hapgood. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

LYESKOV'S forte was the short story. There are several stories woven into the woof of this novel and they are beyond doubt the bright spots in "an otherwise bald and unconvincing narrative." The dwarf's tale, especially, might be chosen for its pithy irony and luminous simplicity as a masterpiece of the shorter fiction form. But these coral reefs in a dead sea are no more acceptable from Lyeskov than from Richard Wagner. Wagner at least took his dull recitative seriously, but Lyeskov is quite aware of the humdrum inadequacy of his incidents.

For exactly two hundred pages his attitude toward the action and the characters of the novel is that of an indulgent adult who amusedly watches and listens to the obvious pranks and prattle of very small children. He knows that there is no significance, direct or implied, in these actions; he feels that they are not even essentially humorous, though there is humor in the contraposition of actors and deeds. This superior, patronizing attitude is communicated to the reader only too well, so that when Lyeskov finally introduces his operabouffe villain and his undeniably earnest tragedy, serious consideration of the denouement is utterly impossible. We can only continue to smile at the agitation of Lilliputian minds; the sympathetic mood has been sardonically dispelled.

It's a pity. For beneath the raillery, beneath the conscious dullness lies as appreciative a consideration of the inadequacy of Main Street life as anything written in Russian or English. The diary of the Archpriest Tuberozoff is a unique study of intellectual sclerosis and the portrait of Deacon Akhilla can hang beside Sancho Panza in the gallery of fiction.

The diary redeems in a measure the first half of the book; what follows is the novel. There Father Tuberozoff finds his task and his martyrdom. When he says "Life is ended and living has begun," as he departs to face those who would accuse him of heresy, he means that the bestial routine of sleeping, eating, and working sinks beneath notice and care while a great spiritual adventure now animates and motivates his existence. The phrase may be made a stencil for the man who finds his fight late in life.

In dealing with the struggles of the archpriest and the deacon, Lyeskov seems to be stricken with remorse at his earlier levity and insouciance. He is guilty of obvious sentimentality. All else one might forgive, but not this saccharine artificiality.

JOHAN J. SMILTENKO

Books in Brief

The Thousand and First Night. By Grant Overton. George H. Doran Company. $2.

What it is that lifts romantic fiction out of mere pattern and endows it with the sinews of reality has never been reduced to formula. One finds it in a novel, or one hopes to find it. In this instance, one hopes to find it. Mr. Overton has assembled the mechanism of high adventure, and set it spinning with skill—but it follows the pattern. The story revolves wheels within wheels—a story within a story—but no spell is cast; one has been entertained, but not transported.

Cherry-Stones. By Eden Phillpotts. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

Unpretentious, uninspired verse by an unoriginal novelist.

The Best Poems of 1923. Edited by L. A. G. Strong. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.

Mr. Strong is an interesting poet, and he has chosen interesting poems from a year's output in England and America. But unless he intends to repeat his performance annually over a considerable period the present labor is wasted. Nothing could more invite the attack of time than the title which he has given to his small volume, and nothing is surer than that eighty-eight poets are too many for anything except a periodical largess of laurel.

Van Tassel and Big Bill. By Henry H. Curran. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

There is a very definite moral to Mr. Curran's collection of stories, threaded upon the career of the young Van Tassel: "We need our best men in government, not in business." His locale is the back room of the district club, the potent corner saloon, and the devious streets of Greenwich Village, as well as the campaign platforms and the assembly rooms of City Hall. His young hero is, as Mr. Curran is, a member of an old New York family, who has an itch for politics. The game, as Mr. Curran depicts it, is a series of favors, with an eye to votes, and a succession of red-light processions. Mr. Curran's pictures of New York City politics are almost as transient and casual as the day's news.

The Bookman Anthology of Essays. Edited by John Farrar. George H. Doran Company. $2.

A literary custard of Doranic essays, with Broun for spice, Mencken for tartness, Lyon Phelps and Burton Rascoe for solidity, and Oliver Herford for leavening. Sketches ranging from the dignified ponderous to the sparkingly droll: the devious literary researches of Jack Dempsey, Academician; a polyanic defense of Harold Bell Wright, the Righteous; a pathetic glimpse of O. Henry, Homer of the Four Million, who would a playwriting go; the chuckling history of the Almost Illegal Santa Claus. One page diverting, the next anthologically dull.

Written in Friendship. By Gerald Cumberland. Brentano's. $2.50.

Mr. Cumberland has sprinkled ink on the tailcoat of nearly everyone who writes, composes, or acts in the British Isles. He is an indefatigable interviewer and will match opinions—heads I win, tails you lose—with anybody who gives him the slightest opportunity. It gives him much pleasure to stick pins in poses, although it must be said that he beams and berates with equal zest. All of this book is interesting; the chapters in which he dwells upon his own experiences in the writing game are perhaps most valuable.

Eye and Ear in Opera

By PITTS SANBORN

THE success of the past season's production at the Metropolitan Opera House of Massenet's early and extremely spectacular opera "Le Roi de Lahore" might serve as excuse for a debate on the relative importance of the eye and the ear in the enjoyment of opera. The implied conflict would in this case be more acute if Massenet's music were downright bad. That it is not. It is harmless music; negligible, so far as controversy goes, except for the one famous air of Scindia, "Promesse de mon avenir," which soars well above the general level of the score. But, in spite of this one number, the opera would never interest anybody in this year of grace, either as music or as drama, were it not for the prodigal splendor of the scenery and costumes, so lavishly provided by the Russian painter, Boris Anisfeld. Crowds have flocked to the Metropolitan for the sheer visual pleasure of seeing an India of earth beneath and heaven above as Mr. Anisfeld in all the glory of his riotous imagination conceives and depicts it.

Now, I hold no brief here for the paramount rights in opera of either eye or ear. I would only point out that each may be truly served without prejudice to the other. To obtain spectacle in the opera house that is not "Aïda" or "Le Prophète" or "Tannhäuser," or even "Die Zauberflöte," "Oberon," or "Boris Godounoff," it isn't necessary to disturb the innocent slumber of a departed worthy like "Le Roi de Lahore" that served its purpose in its day and earned an inalienable right to the repose everlasting. The canny impresario might perfectly well unlock the door on the teeming treasure house of eighteenth-century opera before Mozart. There he would find, for instance, Handel, Rameau, and Gluck to provide delectation for the ear while he himself looked out for the sumptuous dressing of such of their operas as afford illimitable opportunities for scenery, costumes, and pageantry.

"Gluck, of course," the opera-going Thomas might reply, recalling past Metropolitan efforts with "Orfeo," "Armide," and "Iphigenia in Tauris," "but surely not Handel and Rameau!"

Now, nobody would dream of denying that Handel's Italian operas are mines of musical inspiration, but it took the post-war Germans to seize on that reservoir of riches and work it. The reviving of operas by Handel has these last years become a veritable rage in Germany. "Giulio Cesare," "Rodelinda," and "Ottone" are three that have been brought back after nearly two centuries of disuse, and they all afford large scope to scene-painter and costumer, as well as to singers the most accomplished. "Tamerlano," with its solemn pageant of the death of the Emperor Bajazet, likewise calls for revival, and so does "Rinaldo" (identical as to subject with the "Armide" of Gluck), boasting its crusader hero, the magic garden of its enchantress heroine, and that air beloved of all contraltos and their hearers, "Lascia ch' io pianga."

In Handel's own day "Rinaldo" was an open sesame to the fancy of the scenic furnisher. We have Addison's complaint in the Spectator that the wild birds with which Armida's garden was stocked flew straight for the candles, snuffing them out, and brought further dismay to an astonished audience by seeking nests within the curling invitation of its wigs! It was in "Rodelinda" (the heroine of this work is an abandoned Lombard queen) that Francesca Cuzzoni (whose prima donna warfare with La Faustina was destined to become historic) effected her London debut, and, in the words of Rockstro, "created so extraordinary a furor in this charming opera that the brown silk gown, trimmed with silver, in which she performed the part of the heroine, led the fashion of the season." Indeed, all London crowded to see and copy La Cuzzoni's frock. Of course it was fashioned in the smartest mode of 1725, not according to the speculative possibilities of royal dressing in the shadowy region of a legendary Lombard past.

Here and now the Handel operas might best be staged and costumed in imitation of the fashions that prevailed in Handel's time. I, for one, would frown upon a rigorously contemporaneous costuming for the operas of Gluck (there one encounters an essential and determining difference in the musical style and feeling), but when the Paris Opéra five years or so ago revived the "Castor et Pollux" of Rameau, those heavenly twins stepped forth in all the trappings of great gentlemen of the court of Louis XV, and their dames, like stately frigates of the battle line, swam the stage majestically in billowy sail of well-hooped petticoats and under mountains of overtopping peruke. And it was all just right. The "Armide" of Gluck invites likewise to spectacle without end, though here the realms should approach pure fantasy, anchored but lightly to place or time.

The whole subject, however, is a big one, and an enticing field for study and reflection on the part of anybody who really cares. I should merely like here to suggest for next winter's opera season one sure road toward a region where ear and eye together may find profit and delight.

Reaction in Poland

By L. T.

POLAND is nominally a democratic republic. Her constitution provides for freedom of speech, press, and assemblage. By the clauses of the Versailles Treaty, Poland was bound to respect the rights of the national minorities on her territory. In reality Poland presents a picture of reaction comparable only to Horthy's Hungary in its ruthless persecution of any expression of opinion which is contrary to the taste of the ruling caste. The outside world has so far gained little knowledge of what is going on behind the screen of paper guaranties embodied in a constitution which seems to be designed for foreign consumption rather than for domestic application.

Following is a brief summary of news items from several organs of the Polish radical press from which may be gleaned an idea of the actual state of affairs in that country. The wrath of the ruling group is turned chiefly against Communists and everything which may be associated with the Communist movement. The Communist Party is completely outlawed. The adherence to communist ideals is an offense punishable by four years of hard labor. But sentences to longer terms are not uncommon, and the time spent in prison prior to the trial is not included in the sentence. As a rule offenders accused of belonging to the Communist Party are kept in prison without trial for a year and more.

However, the offense of communism is only too often a pretext for the persecution of labor organizations maintaining a legal existence in accordance with the laws of the state. Prior to the elections to the Polish Diet in November, 1923, an organization of workers and poor peasants was formed known under the name of the Alliance of the Proletariat of City and Country. This organization participated in the election campaign on a platform which contained nothing contrary to the constitution and the existing laws. Yet the executive committees of the alliance were disbanded by the authorities and most of their members were jailed. The meetings of the organization were brutally broken up by the police and its followers were maltreated and incessantly terrorized. The persecutions did not come to an end with the election campaign. When, despite all handicaps, the Alliance of the Proletariat of City and Country succeeded in electing two members (Kruklikovsky and Lancucki) to the Diet, the police avenged itself on many of the active members of the organization by arresting them and sentencing them to long prison terms. A news item in a Polish newspaper runs:

On October 18 in the district court in Lodz the following persons were tried and sentenced for belonging to the Alliance of the Proletariat of City and Country and for participation in the May Day demonstration: Teofil Miller, Stefan Dombrowski, Antoni Kubera, and Kazimierz KLIKAUER to three years' hard labor; Maksymilian FURNIASKI, Stanislaw CZWORKA, Genevieve CZECH, and Stanislaw FIDYK to two years' hard labor.

A wave of indiscriminate arrests and persecutions swept the whole country after the explosion in the Warsaw citadel in October, 1923. The following brief account of these arrests, dated Warsaw, November, 1923, was sent to a Polish radical newspaper published in Chicago:

... After the explosion in the Warsaw citadel on October 13 the Ministry of Internal Affairs issued a telegraphic order to all subordinate authorities in the provinces to arrest all persons suspected of communism or of sympathies with the ideals of communism. As a result wholesale searchings and arrests were made throughout the territory of the state.

In Warsaw 350 persons were arrested. Almost all had to be set free after a day or two, and only ten were turned over to the investigating authorities. Among those arrested were all prominent labor-union officials suspected of communistic convictions. Many labor-union offices were closed down, and most of them, such as the unions of the metal workers, textile workers, clerks, wood workers, tobacco workers, unskilled laborers, and the Jewish labor unions of the metal workers, wood workers, and bakers have not been opened since.

In Lodz 100 persons were arrested. Among these were all labor leaders known to the police, mostly candidates to the Diet and to the city council, and union officials. ... To Lodz were also brought the workers arrested in the nearby towns of Tomaszow, Zdunska Wola, Zgierz, Pabianice, etc., and some even from such distant parts as Radomsk and Kielce. Most of those arrested were eventually set free. Fifteen persons were detained.

In the Dombrowo Basin (Zaglembie) 189 were arrested, among them a number of members of the managing boards of the trade unions, members of the mine committees and cooperatives. These prisoners were taken to distant parts of Poland.

In Upper Silesia 120 were arrested, among them a number of members of the legally existing Communist Party, and many union workers and members of the mine committees. ... Most of those arrested are still in prison.

In Cracow 23 persons were arrested. After a few days most of them were set free; 4 were detained. On October 14 23 persons in the Dombrowo basin, 24 from Chrzanow, 9 from Biala, and 50 from Ludlin were arrested and brought to Cracow.

In Posen 12 persons were arrested. Since these persons, in spite of the existing law, were not turned over to the investigating authorities after a detention of 24 hours, they declared a hunger strike. The police authorities threatened to break the strike by force. ... However, when all attempts of the police failed, the persons arrested were turned over to the judicial investigator, who set them free. The hunger strike continued for six days. ...

In Eastern Galicia the total number arrested amounted to 300. In Lemberg 100 persons were arrested. Among them were the secretary of the Alliance of the Proletariat of City and Country, the responsible editors of the Tribuna Robotnicza, Zemla i Volia, Nova Kultura, Volia Naroda, Zhishn, several members of the central council of the Ukrainian Social-Democratic Party, the managing board of the union of leather workers, and others.

The newspapers named above were suspended for several weeks. ...

The office of the Alliance of the Proletariat of City and Country in Lemberg was closed down, as well as the office of the Ukrainian educational labor association Volia, and the branches of the library in the name of Ivan Franko in Lemberg, Drohobycz, Stanislawow, Kolomea, and Ternopol. ...

The total arrested on the territory of Poland during the days of October 13 to 15 amounted to 2,000.

A sinister feature of the ruling Polish reaction is the gross maltreatment of political prisoners. The question of the beatings inflicted on prisoners was taken up at a joint meeting of all labor organizations and parties in Lemberg on February 26, 1924. A committee was elected to present to the government the following facts:

In October, 1922, the sub-commissary Kajdan brutally beat the student Ivan Pohuba, who brought in a complaint before the office of the state's attorney. The investigation, however, has not so far been made.

In the prison at Jachowicz Street the student Theodor Jacura was severely beaten. The case is at present before the criminal investigation office.

Last year the prisoners Peter Tymeczka and Stefan Kociuba were beaten so badly that the first became deaf.

During the current year the prisoners Brecher and Reiss have been tortured in jail.

In the prison at the Jachowicz Street the prisoner Green was tortured and beaten. They pounded his head against the wall and in this manner forced a confession out of him.

Officer Szczerkowski tortured the prisoners Apfelsuss and Karczmar in an inhuman manner.

The mysterious details accompanying the death of Olga Bessarabowa prove that the conditions prevailing in the police jails and prisons are such as to demand a searching investigation and the punishment of those guilty in applying the method of beating and torturing.

The memorandum concludes:

In the name of the whole working class of the city of Lemberg, without difference of nationality or party adherence, the Trade Council enters its most vigorous protest against the methods of beating practiced by the state police, and demands of the governor (1) to use every means to punish the functionaries guilty of beatings; (2) to come to an understanding with the minister of the interior in the matter of issuing a peremptory order to the police to observe strictly Article 98 of the constitution; (3) to prohibit the examination of prisoners at night when the orgies of beatings usually take place. . . .

Cases where prisoners have died or disappeared under unexplained circumstances have come to the public notice. But particular excitement was created by the mysterious death of the Ukrainian teacher Olga Bessarabowa in a Lemberg prison.

Olga Bessarabowa, widow of a soldier who fell on the Italian front during the World War, was arrested at her home by the Lemberg police on February 9, 1924. The police maintain that Olga Bessarabowa was a Communist, and was suspected of having done spy service for a neighboring state. Five days later she was found hanged in her prison cell. The police said it was suicide. But it was noticeable that the name of the "suicide" was given wrongly in the newspapers (it was announced that Julia Baraska had hanged herself) and that for several days the food sent in for her by the members of her family was still taken. Obviously it was desired to prevent her relatives from getting news of her death too soon and from desiring to be present at the post-mortem examination of the body.

But at the post-mortem examination it became evident that the "suicide" had been cruelly tortured before her death. Her whole body was covered with blue-red stripes, there were also violet abscesses on it, which the professor making the examination cut from the body to show to his audience as a "rare and typical compound." Then the body was buried in an unknown spot.

The case of Bessarabowa was brought before the Polish Diet by the Communist deputies Krulikovsky and Lancucki.

On February 27, 1924, an interpellation was made by the deputies Krulikovsky and Lancucki concerning the treatment of prisoners in the prison of Kattowitz. The interpellation was based on a letter sent by the political prisoners of the Kattowitz prison. After enumerating a number of cases of maltreatment of prisoners and persecutions by the prison officials the letter concludes:

This is only an insignificant part of the terrible reality which we, as prisoners, cannot see as a whole. Prisoners who have been kept here for several years are silent in fear of torture. On December 15, 1923, a delegate of the ministry of justice visited the prison in company with the procurator. . . . When we repeated our complaints and demands the delegate laughed and explained that "a prison is not a hotel." . . . It is equally useless to complain either to the superintendent . . . or the inspector of the prison.

Conditions in the Cracow prisons are described in the Cracow Naprzod as follows:

In the main building of the prison 900 prisoners are cramped in 80 small cells. . . . In the main prison at Senate Street, which has space for 400, there are more than 900 prisoners interned. There are cells where thirty prisoners are placed in a space computed for five, so that at night they can sleep only in a sitting position. In cell No. 50 for minors there are more than sixty boys who literally have no place to sleep. . . . Many cells have no windows nor any ventilation. Political prisoners are put in cells together with criminals. . . .

The persecutions of the labor movement are especially manifest in annexed territories. An interpellation in the Diet brought in by Deputy Prystupa on February 18, 1924, dwells at some length upon the persecution of Ukrainian Socialists in eastern Galicia.

Wherever workers or peasants are trying to organize for their common struggle for the betterment of their hard life, immediately the police interfere and under various pretexts and in various ways disband the workers' and peasants' socialist groups, educational institutions, and trade unions.

As an instance of the attitude of the authorities, the interpellation cites a decision of the judge in Rava Ruska, where six peasants, members of the peasant council of the Ukrainian Social-Democratic Party, were sentenced to thirty days in prison for the alleged participation of women in a meeting of the group. The interpellation continues:

The Ukrainian Social-Democratic Party is thirty years old, but neither under the Austrian authorities nor during the rule of the Czar's army has it been more viciously persecuted than at the present time.

A lengthy report from Warsaw, dated February, 1924, gives the following account of conditions in the eastern territories of Poland:

The White Russian and Ukrainian peasant is literally deprived of every right. He is deprived not only of his right of free speech, assemblage, etc., but he has not the least guaranty of the inviolability of his person. . . . Constant searchings, arrests, beatings are the daily bread of the non-Polish population in the eastern provinces.

It is not infrequent for the White Russian and Ukrainian village to be visited by punitive expeditions. . . .

The schools and the press in the eastern provinces are rigorously persecuted. The White Russian newspapers in Vilna were all suspended. Editors were thrown in jail under ridiculous pretexts. Thus the editor of Ukrainian Life, Mikita Matienko, has been sentenced to seven months' imprisonment for possessing a few copies of the Proletarskaya Pravda. . . .

Ukrainian and White Russian schools are under constant oppression. Recently, before New Year's the school authorities of the Lemberg district closed down fourteen Ukrainian schools in eastern Galicia maintained by the private funds of the Ukrainian public. . . .

The Ukrainian and White Russian population is compelled, under threat, to send its children to Polish schools. . . .

The position of the radical press is no better. Confiscations of papers are almost a daily occurrence. Practically each issue of the following papers is subjected to confiscation: Trybuna Robotnicza, organ of the Alliance of the Proletariat of City and Country (appears three times a week in Lemberg); Plug, a weekly appearing in Cracow and devoted to the interests of the peasant population; a number of "one-day" papers appearing in Warsaw every week under different names; the daily Vpered and the weekly Zemlia in Volia, organs of the Ukrainian Social-Democratic Party in Lemberg, are either confiscated or appear disfigured by the censor. Also the Ukrainian monthly New Culture is frequently confiscated. The organ of the Polish Socialist Party, Dziennik Ludowy in Lemberg, was confiscated twenty-two times during the latter part of 1923, the Cracow Naprzod nine times. The Gazeta Robotnicza in Kattowitz was confiscated three times. Other papers which have been confiscated or mutilated by the censor are: Ognisko, organ of the typographical union in Lemberg; Robotnik, organ of the Polish Socialist Party; Yugendweker, organ of the Jewish socialist youth, and a number of the "one-day" papers and labor posters and announcements. Even two bourgeois papers, the Express Poranny and the Kuryer, were confiscated for printing the information that the authorities are trying "to quell the investigation in the case of the . . . Fascist organization known as the Vigilance of Polish Patriots."

On January 10, 1924, the editor of the Kultura Robotnicza, Jan Hempel, in Warsaw, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in a fortress for printing an article on May Day with quotations from the Communist Manifesto by Marx and Engels. In Grodno the editor of a workers' periodical, Kozelnik, was sentenced to three years' imprisonment, not counting the thirteen months spent in prison prior to the trial, for publishing the platform of the Alliance of the Proletariat of City and Country. The editor of the radical peasant weekly Plug in Cracow, Szeronkiewicz, was sentenced to ten years' hard labor, and the members of his staff to from two to four years each. These facts do not include the many petty persecutions and handicaps which are put in the way of the radical and labor press in their daily struggle for existence.

FOR ALL THAT THE PRESIDENT has defeated Hiram Johnson in his own State and is carrying one uncontested primary after another things are not going well with him. He has been badly defeated in several votes on the tax measure; he has wobbled dreadfully on the Japanese-exclusion issue; Senator Lodge has thrown overboard his leadership in the World Court proposal; he faces defeat on the bonus; and the charges that he entered into a compact with Henry Ford as to Muscle Shoals will not down. In addition, Mr. Coolidge has selected his wealthy Boston backer, William M. Butler, to head his campaign as chairman of the Republican National Committee—a move which shows less than his usual sagacity, for the election will be won or lost in the West and not in New England, and the West has never liked Eastern political domination as little as it does now. Mr. Butler knows neither the West nor its leaders. One thing is plain, as Senator Norris charged in the Senate on May 6: Calvin Coolidge is playing politics, good or bad, in the White House every day on every issue that presents itself. It is a melancholy spectacle and ought of itself to insure his defeat.

TO RUN WITH THE HARES and hunt with the hounds is always a dangerous procedure. Senator Hiram Johnson may not be conscious that he has done so, but his failure to enlist the enthusiastic support of the progressive cohorts who backed him in 1912 and 1920 shows that he no longer carries conviction with the liberal forces which once hailed him as a champion. Now his candidacy has ended in a fizzle and there is talk of his resigning from the Senate. Hopeless as his campaign for the Presidency was from the beginning, his defeat in his own State is nothing less than tragic. That is plainly another manifestation of the unhappy conservatism of the hordes from the East and Middle West who are now calling southern California home—it was that section which defeated the Senator. Whatever may be said of Hiram Johnson the services he rendered to California as governor ought never to be forgotten by those who profited by his labors at Sacramento. They certainly entitled him to the vote of his own State. In Indiana, too, there is obscurantism a plenty. The overwhelming success of the Ku Klux candidate, the present Secretary of State, in defeating four other candidates in the governorship primary has only one redeeming feature—it smashes the present Republican machine so long and so carefully engineered by Senator Watson. But what does it avail to unhorse one set of bosses to seat another?

OUR CONDOLENCES to the "World's Greatest Newspaper"! The Chicago Tribune has illustrated once more the truth that newspaper circulation and influence are not synonymous. It set out to defeat Governor Small, but though it has repeatedly boasted of its political power and though it reiterated its belief in the certainty of his defeat, Governor Small carried the primary by a huge majority. More than that, the Tribune championed the cause of Senator McCormick, brother of one of its chief owners, and the Senator lost in the primaries to former Governor Deneen. There are competent observers who lay the responsibility for the Senator's defeat squarely on the Tribune's doorstep. It is vociferously "wet"; hence not even the Senator's vote for the Volstead Act saved him from the opposition of the "drys." The Tribune ought to feel badly about that because Senator McCormick, with his knowledge of foreign affairs, could ill be spared from the Senate just now. He was one of the first senators to denounce the Versailles Treaty and has kept up a most valuable fire upon Poincaré's vicious policies; from the beginning he has been irreconcilable on the League of Nations. We are the happier to express our sense of the loss his going means for the Senate because we so frequently differ from him on other matters, notably our Caribbean policies. The Tribune, sooner or later, will learn that for all its wealth and circulation it wholly fails to understand the moods, the spirit, and the unrest of the masses who purchase it.

WE CANNOT DISMISS Senator Oddie's complaints against the Veterans' Bureau as easily as does President Coolidge, who is sure that there is nothing the matter with it simply because specific evils have not been laid before him. Senator Oddie, it should be recalled, was one of the investigating committee which recently revealed the unspeakable orgy of graft and incompetence in the bureau under Colonel Forbes, treated in an article in The Nation of March 5. The senatorial committee reported much improvement under the present director, General

Hines, but the legislative program that it recommended has not yet been carried out, and it was emphatic in declaring that any effort to reorganize the bureau would fail unless the new head got rid of "a substantial number of the men whom he inherited from his predecessor." Perhaps Senator Oddie goes too far in insisting that the six assistant directors should be "ousted forthwith" as also "every official brought over from the War Risk Insurance Bureau": but morale sank so low in the Forbes regime that it is hard to see how any leader during that period can develop a right attitude now, even if not personally corrupt. We must have in the Veterans' Bureau a friendly and helpful spirit in place of a policy which, as Senator Oddie puts it, presumes "a majority of ex-service men to be dishonest."

WILLIAM J. BURNS has resigned at last. The Wheeler-Brookhart committee, if it has not yet succeeded in putting Daugherty and Burns in jail, has richly justified itself in forcing the retirement of these two misfits from public office. Their failure to prosecute the big criminals and their winking at lesser graft was no worse than their constant persecution of innocent foreigners, whom they denounced, evidence or no evidence, as "Reds." Burns was, after all, probably more of a braggart and less of a confidence-man than Daugherty—his boasts of a dozen different fake solutions of the Wall Street explosion will be recalled—but he was an intimate collaborator in much of Daugherty's dirty work. He named "Ned" McLean as a special agent, and let him use the department code for personal purposes when McLean was attempting to conceal the Fall bribery. His last appearance as a witness before the Wheeler-Brookhart committee was most significant. He confessed that he had detectives shadow witnesses hostile to Daugherty, and that he, Daugherty, and George B. Lockwood, Secretary of the Republican National Committee, met at night in Daugherty's apartment before Lockwood sent Blair Coan to Montana to arrange Senator Wheeler's indictment. After that he conferred repeatedly with Coan. At Daugherty's request he sent an agent to "look into" Senator Wheeler's record, i. e., to "get something" on him. Under the rule of these men the Department of Justice became a department of injustice and it will take all Harlan Stone's energy to clean out their tracks.

ORGANIZED RELIGION may be as conservative and as completely a part of the profit system as Upton Sinclair would have us believe, but at least it has its borers from within. The Y. W. C. A., meeting recently in New York, was forced by the younger members to move to let down its orthodox evangelical bars and admit to equal membership Unitarians, Catholics, and all other persons who profess any variety of Christian faith. These young liberals also took their elders to task for discussing endless organizational detail and ignoring the fundamental problems of the day. At the same time a strong group representing the Methodist Federation for Social Service has submitted to the Quadrennial General Conference a thoroughly radical and flat-footed program calling upon the church to fight for the abolition of the economic and other causes of war, to refuse its blessing or aid for any war, to work for industrial justice and the elimination of unearned income. The Methodist women fought vigorously for equality in the church and finally won the limited right to be ordained as local preachers. Thus the fabric of conservatism gradually crumbles.

APPARENTLY THE CHIEF BENEFICIARIES of the McNary-Haugen bill would be the growers of wheat (the price of which it would raise from $1 a bushel to about $1.50) and of hogs (the rate on which at the farm it would advance from 7 cents a pound to about 11.5 cents). The cost would fall upon the community in general, including the great body of farmers who are engaged in other—and economically profitable—kinds of agriculture. In other words, the measure would be a tax upon the very kinds of farming best calculated to survive and into which our unprofitable acres ought to be turned. Moreover, there would be many beneficiaries other than farmers. Owners of elevators, merchants, millers, and speculators—with wheat on hand—would be enriched, while Representative Voight of Wisconsin estimates that the Big Five meat-packers would receive a gift of possibly $200,000,000. Finally, every middleman would pyramid the subsidy to the farmer—just as was done in the period of rising prices occasioned by the war—until profiteers had mulcted the consumer of many times the amount going to the toiler on the land.

GENUINE PROGRESS has been made toward fair dealing with the Philippines in the bill that has been reported to the House of Representatives by its Committee on Insular Affairs. The original proposal for a wait of thirty years, with a plebiscite in the islands at the end of that time on the question of independence, has been abandoned in favor of an unqualified promise to set the Philippines free at the end of twenty years. In the meanwhile a larger measure of autonomy than exists at present is provided for. In addition to the legislature the Governor would be elected by the islanders instead of appointed by the President. The only limitations of complete self-government would lie with a resident commissioner who upon authorization of the President could annul legislation or call American troops into action. The existing Jones law pledges us to free the Philippines whenever a "stable government" is established. As that condition seems to be already met, twenty years is too long to wait to fulfil our promise. Even so, the Fairfield bill is a welcome change from the subterfuges and evasions that have too long surrounded the issue.

WHY IS IT THAT EXPLORERS seem invariably to develop a lively, direct literary style which should put to shame the professional writers who feebly attempt to praise their exploits? Every time one tries to tell of some blood-chilling adventure in the Arctic or the jungle, on the high seas or the higher Himalayas, one discovers that the object of admiration has already uttered the last perfect word on the subject. The members of the Everest expeditions have put their strain and defeat and humor and valiant persistence into volumes of easy narrative. Every sailor who drifts about the Indian Ocean in a small boat makes a sturdy saga of his experience as soon as he reaches land. And here is Major Frederick L. Martin, commander of the United States Army Air Squadron, who, with his companion Sergeant A. L. Harvey, was wrecked in the fog flying head-on against an icy Alaskan peak, who crawled out alive and walked for seven days through dense mist, blinding snow, endless wind—to final safety and warmth and food.

Major Martin tells his adventures with vivid detail and yet with the decent restraint that marks the style of all explorers. And in common with his kind he describes food, when he reaches that ultimate climax of his story, with a rich and poetic gusto. The meals that adventurers eat when at last they reach port or the base camp or the first settlement! A gorgeous anthology might be made of them if only the compiler could be trusted to keep his own pen out of the soup. Sometimes we wonder with a little anxiety what will happen to the writing profession when the people who do all the things in the world realize that they can tell their own stories.

ONE IS IMPRESSED anew on reading the account of the Pulitzer awards by the kind of tests of excellence applied: "meritorious public service," "moral purpose," "public good," "commendable cause." Such requirements would seem sufficiently hampering in journalism, already burdened with too much editorializing of the news, but to demand that a novel qualify as American by exhibiting the "highest standard of American manners and manhood" is to make possible an award to "The Able McLaughlins" in a year which saw the publication of "A Lost Lady," "Bunk," and "Jennifer Lorn." The play to be honored must raise "the standard of good morals, good taste, and good manners," and the biography must teach "patriotism and unselfish service to the people." Only history and poetry may be judged purely on their merits. A few years, even a few months, after the awards have been made the intelligent public will have forgotten the moral interpretation as a key to the problem and will remember only such facts as that in 1918 Willa Cather wrote "My Antonia," but in the same year Booth Tarkington was awarded the Pulitzer prize for "The Magnificent Ambersons." With all respect to Mr. Pulitzer's will, to judge works of art by the 100-per-cent nature of the service they render is, after all, to court indifference to the verdict.

THE LITERARY CHESSBOARD shifts. Stuart P. Sherman, most intelligent and independent of the conservative critics (and an old contributor to The Nation), is leaving the University of Illinois to direct the new literary magazine which the New York Herald-Tribune will launch in the autumn, and takes with him as associate editor Irita Van Doren, literary editor of The Nation. Mark Van Doren, assistant professor of English at Columbia University, author of "Henry David Thoreau—A Critical Study" and "The Poetry of John Dryden," and poetry critic of The Nation for several years past, will fill the gap created by Irita Van Doren's departure. Meanwhile, other changes are imminent. Henry Seidel Canby who, with his associates William Rose Benét and Amy Loveman, has made the Literary Review of the New York Evening Post the leading American magazine devoted solely to books, has followed the course which has seemed inevitable ever since Cyrus Curtis added the New York paper to his list of publications—Mr. Canby has resigned. In these days of unprecedented interest in good literature it is hard to believe that he can remain without a medium. Even if under another name, the urbane spirit of the Literary Review must surely live on. There can never be too many good critical reviews, and The Nation, as a sort of 59-year-old great-uncle of the modern brood, welcomes each new arrival with enthusiasm.

The French Revolution—1924

FRANCE IS HER OLD SELF again. By an overwhelming sweep which none of the political wiseacres foresaw she has turned upon the bellicose Poincaré and replaced his war chamber—62 per cent of whose members were ex-soldiers—with an old-time republican, anti-clerical, pacific, near-socialist majority.

It was the provinces which did it. Foreign observers—and even many French observers—are always deceived by Paris. Paris is Paris—more important to France than Washington to America, Berlin to Germany, or even London to Great Britain—but after all Paris is not France. France is still a peasant country, a land of lovingly tilled small acres and of little villages. The peasants and tradesmen of the small cities turned against Poincaré and his saber-rattling policy; and they turned not to revolutionary communism but to the same generous, warm-hearted, and rather vague leaders and parties to which they had turned after the revelations of the Dreyfus affair and in the days before the war when Poincaré and Barthou were forcing the Russian alliance and the three-year military-service law upon them. The Radical Socialists—who are, to be sure, neither very radical nor at all socialist—will be the dominant group in the new Chamber, and the Socialists will play as large a part as in that elected in the spring of 1914.

Even in France, then, the war is over. André Tardieu, who abused Poincaré for not being jingo enough; André Lefèvre, ex-Minister of War and arch-monger of stories of secret German armies; Georges Mandel, Clemenceau's right-hand man; Léon Daudet, royalist leader and ally of Poincaré; General Castelnau, and other fire-eating patriots went down to defeat, while Louis-Jean Malvy, who was exiled by Clemenceau for his mildness as Minister of the Interior, and André Marty, who hoisted the red flag over the French fleet in the Black Sea in 1919 and refused to fire on the Bolsheviks at Odessa, were triumphantly elected.

It is the old France come back—but one should not conclude too much from that. Edouard Herriot, the leader of the Radical Socialists, opposed the Ruhr policy before the troops actually marched across the Rhine, but once the die had been cast he said "My country, right or wrong"—like the French Socialists in 1914—and accepted the decision. When the policy had proved its barrenness he resumed his attacks, but many of his party broke ranks and voted for the policy of invasion. Indeed some of its members actually took office under Poincaré. Herriot, however, despite his history of vacillations and hesitations, has consistently demanded a policy of intimate collaboration with England, particularly with Ramsay MacDonald; he advocates acceptance in toto of the Dawes report; he has urged recognition of Russia. While it is still possible that enough of his party may bolt to give Poincaré a bare majority, it seems more likely that the political effect of such an election will be to swing members of Poincaré's army toward the left. Europe will breathe more easily if France puts into her premiership the man who concluded his program-speech on January 11 with these words:

Is it not the mission of republican France, without abandoning any of her rights, to realize the most beautiful phrase which ever rose above the clash of interests and passions: "Peace on earth; good-will toward men"?

Boss Murphy and Civic Progress

WE have caught ourselves wondering what two former editors of The Nation, Wendell Phillips Garrison and Edwin L. Godkin, would have thought had they lived long enough to take cognizance of the death of Boss Murphy of Tammany Hall. They would have seen leading men of whom one would never have expected it singing the praises of the Tammany ruler of New York. They would have seen a Governor who is a prominent candidate for the Presidency doing public honor to him by whose favor he rose. They would have been amazed at the mealy-mouthed press which passed over Mr. Murphy's death with scarce a word to remind the world what manner of man this was and what constituted his power. Godkin and Garrison called him one unfit "for decent political society"; "a man who cannot speak or write, who is not known to have a single political conviction, whose associations are low, and whose methods smell of corruption." Finally, they would have been amazed to see great throngs standing in the streets to view the funeral of one who held no office, who never contributed in any degree toward the spiritual or civic upbuilding of the city, whose power came solely from the headship of a private political body which has for years been held together by the "cohesive power of public plunder."

Naturally our distinguished predecessors, on viewing all this and on finding that there has been almost a total collapse of the good-government forces on behalf of which they struck such telling blows against Tammany Hall, would, if they were here today, be prone to say that all their work had gone for naught. Yet such a judgment would be mistaken. We do not deny the profound causes for discouragement which exist. We do not deny the almost hopeless odds against which those men battle who are still in office because of their devotion to the public welfare. We cannot conceal the fact, if we would, that, so far as the mayoralty is concerned, we are back where we were before 1894, when the election of Mayor William L. Strong ushered in what appeared to be a definite and lasting awakening of the citizenship. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that no Tammany boss was ever as secure as Charles Murphy when he died; nor that there is endless graft and inefficiency, and doubtless grave corruption, in many of the bureaus of the municipality. We cannot hide the sad truth that the anti-Tammany forces are utterly without leadership; that not one man whose voice can reach and move the multitude is today making front against government by and for Tammany Hall.

Yet this is only a partial picture of the situation of the metropolis. Certainly much that the reformers of 1890-1910 builded remains. No one viewing the city of today who did not know it in the eighties and early nineties is competent to judge of the progress that has been made—it is progress and not mere reaction. New York City was then outwardly and inwardly sordid. The era of its present beauty had hardly begun. Its streets were incredibly paved and incredibly filthy. Harlotry was in open and brazen possession of streets and avenues, paying toll to Tammany when it did not have to divide with some of the Republican politicians. Gambling abounded. The poor were plundered shamelessly in broad daylight. The courts, far worse than today, were, in their lowest grade, nothing but institutions to punish the unfortunate and plunder the hapless victims of misgovernment who were brought before them. The magistrates were as corrupt, as criminal, as ignorant as most of those whom they judged. Pull, political influence, and the power of money reigned supreme. The Health Department was an incompetent monstrosity. The Department of Charities was a cesspool, the prisons and hospitals a stench in the nostrils of decent folk. There are amazing differences between the social service of the city in 1890 and that of 1924, while the Health Department of New York today, even under Mayor Hylan, is a scientific organization of merit. More than that, where all offices were once filled by the bosses, today, under the civil-service rules, office-holders are measurably secure from spite, revenge, and partisan attacks.

We are conscious, of course, that much of this improvement lies in externals; that underneath there are still infinite wrongs, waste, extravagance, thieving; that in the broad aspect of affairs we are far, far from the millennium. People are still exploited. If commercialized vice has largely disappeared, other evils exist. Betting is not a waning, but a waxing evil. True, civic franchises are no longer sold to the highest bidder; nor is the power of the corrupt corporation managers what it used to be. Tammany itself is cleaner—if by any act of Murphy's, then all credit to him. Prohibition has robbed it of the saloons that were its headquarters on every block. Such vicious gangs as it fostered in many quarters of the city, which did not stop at murder, no longer exist. The Hall's coffers no longer overflow with the earnings of prostitutes. Things have changed and changed markedly for the better. Life is no longer deliberately made harder for the masses by those servants of the public who served only in order to enrich themselves. Even if we had to admit that all this improvement lies in external things we should still be grateful.

As it is, the emphasis has shifted, and Murphy was wise enough to let it shift, to see that the old ways of obtaining plunder no longer held. It is a more refined and polite system which obtains. The blackjack has yielded to deft argument and cynical persuasion. Under Murphy's leadership the coffers were filled, but from other sources. He governed his cohorts amazingly to their satisfaction. He was a despot against whom no one had dreamed for a decade of revolting. He never allowed himself to be tripped, as did Croker. He early took the only proper role for a boss of this character: he padlocked his lips, gave virtually no interviews, and made no speeches. He was even more taciturn than Calvin Coolidge, and like our President he, the ex-barkeeper, built up a reputation for wisdom and profundity by saying as little as possible. Undoubtedly he was a popular boss; and undoubtedly he reached the human side of multitudes; to endless "heelers," workers, and friends he appeared of utmost probity and of absolute dependability.

Yet the system he headed was the same corrupt one which has for generations degraded New York, and today makes possible a rule of favor and favoritism; which puts politics into the schools and the Police Department, and saddles upon the city an Enright and a Hylan; which ham-strings real progress, plays into the hands of the transportation companies by making of the Board of Estimate a group of quarreling marionettes, and keeps the whole level of New York political life low indeed, as witness the absolute failure of the citizenship of the greatest city to play any role whatsoever in House or Senate. Let no one be deceived. Government by Tammany Hall remains a crime against the American democracy. As long as it survives it menaces every municipal government under the Stars and Stripes.

Courts or People—Which Shall Rule?

IN this issue of The Nation appears the last of a series of three articles upon the position of the Supreme Court of the United States in our government. During late years the court has announced decisions reviewing the constitutionality of statutes, both State and federal, in increasingly important legislative fields. The question presented by this growth of judicial supremacy becomes ever more pressing.

In the first article of the series Mr. Warren makes a powerful historical case for the position that the framers of the federal Constitution intended that the Supreme Court should have the power of passing upon the constitutionality of legislation. While it may be doubted whether the Constitutional Convention would have so empowered the court had it understood the full extent of the power of judicial review which has since been exercised, nevertheless Mr. Warren's historical evidence seems persuasive that such a power was intended and that it has not been "usurped" by the Supreme Court.

The fundamental considerations, however, are not whether the Supreme Court's authority was intended in 1789 but whether, as now used, it is a desirable power for the court to have, and what would be the consequence of limiting or abolishing it. Mr. Warren suggests that to take from the Supreme Court the power to pass upon the constitutionality of legislation would destroy our federal form of government. We doubt if it would mean so much, but certainly to take away that power from the court would accomplish a basic change in our form of government—the elaborate system of checks and balances provided by the Constitution would be superseded by a legislature to all intents and purposes supreme. This seems to us a desirable change. The whole trend of government during the past century has been away from the system of checks and balances, and toward a centralizing of responsibility. The English system of parliamentary government by a supreme legislative body with an executive ministry directly responsible to it and through it to the people has had far more imitators than has our cumbrously checked and balanced system. This fact may come as a shock to those who have regarded the separation of powers and a supreme judiciary as essential to civilization, but that it is a fact cannot be doubted by anyone who has read Professor Haines's study in our last issue.

We are familiar with the arguments against the English system. It is said that the supreme legislative body is subject to the whims of transitory popular passion, that it gives to the majority the power to tyrannize over minority groups, and that it lacks the protection to individual liberty and to private property which is found in a bill of rights supported by judicial review. Well, so far as the Bill of Rights goes, we have always felt that Hamilton was close to the truth when, writing in "The Federalist" of liberty of the press, he said:

Its security, whatever fine declarations may be inserted in any constitution respecting it, must altogether depend on public opinion, and on the general spirit of the people, and of the government. And here after all, as is intimated upon another occasion, must we seek for the one solid basis of all our rights.

The constitutional guaranties of individual liberty and private property are indeed worth precisely what their popular support makes them worth, and no more. If the spirit of the people is against the maintenance of the provisions of a bill of rights, those provisions will fail. If it is for their preservation, such a bill of rights needs no Supreme Court to protect it. It is doubtless true that if Congress were supreme it would make many mistakes. So, we believe, does the Supreme Court. Congress will continue to reflect majority sentiment, as the court has often reflected minority prejudices, and there is no assurance that public questions will be decided wisely, merely because they are decided by majority vote or by a few black-gowned judges. None of us is very wise. But such little wisdom in government as has been developed has come from the opportunity to shoulder responsibility, to make mistakes, and to profit by the disagreeable experiences to which those errors have led.

The abrogation of the supremacy of the Supreme Court is not a change which should be brought about alone. If Congress is to be made supreme, it should be made more quickly responsive to popular will, and the likelihood of deadlock between the Capitol and the White House ought to be lessened. The executive power should be placed in the hands of a ministry responsible to Congress, which can compel a change of administration by a withdrawal of its support in much the same way that the government of England changes hands.

Unfortunately so drastic a change in our governmental system, desirable as we believe it to be, is probably not realizable at the present time. The historic American method of political reform—in striking contrast to our industrial technique—is to tinker with what we have rather than scrap it in favor of something entirely new. Thus we must probably move indirectly and by a series of steps toward the supremacy of the legislative power. Senator La Follette proposes a constitutional amendment providing that Congress, by a two-thirds vote, should be able to reenact and validate any of its legislation overthrown by the Supreme Court. Senator Borah and others are in favor of a change requiring the concurrence of seven of the nine justices of the Supreme Court in order to declare an act of Congress invalid. In this issue of The Nation Beulah Amidon Ratliff advocates the latter plan, except that she favors a concurrence of seven justices to overthrow State laws and a unanimous judgment to nullify congressional legislation. She argues also that a constitutional amendment is not necessary to accomplish this; that it could be done merely by an act of Congress. In spite of the authorities cited, we doubt whether Congress was intended to have power to circumscribe the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction in the manner which she suggests. In any case we surmise that if such an act of Congress were presented to the Supreme Court that body would refuse to cut off its own head and would promptly hold the law unconstitutional. Moreover, the mere limitation of the majority of the Supreme Court needed to declare a law unconstitutional seems to us to miss the heart of the issue. Such a reform might result only in the appointment of fewer Holmeses and Brandeises to the supreme bench.

Still, even if unsuccessful, the passage of a law such as Mrs. Ratliff proposes might provide a good beginning for a campaign to restrict the power of the Supreme Court. If it proves necessary—and we think it will—to amend the Constitution, then we would prefer the La Follette plan to any of the others, as giving a result more nearly in line with the principle involved and more commensurate with the time and effort required. The issue ought to be faced squarely and understandingly by the American people, and we believe that until the voters insist upon the supremacy of their will, and that of their representatives, there can be no development of modern and progressive democracy in the United States.

Historians and the Truth

THREE cheers for Harry Elmer Barnes! Not only is he an extraordinarily incisive writer, a sound deliverer into the truth of history without fear or favor; he has dared to handle delinquent members of his craft without gloves. By doing so he has violated one of the most firmly established traditions of the historical set. If you are a historian the first canon is to say nothing unkind about any co-worker in your field lest thirty years later that become a stumbling block to your rising to the presidency of the American Historical Association. Professor Barnes correctly says that if he had conformed to the Rotarian urbanity "which characterizes the public conduct and expression of the majority of eminent and respectable American historians" he would have "violently cursed the book privately among intimate friends, and then maintained a dignified and immaculate silence in public." Now he has gone and done it, and if he is not an historical pariah hereafter we shall be astonished.

Mr. Barnes's offense is a brilliant review written by him for the New Republic, in which he told the truth about Charles Downer Hazen's new edition of his "Europe Since 1815." In that review he characterized as "worse than bunk" Professor Hazen's book and Professor E. R. Turner's "Europe Since 1789"—dangerously unparliamentary language for a scholar to use if it were not the truth. Returning to the attack, he charges that books like these "will pervert the information and stultify the intelligence of many thousands of the best young minds of the country." This indictment is due to the fact that in his new edition Professor Hazen has not changed one word in the chapter on the origins of the war which he wrote in 1916. Since that date an enormous mass of evidence as to the causes of the war and the events which led up to the catastrophe has appeared. Any fair-minded person studying this evidence must share Mr. Barnes's conclusion that one must revise one's opinion as to the causes of the war and the part that the Germans played in bringing it on. This does not mean, as The Nation has repeatedly set forth, that one must accept the prevalent German view that Germany was merely an innocent victim and herself guiltless. Far from it. But the researches of men like Mr. Barnes and Professor Sidney B. Fay, not to mention many others, and the exposures of E. D. Morel and Frederick Bausman make it necessary for any unbiased person to discard once and for all the idea that Germany was the sole criminal and that her moves in July and August, 1914, were the expression of a deliberate intention to subjugate the liberties of the world. That, in the light of the documents which were surveyed in The Nation for October 11, 1922, is nonsense.

We have no desire today to thresh anew this old straw. History is rewriting itself, or rather honest historians are rewriting it, because the facts are coming out, and when some future revolution opens the archives of England—we had hoped that the Labor Government would have done it before this—and those of France to the light of day we may see still more astounding revelations. What we delight to celebrate today is Professor Barnes's smashing of the taboo laid upon historians not to criticize one another. We wish that there were a chance that his challenge to his craft to bring Professors Hazen and Turner "to judgment before the bar of professional historical opinion," might be taken up; in our judgment that would be the best thing that has ever happened to the teaching of history in America. If the American Historical Association were worth its salt it would set the wheels in motion without further delay.

What could demonstrate better the need of such a shaking up as this would give the whole body of historical scholars in America than a phrase used by Albert Bushnell Hart of Harvard University in his comment upon another article by Mr. Barnes, Assessing the Blame for the World War, in the May Current History? This article, a magnificent summary of the new evidence, was considered too dangerous to appear in that magazine without a comment by a member of its board of associates. The task was assigned to Mr. Hart. This is the conclusion to which he comes: "The subject is too involved, the underlying race and language antipathies are too strong, the confusion of relations in Eastern Europe too complex to make any review of printed testimony a safe basis for changing an opinion which was forged by the fires of war" [italics ours]!

What a confession for an historian and an ex-president of the American Historical Association! What right has an historian to permit any opinion to be forged by the fires, the passions, the bitternesses, the hatreds of war? If he indulges himself in that sort of thing at all, he ought to purge his soul of it the minute he returns to the land of rationality. He ought to be the very first one to thank Providence for any new evidence, particularly documentary evidence, which would go to establish the truth which every true historian is sworn by the solemnest oath of scholarship to establish and uphold. No man or woman in America who is interested in the facts as to the war should fail to read this article of Professor Barnes. No scholar who refuses to consider the evidence therein, modifying the popular conceptions of 1914-19, is worthy to continue to teach.

Dawes and the Diplomats

By GEORGE GLASGOW

London, April 26

THE triangular game of reparations, as played by Berlin, Paris, and London, was restarted on April 9 when the experts presented their report to the Reparation Commission. The report had been delayed for the transparent reason that the French experts were attempting the difficult problem of reconciling the political principles of M. Poincaré with the practical economics of making Germany pay. During the week-end of March 22 to 24 the British experts, Mr. R. McKenna, Sir Robert Kindersley, and Sir Josiah Stamp, came to London to explain the reasons for the delay, and on Monday, March 24, the French Ambassador in London called on Mr. MacDonald.

Officially the visit of the three British experts was a private affair and had nothing to do with reparations; for the experts had been appointed by the Reparation Commission, and it was to the Reparation Commission that they had to report. Privately, however, they did as much while in London as ever they could have done officially. They were mainly responsible for the visit of the French Ambassador to the British Prime Minister which took place on March 24. Most of the talking on that day was done by the French Ambassador. The result was so far satisfactory that the British experts returned to Paris that same evening, and the experts proceeded to draft their report.

The French Ambassador had received his instructions from M. Poincaré and therefore had to repeat what he had been saying since January, 1922, except that he raised in a more categorical fashion than before the suggestion that the problem of French security could be solved only by the conclusion of an Anglo-French defensive treaty made for perpetuity to replace the Anglo-American-French pact of guaranty which had fallen through for lack of American ratification. He was, however, enabled to learn that the British plan was of a wholly different kind. In his letter of February 21 to M. Poincaré, Mr. MacDonald strongly hinted that the way to security lay through the League of Nations, possibly through the Draft Treaty of Mutual Assistance, possibly through a special scheme of demilitarization and neutralization of the Rhineland under a League guaranty. The French Ambassador was also enabled to report to M. Poincaré that in the British view a new factor had entered into the situation. The present British Government makes a cardinal point of the necessity of German and Russian membership of the League as a preliminary to any possibility of settlement. Since Mr. MacDonald wrote his letter of February 21 to M. Poincaré he has had it impressed on him by the competent German quarters in London that no German Government will ever accept any arrangement for the Rhineland which goes beyond the stipulations of the Treaty of Versailles, and that Germany will not at present join the League unless some definite prospect of a seat on the Council is held out to her.

While, therefore, the French Ambassador agreed that the experts might as well finish their job, he had a dispatch to send to the Quai d'Orsay of such importance that M. Poincaré indulged in one of his periodic resignations. He resigned on a side issue on March 26, two days after the MacDonald-St. Aulaire conversation. As the British Government affected to take no interest in the event, he was quickly induced to form another government, which, though it included M. Loucheur, had in no way changed its complexion. As had been the case when M. Poincaré last resigned (on May 24, 1923) his sojourn in the wilderness lasted only a few hours.

On April 9 the experts delivered their report to the Reparation Commission. The report was a long and complicated plan for balancing Germany's budget, stabilizing the mark, recovering the capital that had left Germany, and in short putting Germany into a position where she could reasonably be expected to pay, and could be made to pay, reparations. That was all. Committee No. 1, which had been presided over by General Dawes, and on which had sat Sir Robert Kindersley and Sir Josiah Stamp, expressly stated that its business had been "business" in the technical sense and not politics, and that the questions of political as opposed to economic guaranties, as well as of military sanctions, were outside its competence. The report of that committee was a double document of 124 foolscap pages of print in English and French. The second committee's report, which was concerned only with the means of estimating the amount of Germany's exported capital and bringing it back to Germany, was a document of only fifteen pages.

It was the Dawes Committee's report which naturally monopolized attention. Unlike previous expert schemes it not only prescribed a schedule of annual payments, but indicated in detail the sources from which the money should be raised and the method by which it should be handed over. A thumb-nail sketch of the recommendations follows:

1. Germany should revert to the position of an economic unit (in other words, the Ruhr should be evacuated);

2. She should pledge certain revenues as security for payment, the standard annuities being paid partly from budget revenues, partly from (a) railway bonds, (b) industrial debentures, (c) taxes on tobacco, alcohol, sugar, beer, and customs duties;

3. There should be a partial moratorium for the four years to 1928-1929 during which Germany should pay annuities rising from £50 millions to £87½ millions; by the end of that period the payments should reach the standard rate of £125 millions (2½ milliard gold marks) with variable addition calculated on an "index of prosperity";

4. There should be a reparations loan of 800 million gold marks (£40 millions);

5. A new bank of issue or a reorganized Reichsbank should create a gold currency and withdraw the paper circulation;

6. Germany's wealth abroad is estimated at £400 millions.

The important question is how far can the scheme be made the starting-point for renewed negotiations between the Allies and Germany. The experts were ruled out from considering the political issues, and it is precisely those issues that matter most.

For instance:

1. The First Committee of Experts declare that although political and military conditions are outside their scope, yet if and when their economic plan comes into operation two conditions must be observed by the Allied Governments; namely, (a) if any military organization exists it must not impede the free exercise of economic activities; (b) there shall be no foreign economic control or interference other than that proposed by the plan. Now the question is what happens to M. Poincaré's oft-reiterated protestation that the French will never let go of the Ruhr "pledge" except in proportion as Germany pays?

2. Another question is, How can the condition of stability and confidence, as stipulated for in the report, be achieved unless and until Germany's total indebtedness is fixed? The experts have not considered the question of Germany's total liability, and therefore the assumption on which the report is based is that the May, 1921, total still stands as the amount of the Allied demand. Yet that figure has been condemned as an impossible one by both American and British experts, and even French experts have admitted it to be too high.

3. Next there is the question of French demands. M. Poincaré has never abandoned his claim that France must receive a net total of 26 milliard gold marks (£1,300 millions); that is to say, that if she has to pay her debts to Great Britain and America the total of 26 milliards must be increased accordingly. Now, the British White Paper of last August conclusively showed that this French demand is considerably in excess of her share of 52 per cent of the May, 1921, schedule.

4. The experts' plan involves an international loan of 800 million gold marks (£40 millions). It goes without saying that this loan would have to be largely raised in London. The experts further confirm the principle that the loan would be used partly to help Germany to meet essential treaty purposes during the years 1924 and 1925; in other words, 52 per cent of that portion of it earmarked for such a purpose would go through Berlin to Paris. Now, unless there is some satisfactory settlement of the question of the French debt there can be little prospect of British money becoming available for an international loan for Germany, which in the circumstances would be tantamount to a further British loan to France.

5. Assuming the satisfactory arrangement of the political problems above mentioned, there would have to be some assurance that France would not again in any contingency take separate measures against Germany, such as the occupation of the Ruhr.

6. Finally, there is the question of the Ruhr expenses and proceeds, if any. Are the proceeds, which are now represented in Paris as being abundant, to be credited to the Reparation Commission's account?

In a word, the experts' work was the least important part of the problem, although the fact of America's participation, unofficial as it was, in that work had the effect of adding moral weight to the argument for a reasonable settlement. How important and how delicate were the political, as contrasted with the expert, difficulties was shown within forty-eight hours of the presentation of the report. The French press, on the obvious inspiration of the Quai d'Orsay, began to speculate on the introduction of modifications into the experts' scheme and on the elaboration of additional measures of control.

The anxiety which was thereby created in British and American quarters was due to the reflection that as matters stand, and as a result of the withdrawal of the United States from official participation in Allied affairs, a Franco-Belgian bloc on the Reparation Commission, backed by the French chairman's casting vote, can carry anything it likes. The withdrawal of America has left France with the whip hand in the Reparation Commission. The remaining delegates are four—the British, the French, the Belgian, and the Italian. Even assuming that the Italian delegate votes with the British, there is an equal bloc on the other side, for Belgium always takes her cue from France; and the matter is therefore decided by the casting vote of the chairman, who happens to be the French delegate. That the chairman should always be French is again America's responsibility. It was provided by the treaty that at the first meeting of the Reparation Commission a chairman should be appointed. As the commission sat in Paris, it was a matter of courtesy that the first chairman elected should be the French delegate. The chairman is appointed for a year, after which his successor is appointed, but the actual chairman is eligible for reelection, and the Franco-Belgian bloc is of course in favor of retaining the French chairman indefinitely. It is obvious, therefore, why any French move toward tampering with the experts' recommendations was a cause for anxiety. When the experts drew up their report, there was some friction over an important point which finally the British and American experts succeeded in carrying. It was that the experts' recommendations should either be accepted and applied as a whole by the Reparation Commission or should be rejected as a whole. The French experts in the end agreed to the incorporation of the following clause which duly appeared in the text of the report:

In the first place we regard our report as an indivisible whole. It is not possible, in our opinion, to achieve any success by selecting certain of our recommendations for adoption and rejecting the others, and we would desire to accept no responsibility for the results of such a procedure nor for undue delay in giving execution to our plan.

But within forty-eight hours of its presentation French quarters began to explore the prospect of modifications of the scheme in two important directions. They raised the novel cry of a progressive economic evacuation of the Ruhr. This was palpably designed as a challenge to that clause of the report which declared:

It is our duty to point out clearly that our forecasts are based on the assumption that [Germany's] economic activity will be unhampered and unaffected by any foreign organization other than the controls here provided.

That clause clearly implied the necessity of an evacuation of the Ruhr by the French. "Yes," in effect answered the French, "we will put an end to the military occupation of the Ruhr, but we shall not evacuate economically except in proportion as Germany pays"; thereby adapting the notorious formula. As a further refinement French semi-official quarters exercised their well-known flair for a bargain by suggesting that the French military evacuation of the Ruhr should be paid for by a British cancellation of the French debt! The main point, however, was that the major French suggestion, that of substituting a formula of progressive economic evacuation for one of military evacuation, was directly opposed to the recommendations of the experts. At the same time the same French quarters speculated on the devising of additional measures of control over and above those enumerated in the experts' scheme, therein again violating the express recommendations of the experts.

Shall We Remake the Supreme Court?

III. May Congress Limit the Supreme Court?

By BEULAH AMIDON RATLIFF

(This is the concluding article in a series of three on the Supreme Court. The first, on The Origin of Its Power, by Charles Warren, appeared in the issue of May 7, and the second, on The Practice of Other Countries, by Charles Grove Haines, was printed last week. An editorial article on the question will be found on page 575 of this issue.)

THE recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, declaring the minimum-wage law of the District of Columbia unconstitutional and imperiling the minimum-wage laws of the several States, has brought sharply to the attention of the country the increasing power of the Supreme Court over national and State legislation. A storm of protest has followed the minimum-wage decision, and a number of plans have been suggested for limiting the power of the Supreme Court to declare laws unconstitutional.

Senator Borah has introduced a bill into Congress which seeks to correct the familiar evil of the five-to-four decision, by which one justice of the court overturns the work of State legislators or of Congress. Senator Borah's bill would do away with this "one-man rule" by requiring the concurrence of seven justices to declare a statute unconstitutional.

Large business interests are, of course, enthusiastic defenders of the "sanctity" of the Supreme Court, as the power of the court to declare laws unconstitutional is more often a benefit to conservatism than to progress. These sources embody the chief opposition to any limitation of the power of the court, because it is increasingly apparent that unless the Supreme Court's power can be limited in this field the extremely slow and difficult process of constitutional amendment is the only way to secure legislation tending to modify in any way the economic status quo. The federal income-tax law, the federal child-labor law, and the minimum-wage law are only three of the factors leading to this conclusion, so discouraging to liberals, so extremely gratifying to reactionaries.

In the case of Senator Borah's proposal, as in the case of many similar suggestions, the favorite tool of the opposition is the "constitutionality" of the measure in question. "The Constitution vests the judicial power of the United States in a Supreme Court," this facile argument runs; "therefore Congress has no right to tell the Supreme Court, or any other court, how it shall exercise its judicial function."

The cases to which the jurisdiction of federal courts extends are specified in the first paragraph of Section 2, Article III, of the Constitution. The second paragraph of the same section divides the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court into two classes. It reads:

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

That is, the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is conferred by the Constitution itself. It cannot be taken away or limited by Congress. As to this jurisdiction, the Constitution is "self-executing," to use the legal phrase. But the appellate jurisdiction of the court, under which it derives its power to declare laws unconstitutional, does not come into use until Congress speaks, and as soon as Congress speaks its word becomes the exclusive guidance of the court's power.

Ellsworth of Connecticut had a prominent part in framing Article III of the Constitution, establishing the judicial department. He was also a member of the Senate in the first Congress and chairman of the committee that drafted the Judiciary Act of 1789, which still serves as the basis of our whole federal judicial system and practice. In 1793 he was appointed Chief Justice by President Washington, and wrote the opinion in the leading authority on this subject, Wiscart vs. Douchy, 3 Dallas 321, 327. In that opinion he held:

Original jurisdiction, however, is confined to ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those cases in which a State shall be a party. In all other cases only an appellate jurisdiction is given to the court; and even the appellate jurisdiction is likewise qualified; inasmuch as it is given "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make." Here, then, is the only ground on which we can exercise an appellate jurisdiction.

This doctrine has obtained for a hundred and twenty years, and was clearly and concisely restated not long ago by Mr. Justice Gray in American Construction Co. vs. Jacksonville Railway Co., 148 U. S. 372, 378 (unanimous decision): "This Court, therefore, as it has always held, can exercise no appellate jurisdiction except in the cases, and in the manner and form, defined and prescribed by Congress." (Italics mine.)

The same theory is developed by all the leading textbooks on constitutional law. For example, in Section 1773, Story on the Constitution, we read:

The appellate powers of the Supreme Court are not given by the Judicial Act. They are given by the Constitution. But they are limited and regulated by that act and other acts on the subject. And where a rule is provided, all persons will agree that it cannot be departed from.

Clearly, then, the only part of the judicial power that is beyond the control of Congress is the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, expressly defined by the Constitution. It has been held by the Supreme Court itself from the earliest times that Congress has plenary power over the Supreme Court in all matters falling within its appellate jurisdiction. This power has often been used by Congress to "regulate" the limits of the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, within the bounds set by the Constitution. Perhaps the most famous example of this type of regulation is the notable case, Ex Parte McCordle, 7 Wall. 506. Under an act passed in 1867 the court was given jurisdiction to review writs of habeas corpus in certain cases. In the carrying out of the reconstruction program it was found that the court had rendered a decision under this act which was embarrassing to the Federal Government. A reargument had been granted. While this was pending Congress repealed the act of 1867 which gave the court its jurisdiction over writs of habeas corpus. Counsel for the prisoner urged with vehemence that the only purpose of Congress was to prevent the court's pronouncing of judgment in a case which it had fairly heard and was about to decide. These facts were clearly shown in the debates in Congress. Nevertheless the Supreme Court declared that its power in the matter was ended, and that it no longer had any jurisdiction except to dismiss the appeal.

But the authority thus to confer and deny appellate jurisdiction, within the limits set by the Constitution, is only one phase of the congressional power to regulate the Supreme Court.

Marshall's definition of the power to regulate interstate commerce reads: "The power to regulate interstate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which the commerce is to be governed." (9 Wheaton 195.) Mr. Justice Gray applied this definition to the regulation of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in the case cited above when he said that the appellate jurisdiction can be exercised only "in the manner and form defined and prescribed by Congress."

That is, Congress not only can confer and deny the appellate jurisdiction of the court, but it can also make the rules under which the Supreme Court may exercise that jurisdiction. This is not "telling the court how it shall decide its cases." It is the application of the express power of Congress to fix the rules under which the Supreme Court shall decide the cases carried to it on appeal.

Many able lawyers contend that the power to declare laws unconstitutional is a pure usurpation on the part of the courts. The decision in Marberry vs. Madison was rendered a century and a quarter ago. The practice which was then inaugurated has since been followed by the courts and greatly increased. It has had the tacit approval of the American people long enough to make any argument that it is "pure usurpation" academic and unwise. Whether it was the actual intention of the framers of the federal Constitution to confer the power is no longer important. But it is important to know that the power can be defined and limited by Congress, just as any other power under the appellate jurisdiction of the court is subject to congressional regulation.

All students of government recognize a wide difference between the power to declare a national law unconstitutional and the same power to nullify a State law. Congress is a coordinate branch of the same government as the court. The one is bound by its oath to uphold the Constitution in law-making, the same as is the other in law-construing. In the case of States the power is necessary to defend the national welfare against State selfishness and to protect national authority against State nullification. This basic difference exists not only as a matter of theory but as a matter of practice. In no country having a written constitution except ours does the power of courts to declare a national law void exist, though the power to nullify State or provincial law is generally recognized and practiced. Mr. Justice Holmes pointed out this difference in an address in New York City when he said that he did not think the nation would have been destroyed if the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional had never been exercised, but he did think the Constitution and the Union would have been destroyed by the centrifugal force of State selfishness if the power to declare State laws unconstitutional had not been asserted and practiced.

The fundamental difference thus pointed out justifies a difference in the limitation of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional and the same power to nullify a State law.

The rule that the Supreme Court has always professed to follow in passing upon the constitutionality of laws is that where reasonable doubt exists the statute shall stand. The five-to-four decision is, on its face, an infringement of this rule, for, where four of the learned judges disagree with the other five, everybody except possibly lawyers and judges can see only ground for scoffing at the conflict between the court's profession and practice. The fact that one man may abolish the law established by the people, in State legislatures or Congress, smacks more of absolute monarchy than of democracy. The seven-to-two decision would help lift the matter of a statute's constitutionality out of these cloudy realms of "reasonable doubt."

But Senator Borah's measure touches only one phase of the evil with which it deals. The whole subject of the right of our courts to review State and federal laws needs to be overhauled and set in order. The power has been so ramified and extended that the lengths to which the courts go in declaring laws unconstitutional is a constant source of public exasperation. To secure the passage of a law on any subject has become a questionable relief, because it is impossible to foretell what the courts will do with that law. And by the constant destruction of law the Supreme Court is destroying respect for law, because the court itself shows so little respect for the laws which the people's representatives from time to time attempt to establish.

This outline for federal legislation, some features of which have already been suggested by Senator La Follette, is submitted as a proper and adequate limitation of the power of the federal courts to declare laws unconstitutional:

1. When a suit in a federal court involves the question of the constitutionality of a law, either State or federal, the suit should be heard by three judges, not only on the question of whether a preliminary injunction shall be issued during the pendency of the suit as now provided by the Clayton Act, but the same judges should hear the evidence and enter the final decree in the case. Such cases should have priority over all other litigation. The choice of judges to try them should not be left to the Senior Circuit judge, as at present, but should be made by three Circuit judges, or by two Circuit judges and the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit. Unless the three judges hearing the suit are unanimous in holding the law unconstitutional, its enforcement should not be enjoined.

2. An appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States should be allowed in all such suits. The time for taking the appeal should be limited; and provision should be made for giving such suits priority over all other litigation. If irreparable injury would result from the enforcement of the law during the pendency of the appeal, the three judges hearing the suit should have power to suspend its enforcement until the appeal is decided. Such relief should, however, be so conditioned as to secure to parties all rights granted by the law unless it is finally held to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

3. To declare a State law unconstitutional, at least seven of the judges of the Supreme Court hearing the appeal should concur in the decision. To declare a federal law unconstitutional, all the judges should concur in the decision.

In brief, then, the Supreme Court derives its appellate jurisdiction from the Constitution, but "with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." Defining the power to regulate interstate commerce, Marshall said it was the power to make rules for the carrying on of that commerce. So here the power to regulate the jurisdiction to declare laws unconstitutional is the power to fix the rule for the exercise of such jurisdiction. From the decision in the Marberry case to the present time the Supreme Court has held that a law ought not to be declared unconstitutional unless its conflict with the Constitution is so plain as to leave no room for doubt. The remedy outlined above simply gives a practical rule for ascertaining when such conflict is in fact free from reasonable doubt.

Fascist Rule in South Tyrol

By ROBERT DELL

(This is the second of a series of three articles on the situation in South Tyrol. The first was South Tyrol—Austria's Lost Province. The concluding article, to appear next week, will describe the terror in South Tyrol.)

Bozen, March 27

THE present regime in South Tyrol dates from the advent of the Fascisti to power in Italy. On the day of the armistice, November 11, 1918, Lieutenant Colonel Pecori-Giraldi, commanding the Italian forces at Trent, issued a proclamation to the German population of South Tyrol in which he undertook on behalf of the Italian Government that their own schools, institutions, and organizations should be preserved. The Italian state, he said, taking its stand on the principles of freedom and justice, would know how to treat its citizens of other nationalities with equity and affection. In German-speaking places German would be an official language as well as Italian and, whereas the Austrian monarchy had oppressed the Italian inhabitants of the province, "Italy, the great and united nation, where complete freedom of thought and speech reigns," would "concede to her fellow-citizens of other nationalities the maintenance of their own schools, their own institutions, and their own organizations." This undertaking was on the whole respected by the successive Italian governments until Duke Mussolini came into power. The German inhabitants of South Tyrol were given the same just and liberal treatment as had long been given to the French-speaking inhabitants of Italian Savoy and they were beginning to be, if not reconciled, at least resigned to their new conditions. A commission of the League of Nations that investigated the treatment of minorities in the various European countries was able to report that they were better treated in Italy than anywhere else, although Italy had signed no minorities treaty. Duke Mussolini and his followers have changed all that. They have flagrantly violated the solemn undertaking given to the South Tyrolese on November 11, 1918, and the system now in force in South Tyrol is a gross breach of faith. It is also a manifestation of nationalist stupidity. Whereas, I have said, the Germans in South Tyrol were beginning to be resigned to their fate, they are now bitterly discontented and Italy is likely to have on her northern frontier a permanently hostile population. That can hardly be to her advantage. The adoption of the present policy after the satisfactory experience of the results of a liberal and tolerant policy in Italian Savoy is another example of the inability of most human beings to learn by experience. The treatment of German South Tyrol by the Fascist Government is deplored by all the best Italians, particularly by the old Italian inhabitants of South Tyrol, who are for the most part as indignant at it as their German fellow-citizens.

There seem to be a good many illusions in other countries about the Italian Fascisti, whom many people appear to regard as the saviors of society from bolshevism. In fact about 10 per cent of the Fascists are sincere believers in Fascist doctrines, about 40 per cent are arrivistes who obtain places and emoluments by their adhesion to the party, and the remaining 50 per cent are drawn from the criminal classes. Many of the latter first attached themselves to the Communists in the hope of profiting by possible disorders and then transferred their allegiance to Mussolini because they thought with reason that they would thus have more opportunities of plunder. A landowner in South Tyrol told me that a couple of years ago he caught a gentleman in a black shirt in the act of stealing his wood. When he remonstrated the thief calmly replied that he was a Fascist and, if he were not allowed to take the wood, he would return with fifty of his comrades and burn down the owner's house. The Fascist movement was accompanied by a large amount of ordinary crime without any political excuse and, such was the intimidation exercised by the Fascisti, that it was useless for the victims to seek legal redress. Now that Mussolini is in power he objects to the criminal propensities of a large number of his disciples whose energies are no longer tolerated, with the result that they are extremely discontented.

South Tyrol made its first acquaintance with the Fascist movement on April 24, 1922. On that day a non-political procession in Tyrolese costume took place in Bozen. A band of Fascists fired on the procession without the smallest provocation and killed a school-teacher called Franz Innerhofer. This abominable crime went unpunished and was followed by a series of outrages which, as in the rest of Italy, were tolerated by the Government then in power and by the local Italian authorities. In October, 1922, the Fascisti occupied the principal school in Bozen, drove out the German teachers and their pupils, and established an Italian school in the building. On the same day they occupied the Town Hall and expelled the mayor and the municipal council. After Duke Mussolini became dictator legal oppression was substituted for violence in South Tyrol, but last August the Bozen Trade Union House was seized by the Fascisti who still occupy it.

The Fascist policy in regard to South Tyrol was defined by the Fascist Senator, Ettore Tolomei, in a speech in the Bozen Stadttheater on June 15, 1923. His program of thirty-one points was officially declared by the sub-prefect of Bozen to be that of the Government and much of it has now been carried out. The aim of Fascist policy is gradually to eliminate the German language, to suppress the local Tyrolese customs and culture, and forcibly to Italianize the German inhabitants. Senator Tolomei proposed that all German inhabitants should be compelled to take Italian surnames. This measure has not yet been adopted, but Italian names have been given to every town and village in South Tyrol and only the Italian name may be officially used or printed on picture post cards. In some cases the old German name is put up in railway stations as well as the official Italian name of the place, but these cases are in a minority. For example, when one expects to arrive at Innischen, the frontier station on the line from Frankensfeste ("Fortezza") to Vienna, one finds oneself at "San Candido." The names of well-known places such as Bozen and Meran had always Italian equivalents. In Italian Bozen was called Bolzano and Meran Merano, just as London is called Londres in French. But the vast majority of the new Italian names are grotesque fabrications often bearing no relation to the original German name. This attempt to suppress historical place names is an outrage on good taste. At present it is not succeeding. Even the railway officials use the German names in most cases and do not know what one means if one uses the Italian ones. It is now a criminal offense to use the names "Südtirol, Deutschsüdtirol, Tiroler," and the like or any designation for the South Tyrol and its inhabitants other than "Alto Adige" and "Atesino," or their alleged German equivalents, "Hochetsch" and "Etschlander," which are in fact Italian inventions. Names of streets are put up in both languages, but many street names have been changed and Bozen now has a Via Vittore Emmanuele III and a Via Regina Helena.

No language but Italian may be used in the transactions, of local authorities or public bodies, although a German translation may be appended. Letters from a public body to a private person may be in German "provided they do not relate to documents addressed to officials, public offices, or legal bodies, or to the interests of a third person." Parishes in certain districts with less than 2,000 inhabitants may provisionally be exempted from this law until October 1 of this year, but not for longer. Since in the vast majority of South Tyrolese parishes nobody knows any language but German the law will be difficult of application, but it is being made an excuse for importing Italian officials from other parts of Italy. One of Senator Tolomei's proposals was that every parish in South Tyrol should be forced to have an Italian municipal secretary and this measure is being gradually carried out. In the great majority of cases the Italian officials are entirely ignorant of the only language understood by the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants. In places like Bozen and Meran, which have in the summer a large number of Italian visitors, Italian was always spoken to some extent in hotels and shops, but perhaps not more than English. The number of people in Bozen shops able to speak English is surprising. During the last five years many people have learned Italian and probably it is now spoken to some extent by from 25 to 30 per cent of the German population. But in the greater part of German South Tyrol German is the only language understood by the inhabitants. It will be understood how impossible a situation the introduction of Italian officials has created. The obligatory use of Italian for all official and legal documents has thrown the administration into confusion and the archives of the law courts and the public authorities are in a state of chaos.

A knowledge of Italian is now required of all government officials and employees, including those of the post office and railways. A certain number of the former Austrian officials have been retained on condition that they learned Italian and provided they were natives of South Tyrol, but Senator Tolomei demanded that all the native Tyrolese officials should be transferred to other parts of Italy, and the Tyrolese fear that this measure is likely to be adopted. Meanwhile a large number of Italians have been introduced in the railway and postal services. Even the workmen employed on the railways seem to be mostly Italians, and in some cases the railway refreshment rooms have been taken away from their former Tyrolese managers and handed over to Italians. All the notices relating to registered letters, etc., sent by the post office to private individuals are in Italian, so that the majority of the inhabitants cannot understand them. Laws and decrees are published exclusively in Italian without a German translation, so that they are incomprehensible to nine-tenths of the population. Moreover, when Italian laws are extended to the new province or Austrian laws repealed, the Government does not take the trouble to publish the fact, so that even jurists do not know what laws are or are not in force. All manifestos, posters, catalogues, time tables, and every kind of printed announcement, addressed to the public even by private individuals, as well as all permanent signs and inscriptions, must be in Italian, but a German translation may be appended "in those parishes in which instruction in the elementary schools is not yet solely Italian." Permanent inscriptions of historical interest or artistic value and those on gravestones or of a religious nature which are already in existence are exempted from this law. In future, however, when a German inhabitant of South Tyrol dies, his relatives must put an Italian inscription on his gravestone. I should think that this law must be unparalleled in any other country.

Night Rider

By ROLFE HUMPHRIES

What starts the trouble neither of us knows
But we are both unhappy when your mood
Turns hard and dumb as stone, puts on a hood
And gown of sullen black, gets up and goes Horseback through shadows far more dark than those Where we are lying still. I think you should Either avoid that hostile gloomy wood
Or take me with you. Are we friends, or foes?

"Oh, I don't know, don't know. Sometimes I fear
That our adroit devices miss the mark
Because we are so much too subtle. Maybe
Some very simple scheme would keep me here
As comforted as any little baby
Gulping his drink of water in the dark."

A Defense of Cowardice

By LLEWELYN POWYS

IN a certain country in olden times it was the custom to bind a coward between two wattled hurdles and cast him into the mire to be trodden under foot by all brave men. The custom has an especial interest for me because I have been for long convinced that had I lived in those rude days I would have suffered under it. None more surely. From the earliest years of my childhood I have been aware, metaphorically speaking, of the presence of a white feather in my bonnet. In my less shameless days I used to try to pretend that it was otherwise, but always with small profit.

In my life of nearly twoscore years I have been afraid of every mishap that can overtake a man in earth, air, and water. I have been afraid of swimming, afraid of riding, afraid of shooting, afraid of fighting. I have been afraid of being bitten and afraid of being scratched, afraid of being butted and afraid of being pecked. A tetchy peahen defending her seven mottled eggs has before now driven me pell-mell out of a shrubbery, a churlish pig-bucket rat out of a cow house, and a lambing ewe, with but a slight show of ill-nature, out of a straw-littered fold. Indeed, in the case of almost every animal I have a natural preference for the tail view.

When I go to the theater I always observe carefully where the nearest exit is situated. If I hear a shot fired in the street I immediately have an eye for the most accessible ice man's cellar. It would be impossible that it should be otherwise. I was born a coward, a craven, a poltroon, a man with a lily liver, and one like enough to disgrace both his race and his country.

This being as it is I find that my sympathies incline toward creatures of my own kidney. In the outer darkness of Africa I was conscious of feeling a very definite tenderness toward hyenas, toward these slouching neurotic hermaphrodites who because of their highly developed sense of self-preservation have become a general laughing-stock. Let the shaggy-maned lions go stalking never so boldly across the open plains, causing the whole veldt to resound with their noisy roarings, I would still find my softer feelings reserved for these queer, square-jowled henchmen of theirs, whom I knew to be shifting from shadow to shadow, in agonized apprehension lest through some unforeseen accident their own striped hides might come by a bump or pinch. And with birds my sentiment was the same. How much preferable to me was the egret to the eagle, the heron to the hawk!

The fact is this business of physical courage is much overrated. There is little or nothing in it—a mere survival from primitive times, when it was necessary for the herd “to jolly” one of their number into an imprudent action. To set any high value on courage is the most utter barbarism. Such an attitude has no relevance to the present day. It is out of date, obsolete, and had best be relegated to a dubious past when the shedding of blood was still regarded as the best way of ending disputes. Let us examine the matter more closely. These brave men, these “regular fellows,” who do not know fear—how insupportable they are as companions! Without wit or whimsy they go marching through life oblivious of all delicate values. They do not even understand the art of conversation. Nobody save

General Pershing could tolerate them for a moment. But on a bitter winter night when all is cold and desolate outside, when the ice floes bear and boom and crack, let me have a good honest coward at my side in the inner parlor where all is safe. How naturally understanding he is, how sophisticated! One can say anything to him and anything is forgiven. There is no moral strain. One knows that nothing is expected of one, save to show a clean pair of heels in the case of danger.

I like to witness little scenes of cowardice. I like to see people betray the amiability of their natures and their love of life by climbing trees, hesitating behind doors, or in any other way hurrying to cover from the jolts and jars of the world. Personally I would not give a dry rush for these brave bastards. It is on account of such loggerheads that wars continue. If cowards were no longer a distinguished minority, then we would, indeed, have a League of Nations! This infantile tendency of the human race to applaud courage has been responsible for the worst pages in our history. There are many other virtues of far more value than this tinkling theatrical one. In any community worthy of being called civilized fine manners would surely be esteemed more. Badgers are brave, but good luck to them! What do they know of irony and supersubtle innuendoes?

How fortunate, how happy would that planet be upon which no brave man had ever been born! Indeed, I should like to rid the earth of all brave men, to organize a great rebellion of cowards so that on some dark St. Bartholomew's night we might suddenly by treachery, by hitting below the belt, and stabbing in the back, rid the round world of all these vigorous mischief-makers. It would go hard, but in this way we would indeed make the world safe for cowards. The mere suggestion of any derring-do in our children would then be regarded with the most serious misgiving. By such lapses was not Europe all but brought to perdition? Indeed, in so sensitive, so highly refined a Utopia whose chief recreations would be love-making, drinking wine, and fortunate companionship any kind of intrepidity could only have a pernicious influence. In such a state a valiant man would be anathema, an accursed one, a cow with a crooked horn. Honor would only be done to these others, to these gentle beings whose propitiatory manner would keep the commonwealth out of all trouble.

Well do I recollect during the fateful August of 1914 feeling, as I read the paper on a sunny English terrace, nothing but amazement that the German rank and file should sacrifice their lives at the rate they did before Liège. The correspondent described them as “squealing like hares” as they were mown down by the Belgian guns. It seemed to me then, as the peacock butterflies flitted from the phloxes to the hot gravel and as the yellow-abdomened wasps drunken with the juice of golden pippins struggled from one cave of sweetness to another in the down-trodden grass on the other side of the orchard-railing, that such behavior represented the utmost folly, the utmost immorality. Had they nothing better to do with their lives than to become food for cannon? “Mortal men, mortal men!” They would have been spending their time better surely in the paddocks of their homes picking up Taunton Blacks.

And yet, God knows, I suppose that most of them were unwilling enough for the sake of glory to have their intestines riddled with bullets. It was the men behind the lines who had contrived to get them into the scrape. And those boys who went "over the top" so exultantly—where are they now? Who thinks of them? Who remembers them?

British imperialists, French chauvinists, American patriots—these are the people whose presence in the world forms the real obstruction against any civilized progress. If British jerry-sneaks, French dung-hill cocks, American yellow-streaks got together, then there might be some hope. For let these devilish brave men understand once and for all that it is only possible for cowards to be heroic.

In the Driftway

IN these days when new magazines and newspapers—or combinations of newspapers—are bursting forth on every twig, the Drifter feels that his own favorite sheet has been a bit neglected. He has heard Mr. Munsey say that the day of the small family newspaper is past; that publishing has become a great industry in which only men with millions of dollars and acres of land and thousands of employees can hope to compete, and he has noted that the next edition of his favorite paper is to be 130 copies and its staff is composed of eight energetic young men who are editors, reporters, feature writers, copy-men, press boys, typesetters, and distributors all at once. Not to keep his readers in suspense any longer, the paper in question is the Watching News, and it is produced by juvenile talent only at Bound Brook, New Jersey.

* * * * *

THE first items in this week's issue are, properly enough, entitled "News About People." Under this caption various bits of interesting information are assembled, perhaps the most beguiling being the following subtle note: "Joan Mason had a birthday party Wednesday afternoon. She was 2 years old and had 3 guests. It was a dandy little party." What Senator could more delicately patronize his Congressman; what captain of industry could express more kindly and yet more crushingly the scorn of the aged, established, and successful for the young and green? Under "Dog News" the items are a little mixed: "Borow's New Dog's name is Timmy and he is full of mischief and fun. . . . A flicker has a nest in the top of the telephone pole by Dr. Robinson's." The young editor evidently wished to introduce a new note in natural history, but with becoming modesty refrained from calling attention to his theory, which a more mature naturalist would undoubtedly have sought to publish dully under some such title as "A Study of the Similarity of Mammalia and Aves, with special stress on the Dog and the Flicker, compiled with Notes and Tables." The item under "School News" is brief and to the point: "We are very sorry that school begins on Monday." But what reticence and deep suffering those few words hold; and how many lurid pages would have been devoted to their like in an ordinary daily!

POLITICS are treated in the manner they deserve. Under the head Who Is President? the following dialogue appears: "'Who is that man, Mother?' asked one of our small sisters. 'That is Mr. Cooley, Herbert Cooley's Father.' 'Oh, Is he the President then?'" This irresistible bit is not labeled "Joke" as the real jokes are; the young editors mean it to be taken seriously as it should be. But do they write an editorial on the astonishing ignorance of the electorate or the failure of the voter to appreciate the blessings of government by even so much as remembering the name of the chief executive? They do not. They leave such superfluities to older though not better men. They understand that what is left unsaid is more important than what is said. They grasp the fundamentals of life and treat them briefly, succinctly, and as kindly as possible. They present to their readers news of the day arranged in orderly columns and unaccompanied by advertising, pictures, documents, or pseudo-scientific rules for living. They are, in short, publishing the only newspaper the Drifter has ever seen. It is a tribute to their courage, but what a sad commentary on the great public that only 130 persons are sufficiently astute rightly to value them.

Haiti Today

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A cruise to the West Indies and the Caribbean Sea gave me an opportunity to stop at Haiti. Although my stay was a brief one I was fortified with letters of introduction and was able to get much information as to what is going on in that most unhappy country. The Haitian Government practically does not exist; to all intents and purposes government in Haiti consists of Commissioner Russell, by whose will the country is ruled. Martial law prevails; the marines are everywhere, and their heavy drinking and brutality are much complained of. A marine recently killed an unoffending Haitian in an effort to take the latter's mule from him. It is easy to see that Americans are hated. As the tender from the steamer brought us to the shore everyone was struck by the sullen, hostile expression of the black faces staring at us from the wharf. The difference was marked between this reception and the friendliness of the natives of Jamaica. The latter, though very poor, seemed cheerful, alert, and contented under British rule, as the color line is not drawn sharply there. Race discrimination and a more crass and brutal exploitation exist under our auspices than under the Union Jack.

The expenses of our occupation are bleeding the Haitians to death. As I and my Haitian companions motored through Port au Prince we passed handsome villas, closed and deserted, their owners reduced to such financial straits that they can no longer afford to keep their homes open. "Persons who in America are nothing and nobody become great personages in Haiti; they live in luxury at our expense and lord it over us," said my cicerone with much feeling. American officers and their wives were passing briskly in fine motors while along every mountain road under the furious tropical sun came trudging troops of women and girls bearing great burdens on their heads and leading tiny donkeys with frail legs like match sticks and sharp thin little bodies laden with huge pack saddles and panniers. The contrast between the prosperous air of the occupationists and the misery of the inhabitants is painful. I saw some of the most "raggedy" men I have ever beheld in the varied course of my travels, whose clothing was a mere network of shreds revealing large expanses of bare, black skin. The mass of the people is of a primitive Negro type. The educated class is very highly educated, with a French culture which they do not want to have superseded by American culture, no matter how determined Americans may be to impose it on them. "While Haiti is a Negro civilization it has nevertheless a civilization of its own, Negro and French, which we should be permitted to develop in our way, not subject to outside interference." This is the frank way they put it.

But the Americans have made little attempt to bring the Haitians culture of any kind. The occupation is for purposes of exploitation, not for education. Not much of the money wrung from Haiti is spent on her people or for her benefit. There are no public libraries, but through private native enterprise at Port au Prince funds are being collected bit by bit and a small building is going up. We visited the convent and the nuns' school for girls and the seminary where the boys are educated and noted the cleanliness, especially of the former, and then went to the schools maintained by the Government (American Occupation) and saw the frowziness and general dilapidation.

The Haitians say that Americans are accustomed to claim all public enterprises as having been put through by them, including those that the Haitians themselves built long before the forces of the United States arrived. The marine who showed us over the prison, which is a combined jail, insane asylum, and poorhouse, told us that this had been erected by the Americans. I consider myself somewhat of an authority on prisons, as I served two prison sentences for picketing the White House during the suffrage agitation, and while the prison at Port au Prince, as far as could be judged by a hasty inspection, seemed to be in good condition, I was disgusted to see a marine on guard in the midst of the women's quarters, and to hear that there is no matron in charge, only a nurse. It is dangerous to put men in authority over women prisoners—especially young American soldiers so far away from home influences over colored women. My visit to the prison was prompted by a desire to interview M. Jolibois, the Haitian editor of the Courrier Haitien, and one of six journalists kept in jail for no other offense than having ventured to criticize the marines, the occupation, and the (Russell) Government. These journalists have been in detention for four months awaiting trial. When I inquired of the marine who was showing us over the prison why the accused were not brought to trial he said that was the fault of the Haitian law. When I asked how that could be, since Haiti was under martial law, he replied: "Martial law has been suspended." "He lies," was the sotto voce comment of the accompanying Haitian.

These journalists are held incomunicado; I could not see them even for a moment. They are kept in an inner court and are put out of their cells every morning at six o'clock, to be left all day in the broiling sun without hats or any kind of shelter. Two of them have already been made ill by it. Food from their homes is sent them, but before they are permitted to eat it it is examined to ascertain if letters or communications are concealed in it, and this examination is made by the guards running their fingers through it.

I left Haiti with a profound feeling of grief and mortification that such things should be done in the name of liberty and our country.

The Complete History of America

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The following is, as nearly as I can remember it, an extemporaneous speech given on the subject of immigration in a county contest of high schools at Kiowa, Kansas, by a freshman lad in short pants. Read it and consider yourself squelched. I only wish I had it verbatim:

Immigration began when Columbus discovered America. No efforts were made to stop immigration in the United States until about 1890. Then Grover Cleveland, who was President for two terms, seen that something must be done to stop immigration if this country was to keep from falling. So he passed a law stopping immigration, but did not enforce it very much.

At present there are two sides in America. There are the Protestants, who are white and believe that the white people ought to rule America. Then there is the Roman church, which is mostly foreigners, who belong to the darker races, chiefly the brown race.

Fighting for the white race and against the foreigners we have the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. They want to prevent the Roman church from getting the upper hand. They see that something must be done about immigration to keep the U. S. from falling. Fighting against the Klan we have the Knights of Columbus, who are trying to get the Roman church and the foreigners to rule this country.

Secretary Work at Taos

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Did Dr. Hubert Work, Secretary of the Interior, come to the Taos pueblo last Good Friday as "an apostle of health to the trachoma- or tuberculosis-stricken Indians"?

Or did he come to take a crack at those American artists in Taos who signed en masse the protest against the first Bursum bill?

At all events the Taos Indians had worked hard all day to make their roads passable for the advent of Secretary Work, Indian Commissioner Burke, and other notables representing the Great White Father. The old men of the council were gathered together to do honor to their visitors, to hear the white man's wisdom and present their own. Then up rose Secretary Work, and through his interpreter advised the council of old men not to let the Indians on any account have anything to do with artists. This was not for the reason that artists might infect them with trachoma. No. The artists were to be kept away from the pueblo, and not visited in their studios, because the artists desired the Indians to be half-animals, and to be kept half-animals, so that the artists might make thousands of dollars yearly out of them by painting their pictures. The artists would advise them not to be white men, not to wear citizens' clothes, not to cut their hair, for thus the artists could keep them in subjection and grow rich upon them as their self-styled friends.

When the spokesman of the Indians, Señor Juan José Archuleta, rose to respond to the Secretary's speech, and to present the views of his people, he was commanded to sit down, as the commissioner and his party had heard enough and were on their way.

A signed statement of these facts was then made by Señor Archuleta and Señor Juan Mirabal, Lieutenant-Governor of the Pueblo, and corroborated by two white men who had heard the Secretary's words in English.

Now it may be that the Taos colony of artists occasionally sell their pictures, and it undoubtedly is true that they admire the Indian most when he dresses as an Indian, wears his hair as an Indian, and otherwise preserves the ancient customs of his race. They do not want to see his dances abolished, nor his hair cut by a barber, nor himself garbed in blue denim overalls working in the road gang. They prefer to pay, and they do pay, the Indians who pose as models a return which attracts the Indian away from overalls and the road gang; or the attraction may be partly that the artists like the Indians as human beings and the Indians also find the artists human. In any case I submit to the eminent Secretary two suggestions: that jumping on the artists does not get one very far with trachoma or tuberculosis; and that the Indians themselves would like a chance to make a speech to the Secretary of the Interior.

Not a Peace Plan But a Peace Policy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Hegel was right when he said that the only lesson of history is that men learn nothing from history. If he were living today he might add that consistent thinking about human relations ceased in August, 1914. Upon any other theory it would be difficult to account for the fact that among the numerous proposals that have recently been made to keep the world from slipping over the brink so little attention has been given to the propagation of a principle that all enlightened political reformers from Adam Smith down to the World War have vigorously proclaimed as an indispensable condition to international peace—free trade. This is all the more remarkable since the liberals, who haltingly yielded to the clamor for war, justified their action on the ground that the principle of freedom was in danger of being overthrown.

Why, then, has a liberal program not been adopted by a single great state except England—and that only recently, under Ramsay MacDonald? To ascribe the failure solely or even primarily to great economic interests is simplifying the problem beyond recognition and diverting our effort from the only sphere of action in which a solution is possible; for in no popular government is peace determined by the privileged few; its last affinity must be in the will of the majority.

That the real terms of the problem are not generally understood is evident from the writings and public utterances of the great majority of the advocates of the League of Nations. They seldom fail to miss the point; they assume that our preponderant weight, added to those states which are now members of the League, would force a recalcitrant minority to submit to the arbitrament of courts and the rule of law quite regardless of the fact that the Treaty of Versailles, of which the Covenant is a part, is the law of Europe and that that law runs counter to the economic currents and interests that flow between states. The fundamental error in such a position lies in the assumption that obedience to law is peace.

But how is peace to be established and maintained? There is but one way: There must be, on the part of the public and those who have direct control of foreign policies, an agreement upon guiding principles in the conduct of both domestic and foreign affairs. We must remember that national interests are controlled—so far as control is possible—through a domestic policy, and international interests through a foreign policy. Of course, at many points the two merge. Thus the tariff law of one state affects every foreign state in the matter of trade. Likewise laws relating to immigration or national defense, coming solely within the jurisdiction of domestic policy, are, from their very nature, of vital concern to foreign states. Our immigration laws regarding the admission of Japanese are an outstanding illustration.

Foreign problems under normal conditions usually arise and are disposed of one at a time, and, as they usually affect only particular interests, the general public is not aroused to the seriousness of the situation. It is so easy to appeal to patriotism, national interest, or national honor, or to make it appear that the foreign state against which an offensive policy is directed is the aggressor that the public seldom sees the real issue. Newspapers take the issue up where the diplomat lays it down, and it is soon made to appear that there is a conflict of interests whereas it is really a conflict between two theories of control. To state the idea more directly, war is a conflict between domestic and foreign policy, in other words, between national and international conceptions; and the reconciliation of these two ideas constitutes the whole problem of peace.

But the reconciliation of ideas or policies is not a question of mechanism or alliances at all. It is simply the application of the Golden Rule to international affairs. And if such a conception seems too idealistic for the practical statesman, it may be pointed out that Ramsay MacDonald is actually putting it into practice today in England with the result that in the brief period of his premiership he has already accomplished more for world peace than all the chancelleries of Europe and America combined have accomplished since the signing of the armistice. Not till nations come to realize that even within their own jurisdictions certain powers, though legally recognized, should not be exercised to the injury of a foreign state, will any advance be made toward a better world. The man who puts up a spite fence on his own lot to interfere with the view of his neighbor because the law permits it may be doing more to provoke a quarrel than the man who commits an act of trespass which is forbidden by law. A protective tariff which shuts out goods manufactured in foreign countries and thus prevents thousands of foreign working men from pursuing an occupation adapted to their ability and environment may do infinitely more to injure a foreign state than is done by a violation of its neutrality.

One of the chief difficulties in achieving and preserving the peace of the world lies in the fact that war is the cumulative result of a series of events scattered over a period of years before the outbreak of hostilities, and of unfriendly foreign policies adopted long before the currents of hate consume men's reason because of some overt act like the sinking of the Maine or the murder of an archduke. Some means must therefore be devised by which nations shall come to realize that conducting a foreign policy wisely and patriotically is not driving a sharp bargain with another state but winning its everlasting friendship. Not in a "plan" to prevent war, devised when its wrath is upon us, nor in a mechanism designed to compel obedience to law in the future can an enduring peace be established, but in a policy looking toward the removal of all restraints upon trade and commerce between states, and in the creation of a free spirit out of which law and justice shall flow.

The Kidnapping of Bergdoll

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read in your issue of February 27 an editorial paragraph calling the attempt to "kidnap" Bergdoll "a peculiarly outrageous bit of lawlessness" and calling it also "the invasion of a friendly country to kidnap Bergdoll." Your paragraph then goes on to say:

One has only to consider what the uproar would have been had the conditions been reversed—had Germans sought to free one of their compatriots interned in this country—to realize the enormity of this crime.

I must admit I am speechless before this absurd attempt to draw anything like a parallel. Bergdoll is not interned in Germany; he fled from America and is, therefore, a fugitive from justice, not an internee. What is more, to draw anything like an analogy between the Americans going to the little town on the Rhine where Bergdoll lives and attempting to kidnap him and Germans in America attempting to free one of their interned compatriots during the war is out of the question, and belongs in a journal of hysterical rather than sober, liberal thought. There is no similarity between the case cited and the case of what you call reversed conditions. You cannot help Germany by defending the malodorous escape of Bergdoll. His case is one that disgusts all Americans, and I am fairly certain that his being hailed as a hero by the people of the town where he resides is rather because these poor people need his money, which he is said to distribute very liberally, than because they think him worthy of esteem.

I am sorry to find things like this in The Nation just because I admire The Nation so much. I enjoy reading it, but I do not enjoy such flights of illogic as the paragraph above.

Taxing the Rich

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I want to bring to your attention a matter which I think might be referred to Senator Couzens's committee. About two years ago in conversation with a leading Boston lawyer known for his activities as a lobbyist in Washington I was informed that he had just "put over" the Treasury Department a tax remission to the amount of about $800,000 in behalf of a large corporation here which he did not name. The plea which was made by him and accepted by the Department was that although the concern had made profits involving such taxes for a year recently passed they had not yet paid them, and now business was so bad that if the Government demanded settlement they would be obliged to close down and thus throw out of employment a large number of hands. I suggested that he meant to tell me that the payment had been deferred, but he assured me with great pride that he had had it remitted entirely. I expressed surprise that the Department should remit taxes on any plea, especially this one, and he assured me that it was authorized to do so under the law and that it was ordinary practice.

He indicated that he had a similar service performed for many other clients and that there was a regular channel of influential lobbyists in Washington who carried these things through. He said: "If you know where to go and how to work it and if your claim is big enough you can get away with it."

I suggested that I was hard up and asked him to plead to the Treasury Department that I would throw my servants out of employment and stop work myself unless the Government remitted my $800 income tax. He thought I was talking like a fool.

Bishop Brown's Bad Book

Bishop William Montgomery Brown has been officially summoned to appear before a Court of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Cleveland, Ohio, on May 27, 1924, to be tried for the twenty-three outrageous heresies embodied in his book entitled

Communism and Christianity

In reply to his summons Bishop Brown says in part: "My heresy does not consist in rejecting the theology of the Christian interpretation of redemptive religion but in emptying it of its traditional supernaturalism and filling it with scientific naturalism. In this way I still hold to the Gods of the Old and New Testaments, but I empty them of their Mosaism and Paulinism and refill them with Darwinism and Marxism."

A copy of "Communism and Christianity," 224 pages, now in its 150th thousand, together with a copy of "Heresy," a magazine about the trial, revealing the bankruptcy of Orthodoxy, will be mailed for 25 cents.

Idealism and Despair

Waste. By Robert Herrick. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

OF all the critics of American life, none is less hopeful than Mr. Herrick. Though Sherwood Anderson, Sinclair Lewis, and their innumerable followers may indulge a more reckless scorn, the very exuberance of their condemnation reveals plainly enough a confidence that they are fighting on the winning side, whereas Mr. Herrick lacks all their buoyance and seems chilled to the bone. Others, perhaps, have kept up their spirits with exultant mockery or with dreams of a more comely society, but he has stuck quite simply to the task which he set himself long ago and has continued, coldly, seriously, and without enthusiasm, to analyze the conditions of success in the business and professional world. Last year, it is true, "Homely Lilla" seemed in some ways to mark a new departure, but in "Waste" he returns to the pattern of his most important previous work, to the story, that is, of a young man who begins with a determination to achieve something great or at least honorable in life but who is gradually either absorbed into the vast money-making machine or is destroyed by it. This new novel reveals him as, if possible, more hopeless than he was when he told the same story before, as an idealist who believes that American prosperity has rotted American character to the core and who sees any possible remedy far away.

Mr. Herrick's standards, austere and simple, apply to less subtle and intangible things than do those of many of his fellow-critics. Others have charged against our civilization a lack of grace, imagination, and beauty; they have bewailed and belabored the absence of urbanity, artistic productivity, and intellectual interests; but Mr. Herrick is too much occupied with more fundamental things to find time to concern himself, except incidentally, with the graces. He would, one imagines, be content to assume that mere provinciality would in a healthy community work its own cure, but he usually brings his hero face to face with fundamental meanness and simple dishonesty. While others have discussed our culture he has, quite wisely perhaps, confined himself largely to our business because that, though less colorful, is with us more fundamental, and because he is evidently convinced that it is useless to criticize the flower of our civilization unless we understand its roots. He sees us after a century and a half of national existence still crude, materialistic, and ugly not because we have neglected art and culture, but because we have complacently accepted greed as the sole motive for, and chicanery as the method of, the industry and business upon which our civilization is founded.

The Memoirs of an American Citizen might stand as the generic title of his most important books, for he has shown a whole series of young men starting at the bottom (as a good American is supposed to do) but speedily discovering that the arts by which one rises are not industry, honesty, or skill but trickery and corruption. Architects, engineers, and lawyers lose out, while the prizes go to those who are willing to "play the game" by pulling social and political wires, by engaging in questionable financial operations, by plundering national resources, or, at least, by leaguering themselves with those who do. As long, he seems to say, as financial reward is the only accepted standard of achievement and as long as this reward goes not to those who serve or create but to those who manipulate, it is useless to complain that our civilization lacks grace. The cynical phrase "business is business" excuses all things, and there is no hope for a nation in which the escutcheons of the only aristocracy which it recognizes bear that motto. Of the statesman, the soldier, the doctor, the priest, and the artist it has always been at least expected that he should work for something besides personal profit. But America has accepted

Business, the one profession which has always been assumed to be completely materialistic and selfish, as the only important calling.

Mr. Herrick's chill despair has blighted to some extent his work. There is no more intelligent student of national life than he, and no one who has described from a fuller knowledge or in a more concrete manner typical examples of the working of our system. But grace of style he certainly has not, and his stories move with a heavy tread because they are told by a man who, in the bitterness of his disillusion, has lost all enthusiasm and is sustained only by an intellectual love of integrity and a cold hatred of its opposite. In the present book, the story of an engineer who fails because he is more interested in engineering than in water-power grabbing, the only flashes of real passion occur when Mr. Herrick's fierce misogyny comes into play. Woman, subtly and remorselessly asserting her claim upon man by "giving herself into his keeping" and then refusing to recognize any success except tangible wealth and power, he sees as the channel through which the great Goddess of Getting On asserts her power over even those few who might otherwise have escaped her. In this book, as in others, when he describes a woman's tightening grip he fairly burns, but in most of the other incidents the book moves one only as a relentlessly thorough and concrete analysis can move. "Waste" is not particularly easy to read and yet it deserves to be read, for nowhere else can be found a more thorough study of a problem which must be solved.

The American Judiciary

The American Judge. By Andrew A. Bruce. The Macmillan Company. $2.

THE proper function of the judge in our experiment in government is today a matter of controversy. Events of recent months bring this out strikingly: the storm of protest over the Supreme Court's "veto" of the child-labor and minimum-wage laws; the great popular condemnation of the Wilkerson injunction against the striking shopmen; the public indignation over the use of contempt-of-court powers in the Craig and Michaelson cases.

Although the need for popular discussion of this problem of the judges is obvious, little has been written for the layman on one of our most important and our least comprehended fundamental questions of political practice. If for no other reason than the surprising scarcity of such material, this book by a former chief justice of the North Dakota Supreme Court is an important one.

Judge Bruce's book treats of two distinct phases of this field of inquiry. The first is that of essentially practical problems: the unreasonable cost of litigation, the confusion and obscurity in the decisional law, the excessive burdens borne by the appellate courts, the archaic state of criminal procedure, the dilemma of a judge depending on political support yet unable conscientiously to seek aid from potential litigants. When Judge Bruce writes of such matters he is clear and he is convincing. His presentation is, it is true, popular and oversimplified; nevertheless, it is admirably adapted to the lay audience to which it is directed.

The second part of the discussion is a consideration of more fundamental problems, such as the desirability of our judicial control over legislation; the regulation, through the equity courts, of industrial relations; an appointive compared with an elective judiciary; the courts' interpretation of the right of free speech and free press, and the like. But here, unfortunately, the author's preconceptions and training render impossible the impersonal, scientific analysis the subject requires. For instance, his discussion of government by injunction in labor disputes, or of the judicial "veto" of social legislation, proceeds from premises of right and wrong. His conclusion that the courts, and rarely the legislatures, are the bulwark of a democratic commonwealth is predicated upon irrelevant oratory and the most amazing errors of fact. The issue, of course, is not one of abstract right or wrong, and the reasoning must be closely woven, resting upon empirical data, and not upon a denunciation of "self-styled friends of the people," labor leaders (e.g., p. 131), "sociologists and political-science teachers" who are, to quote some of Judge Bruce's typically temperate and judicial language, "insanely bolshevistic"!

The author's conclusions accurately mirror his social ideals. To him, a society is at its zenith when it is, above all, stable. He is first of all a defender of things as they are, a high priest in the court of Koshchei. There must be, to this type of mind, "respect" for the law and "reverence" for the judges, regardless of the respectability of either. (Only a few months ago the late unlamented Mr. Daugherty, then chief officer of the law, was singing encomiums on the "reverence" due the law and all its administrators.) There is, argued Judge Bruce, an "only too prevalent tendency . . . to condemn the actions of all who are in authority." With such preconceptions and such reasoning his conclusions on the problem of the courts are of little value in a field which calls for a scientific mind and a judicious temperament.

W. H. Hudson in the Flesh

W. H. Hudson. A Portrait. By Morley Roberts. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

ABOUT Hudson the writer there has begun to be—at least among those who know his books—very little doubt. Of his fiction, "The Purple Land" and "El Ombú" will probably survive "Green Mansions," in spite of popular preferences just now. "Far Away and Long Ago" will continue to seem one of the most beautiful of British autobiographies. "The Naturalist in La Plata," "Idle Days in Patagonia," "Nature in Downland," "Hampshire Days," "A Shepherd's Life," and "A Hind in Richmond Park" will long be classics in that form which Gilbert White invented but which Hudson developed in the direction of his own more pungent genius. As collections of essays these last volumes mean much to English prose; as pictures of South America and England, and as records of that endlessly exciting world of fact which men call Nature, they are more precious than can at present be told. Simple as they are, and closely as they adhere to the plain truth as Hudson met it on his solitary walks, they come nearer to some kind of supernature than anything in "Green Mansions," which set out to be a romance of another world. As a writer Hudson performed that rare enough feat of reading his own temperament into nature and thereby rendering it both more important and more true.

It is rarely if ever profitable to make distinctions between a man and his books. In the case of Hudson it is particularly futile to do so, for it always has been obvious that the reticent, austere naturalist lived most fully in his books—perhaps lived only there. Readers with a modicum of imagination have been aware from the first that Hudson was in no ordinary sense a happy man; that he attained such genial moments as he had among wild, natural forces—men and women of villages, balls of thistledown on wide plains, birds in forests or over lonely fields. He was restless and ill-tempered in cities; he meant exactly what he said when he identified himself in "Hampshire Days" with the prehistoric men whom he imagined to be sitting on their mounds at twilight and looking with "their dark, pale, furious faces" toward the little modern races which had supplanted them. So there was no news of magnitude to be expected from a book written about Hudson by a man who had known him intimately for forty years.

Mr. Roberts has little indeed to tell. Not only was Hudson uncommunicative about his past; in the present "there was something in his character which forbade him to abandon his soul to others." For some reason he could not be got at—except in his books, and the world has those. Mr. Roberts is utterly unable to say anything concerning the first forty years which cannot be found in "Far Away and Long Ago" and "Idle Days in Patagonia." He met Hudson in London in 1880; Hudson was already married; he was poor, and continued poor; he wrote books from 1885 until his death, in 1921; there is nothing more of really major importance. Certain details, to be sure, are not unwelcome. Hudson was twenty-nine when he came to England, and it was always England chiefly that he loved. His wife was fifteen years his senior; was fat and did not understand his work; yet for a long while took in boarders or gave music-lessons to support him while he wrote articles that did not sell. He was six foot three; had large features and large extremities; had a sense of humor but was often savage; lacked manners; loved singing, and when his wife lost her voice made Mr. Roberts take her place; suffered from boyhood with a weak heart; was insatiably curious; resented the passage of the years so fiercely that he never told his age and apparently never gave a thought to time that had been put away; exacted much from his friends; was most comfortable in the small houses of poor and interesting people; wrote thousands of letters, but before his death called most of them in and destroyed them because he wanted no biography of himself. Many of these things, however, might have been true of other men. None of them "explains" the quality of vision or the power of pen which made Hudson the writer that he was. Unfortunately, those cannot be explained.

Chickens That Hatched

My Crystal Ball. By Elisabeth Marbury. Boni and Liveright. $3.

AFTER the perfumed draughts of Mayfair autobiographies, and the almost Pasadena sweetness and light of most American ladies with pen in hand, it is salt wind in mid-ocean to have a female open a book about herself with "Three of the earliest episodes in my life are distinctly associated with cowardice, gluttony, and mendacity." Elisabeth Marbury in "My Crystal Ball" does not thereafter proceed to give a Pepysian account of high crime and brazen adventure, but she does unfold a record of sixty-seven years' energetic participation in the business, social, and artistic life of Europe and America, in which there is no anemic paragraph. We meet her at the age of six stealing bananas from her father's store-room and getting stomach-ache. She hands us at the age of sixty-seven a polemic against prohibition and a bouquet of philosophical saws, catholic counterpart to the advisings of that worldly Quaker, Benjamin Franklin. And as she hurries off to consult with Eugene O'Neill about his latest play and catch the train for Washington to help wangle the Democratic National Convention for New York she seems to have twenty years ahead of her as racy, as varied, and as energetic as her past.

The most interesting character in her book is Elisabeth Marbury herself. She wastes very little time in talk. Certainly no time at all in the feminist plaint that a man's world is difficult to do business in. The way to be free is to be free. When she wanted things, she went after them. I suspect that often Miss Marbury has sat tight and waited for the other fellow in a deal to come across, but I do not believe she has languished a minute in the role of the quiescent lady waiting for the world to bring her flowers.

At twenty-five she was reading "Sesame and Lilies" beside the incubator she kept in the small hall bedroom of the family dwelling in Irving Place. She counted her chickens, but they hatched. She took prizes at poultry shows. She made a little money. She began meeting people, meeting everybody: Lily Langtry and Gambetta, Oscar Wilde and Frances Hodgson Burnett, Clyde Fitch and Marie Corelli, Charles Murphy and Mrs. Humphry Ward—everybody from P. T. Barnum to George Eliot. She became a play-broker, a business woman of the theaters, a promoter and patron and producer. She crowds her canvas so as she writes of her career that she makes a sort of hoi-polloi of the elect she describes, but her colors are bright. Her story is a revelation of a woman who wanted power rather than love, and went after it.

ERNESTINE EVANS

The Casualness of Things

The Black Dog and Other Stories. By A. E. Coppard. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A. E. COPPARD has made an idiom for himself out of the homely and the familiar. His Simple Simon sees "a fine young girl . . . smiling at him; the plait of her hair was as thick as a rope of onions and as shining with the glint in it." He has the secret of giving us companionable human beings: his are the sort of people who can sit long hours in a country pub and who are made meditative by the sight of "a wren cockering itself in a bush." And when he is at his best he can write like this:

Elsewhere in this emptiness even a bush will have its name, and an old stone becomes a track mark. Upon the soft tufts and among the triumphant furze live a few despised birds: chats and finches and that blithe screamer the lark, but above all, like veins upon the down's broad breast, you can perceive the run-way of a hare.

Mr. Coppard leaves the Saxon scene now and again; when he does he shows himself clever and ingenious, but he shows, too, that the exotic is not for him. When he writes about Kilsheelan, or about the country that the beautiful Flaune lived in we know that he is just romancing. The second of these two scenes is particularly empty; it is in a Lord Dunsany sort of country where there are "birds of a rare kind; the flame-winged antillomeneus and kriiffs with green eyes." The story of the man from Kilsheelan is in a near-Irish idiom and very cleverly indeed does Coppard handle his post-Synge speech:

"Listen, you," said Christine. "There's two upstart men in the house now, seeking you and the other. There's trouble and damage on the head of it. From the asylum they are. To the police they have been to put an embargo o. the reward, and sorra a sixpence you'll receive of the fifty pounds of it: to the expenses of the asylum it must go, they say."

Perhaps it is because the writer has to concern himself overmuch with an idiom that is not native to him that the interest of this particular narrative is somewhat dissipated.

A. E. Coppard has realized what literary value there is in the casual. It is true that in one of his stories a tiger devours a man, and in another we have an ending that shows a poor man dreaming that he has been liberated from prison for a day and is able to attend his son's funeral. But casualness is the real note of his stories. The Hon. Gerald Loughlin makes up his mind to miss the train that is already a little late and becomes involved in the happenings that center round "The Black Dog." At the end of the story "he has not forgotten, but he cannot endure the thought of that countryside—to be far from the madding crowd is to be mad indeed." In the second story, poor Bollington "walked out of the hotel just as I was and left her there," and so left a wife who was under the impression that she was leaving him. Then there is young Simpkins, who goes to collect a debt owed to his father and who is left with a lovely ballet girl in his arms. In the last, the story about Finkle, who throws away three out of his four bananas, Mr. Coppard, perhaps, permits himself to be just too casual.

What the author of "Adam and Eve and Pinch Me" gives us in "The Black Dog" is a prime lot of yarns, but yarns by a well-equipped and sophisticated writer. The story that gives title to the collection is not about any haunting or sinister black dog: the Black Dog of the book is a public house in an English village, a public house that is the background for a drama worked out between the beautiful and subtle Orianda Crabbe, her casual inn-keeping father, the bewildered and tragic Lizzie, and the not too adventurous Gerald Loughlin. It is a very good story, indeed, a story memorable for the sight it gives us of the cool and beautiful, but somewhat tarnished Orianda.

In most of these eighteen stories there is a character that is firmly held and firmly brought across to us. After Orianda Crabbe there is Simple Simon, who lived lonely in the depth of a forest, and who said he would go seeking the sweet of heaven, for what was there in the mortal world to detain him? He meets a scholar, who gives him a coat to look decent in, with the scholar's own sins—unbeknownst to him—left in a wallet of sowskin in a secret pocket in it. Then there is John Pettigrove, who was district registrar in Tull and who gave his devotion to a handsome lady who was for a while near him. There is a church in this story that has about it "the indulgent dimness under trees, and the tower with its unmoving clock, the very delicacy of solitude," and there is a wood that has "deep in the heart of it all . . . a lovely open space covered with the greenest grass and a hawthorn tree in the middle of that." At the end of it there are men digging a grave on "a summer's day so everlastingly beautiful that it was incredible anyone should be dead." It is the sort of a story Thomas Hardy might write if he could ever bring himself to think with lightness upon the casualness of things.

PADRAIC COLUM

One-Night Stands

Red Bear or Yellow Dragon. By Marguerite E. Harrison. George H. Doran Company. $3.

IF Marguerite Harrison had made her "Red Bear or Yellow Dragon" a pure adventure story, showing just how far she, alone and armed only with a typewriter, could stalk strange Eastern game, it would have carried an unmistakable appeal; that is, provided she had adhered more closely to her own adventure instead of wandering off so much to assail people who are not relevant to the main theme; provided she had broadcast fewer and less malicious bits of sheer gossip en route. We would have accepted her own portrait for the frontispiece and the numerous personal illustrations that succeed it as part and parcel of a unified tale.

Of course the individual required some excuse for her adventure, some acknowledged object, in order to win the right-of-way here, there, and everywhere, and it is the excuse Mrs. Harrison chose which spoils her tale. She made her goal too comprehensive. Her exploits are consequently as mild as their object is magnificent. To be specific. Hearing that "the Far East is in the grip of two new world forces"—Russia and Japan—Mrs. Harrison sailed the seas to "pick up the loose ends of the story and grasp the inner meaning of their movements." "Asia, the eternal sphinx, was devising new riddles for the West to guess" and, determined to overcome every obstacle and danger, she went forth to guess them and indeed to make of her answers "a political weather chart" for folks back home.

Mrs. Harrison knew in advance what the riddles were. She lists them on her first page.

What were the actual reactions to the decisions of the Washington Conference? What was the real attitude of Japan toward naval disarmament? What were the new movements and tendencies that would influence the shaping of Japan's future internal and external policies? How far could the agreements of the Powers with regard to the Far East be carried out without reckoning with the Russian Bear? What was the extent of Soviet influence in Mongolia? To what extent had Red propaganda taken root among the Yellow peoples? What had happened in Korea since the abortive revolution of 1919? Was the chaos in China more apparent than real? What was the real significance of the Pan-Asiatic movement?

To find solutions for these mighty riddles, Mrs. Harrison explored for many months. But how? She interviewed all sorts of people, visited temples, went to a tea house with an all-foreign company, drank ceremonial tea, saw the drama, lived for a time with legation folk in that "whispering gallery of the world," Peking, got the idea in Shanghai that the Chinese are thinking about extra-territoriality, and then journeyed by boat, wagonette, tarantás, into the storm center of Eastern politics, Mongolia. She slept in izbas. She barely escaped hungry wolves. She was arrested and spent weary days in prison.

The solutions of the riddles are finally offered us in 296 pages, which
